

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ## FLOGGING IN THE ARMY.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I wish, Sir, with the permission of the House, to give notice of the course which the Government propose to take in consequence of the vote at which the House arrived last Friday evening on the subject of Flogging in the Army. I feel sure that hon. Members on either side will not for a moment suspect the Government of any intentional disrespect towards the House when I say that, whatever the merits of the case may be, one way or the other, considering the importance of this question and the extent to which it affects military discipline, the Government cannot regard a majority of 1 in a House of 215 Members as a deliberate expression of the opinion of the House of Commons. Sir, it is therefore our intention to insert the usual clause in the Mutiny Bill, giving the power of punishing by flogging in the army in certain cases. I wish to give this notice in all fairness to hon. Gentlemen opposite; and I shall leave it to the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway), and the other hon. Members who supported his Motion on this subject, to move to expunge that clause from the Mutiny Bill if they think fit.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask when the right hon. Gentleman proposes to go into Committee on the Mutiny Bill? The House, he thought, ought to receive due notice of that.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I am not able at this moment to name the day, but due notice of it shall be given.

MR. OTWAY wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the clause he proposed to insert in the Mutiny Bill, authorizing the infliction of corporal punishment, was the usual clause in that Act, or—as he thought he gathered from his remarks—a clause restricting that punishment in some further sense than had hitherto been the case?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: The course I intend to follow, and which I thought I had clearly announced to the House, is to insert in the Mutiny Bill the same clause on this subject which it has been usual to insert in it.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION—CATHEDRAL AND COLLEGIATE CHURCHES.

QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he rose to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have taken any and what proceedings for considering the claims of the non-capitular Members of Cathedral and Collegiate Churches which have been presented under the provisions of the Ecclesiastical Commission Act passed during the last Session?

Sir John Pakington

MR. MOWBRAY said, in reply, that in the course of the autumn an application was received from several non-capitular members of cathedral and collegiate churches on the subject to which the hon. Member referred. When the Ecclesiastical Commissioners re-assembled on the meeting of Parliament in February, a Select Committee was appointed to consider the matter, and certain queries were prepared, which were now in progress of being answered.

IRELAND—WATERFORD ELECTION—DISTURBANCES AT DUNGARVAN.

QUESTION.

MR. COGAN said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, in consequence of the instructions given by him on the 16th of February to the Crown Solicitor, in which he advised that a communication should be made to the Colonel of the regiment to have the soldiers who were at Dungarvan, on the occasion when the two men O'Brien and Keily lost their lives, paraded for the purpose of identification; whether any such demand has been made by the Crown Solicitor, and what has been the reply of the Colonel of the regiment? He also wished to ask, whether he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House the Reports taken for the Government by the shorthand writer employed for that purpose, of the proceedings at the inquests held at Dungarvan on the bodies of William O'Brien and Bartholomew Keily?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. CHATTERTON) said, in the absence of his right hon. and learned Friend, he had to state that the terms of the minute of the Attorney General in reference to the subject of the hon. Member's first Question were to the effect that if any trustworthy person came forward or could be found who could identify the soldiers who caused the death of these men, a communication should be laid before the commanding officer of the regiment. No such person had come forward, or could be found. He was also in a position to state that if any such evidence could be procured the commanding officer of the regiment would afford every facility for the identification of the men. With regard to the hon. Member's second Question, he had to say that the Reports taken for the Government by the shorthand writer were in the nature of private Reports, and it would not be convenient to lay them on the table of the House.

MR. COGAN said, he would give notice that on an early day he would move for the production of those Reports.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he would postpone till a later day the Question of which he had given notice respecting the appointment of Mr. Churchward as a Magistrate at Dover.

MAJOR DICKSON said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor), whether he would be willing to postpone the Motion standing in his name for this day until next Friday, as neither the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India nor the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, who were intimately acquainted with all the facts connected with the renewal of the Dover contract, would be in their places until that day? He thought, in common justice to Mr. Churchward, the hon. Member should comply with that request.

MR. TAYLOR said, he could not comprehend the grounds on which the hon. and gallant Gentleman asked him to postpone a Motion affecting the conduct of the Government. Was he to understand that the hon. and gallant Gentleman spoke on that matter in behalf of the Government? ["Order!"]

NAVY—STAFF COMMANDERS AND MASTERS.—QUESTION.

In reply to a Question from Sir LAWRENCE PALK,

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the Admiralty had decided upon continuing the rank of Masters in the Navy, and with that view had commenced the re-entry of cadets of the second-class. The St. George had been apportioned for their training. The Admiralty had also had under their consideration a scheme for redressing some of the grievances complained of by the Staff Commanders and Masters of the Navy, and that scheme was nearly complete when the late changes were made; but he hoped it would not be long before they would be able to complete it.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relative to the Representation of the People.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM. REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I rise to ask leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Laws for regulating the Representation of the People in Parliament. Sir, the principles of political representation, and especially as applied to the circumstances of this country, have of late years been so profoundly and so extensively discussed and investigated, that it is scarcely necessary on this occasion that I should advert to them. I propose, therefore, to confine my observations to two points. I will endeavour, in the first place, clearly to convey to the House the object of the Government in the Bill which I am asking leave to introduce; and secondly, I will detail the means by which that purpose, in their opinion, can be accomplished. It will be for the House, first, to decide whether that object is desirable; and secondly, if desirable, whether the means which we propose are adequate; and, in the first place, I would say that our object is not only to maintain, but to strengthen, the character and functions of this House. They are peculiar in any popular assembly; not only rare, but perhaps unexampled in any other which has existed. The House of Commons has combined national representation with the attributes of a Senate. That peculiar union has, in our opinion, been owing to the variety of elements of which it is formed. Its variety of character has given to it its deliberative power, and it owes to its deliberative power its general authority. We wish, I repeat, not only to maintain, but to strengthen that character and those functions; and we believe that, in the present age and under the existing circumstances of the country, the best way to do so is to establish them on a broad popular basis. I know that there are some persons in whose minds the epithet which I have just used may create a feeling of distrust; but I attribute the sentiment of alarm which is associated with it to a misapprehension of its meaning, and to that perplexity of ideas which too often confounds popular privileges with democratic rights. They are not identical: they are not similar. More than that, they are contrary. Popular privileges are consistent with a state of society in which there is great inequality of condition. Democratic rights, on the contrary, demand that there should be equality of condition as the fundamental basis of the society which they regulate. Now, that is, I think, a distinction which ought to be borne in mind by the House in dealing with the provisions of the Bill which I am about to ask leave to introduce. If this Bill be a proposal that Her Majesty shall be enabled to concede to her subjects, with the advice and concurrence of her Parliament, a liberal measure of popular privileges, then there may be many of its provisions which will be regarded as prudent, wise, and essentially constitutional. If, on the other hand, it be looked upon as a measure having for its object to confer democratic rights, then I admit much that it may contain may be viewed in the light of being indefensible and unjust. We do not, however, live—and I trust it will never be the fate of this country to live—under a democracy. The propositions which I am going to make to-night certainly have no tendency in that direction. Generally speaking, I would say that, looking to what has occurred since the Reform Act of 1832 was passed—to the increase of population, the progress of industry, the spread of knowledge, and our ingenuity in the arts—we are of opinion that numbers, thoughts, and feelings have since that time been created which it is desirable should be admitted within the circle of the Constitution. We wish that admission to take place in the spirit of our existing institutions, and with a due deference to the traditions of an ancient State.

In dealing with the question of the distribution of power in such a State—which is really the question before us—I would, in the first place, call the attention of the House to that part of it which is perhaps the most important, and which certainly to the greatest extent commands the interest of the public. I allude to the franchise, and especially that which should prevail in towns. I would ask the House at the outset to consider the principles upon which the occupation franchise in boroughs ought to rest, and upon which it is expedient to base it. In 1832 the borough franchise was founded on the principle of value. Those who paid £10 for the house in which they lived, subject to certain regulations as regards rates and residence, had the borough franchise conferred upon them. I believe that franchise may be fairly considered as having been an efficient and satisfactory franchise, and as having in its generation operated with advantage to the country. My own opinion from the commencement has always been that seed was sown in that arrangement which would necessarily in the course of time lead to some disturbance. That is, however, a question of controversy, and I will not indulge in controversy at the present moment. It is, nevertheless, a historic fact that only twenty years after the passing of the great measure of 1832 the principal, or, at least, one of the principal authors of that measure announced in this House that the arrangement which had been entered into, especially with respect to the borough franchise, was no longer satisfactory, and invited us to consider a new arrangement which might command a more complete assent. That is a fact which cannot be denied. The proposition which was made at the period to which I refer in order to allay discontent and meet the requirements of the time by the statesman who, upon the whole, had taken nearly the most prominent part in the passing of the Act of 1832 involved a diminution of the value on which the borough franchise was established. That proposition was received with no satisfaction, and from that period up to the present—and fifteen years have, I think, since elapsed—the question has more or less engaged public attention, and has been taken up by public men who have brought forward various schemes with a view to the solution of the difficulties by which it is surrounded. All these schemes have in their turn proved to be unsatisfactory, and all have been unsuccessful; but every one of them has been distinguished by this characteristic, that the only remedy proposed was a diminution in some form or another, or in some degree or another, of the value on which the borough franchise was based in 1832. The House will easily recall to its recollection the combination of figures which have been submitted to the notice of Parliament on this subject. We had before us £8 and £7 rating or rental; £6 in every form, and we now hear of other figures. No proposition, however, which has as yet been put forward has given satisfaction, because the country, and the House reflecting the feeling of the country, has felt that by none of the changes suggested was a settlement of the question likely to be insured.

Last year a Bill was introduced with the same object as that which I have risen to ask for leave to bring in to-night—namely, to amend the Laws for the Representation of the People in Parliament. That Bill was avowedly not founded on a principle; it was avowedly founded, as far as I can understand, on expediency. The right hon. Gentleman who was its powerful advocate in this House seemed to me always distinctly to have laid it down, in the course of his argument on the subject, that it was necessary there should be an admission of the working classes into the constituencies; that in accordance with a figure which he had fixed upon he calculated that a certain portion of them would be admitted; but that if another figure were adopted which he named he thought the number admitted would be excessive, and he therefore recommended the first figure as that which, upon the whole, would, he thought, furnish the best and safest solution of the difficulty. His proposal, therefore, involved no principle. It might have been an appropriate arrangement, but it was essentially an expedient. The House knows what took place during the long discussions in which we were engaged last year. [Ironical cheers from the Opposition.] I infer from that cheer that the House is prepared to recognise the truth of the statement that it was generally felt that the proposal of the late Government afforded no prospect of a satisfactory settlement of this question. A very considerable amount of time was last Session employed in a very unsatisfactory manner, until at length the House took the matter into its own hands, and, in one of the largest divisions which ever took place within these walls, asserted a principle with regard to the borough franchise which was carried by a majority. That principle was that the borough franchise should be founded on rating. The House will admit that the statement I have made is fair and accurate. No one questions for a moment that the Government fully realized the importance of that decision. Of course, if they had not acknowledged its importance, they would not have retired from a position of power; but they felt that the decision at which the House of Commons had arrived was one opposed to the whole policy which they had pursued during the Session. I do not say that every Gentleman on both sides of the House who contributed to that division—I do not say that everyone in a division which numbered above 600 Members, had narrowly investigated and pursued, to the last consequences, all that must follow from the assertion and adoption of that principle; but it happened, as happens in all popular assemblies, that a great decision was arrived at by the unerring instinct of the House. The House felt that for the last fifteen years this question of the borough franchise had not been treated in a satisfactory manner by any Government which had attempted to deal with it, and that the time had come when some principle should be laid down in a distinct and decided manner for the guidance of those who might have to offer propositions to the House on the subject. I take it for granted that if ever there was a decision of the House of Commons which meant something it was that decision which determined the fate of the Ministry; and if anything ever had the character of authority in this House at all, it was the vote arrived at on that occasion. The House, I assume, meant by the decision it arrived at that the person who was to be intrusted with a vote to elect Members of Parliament should be one with respect to whom there should be some guarantee and security for the regularity of his life and the general trustworthiness of his conduct; and the House thought that the fact of a man being rated to the relief of the poor and being able to pay his rates gave that fair assurance which the State had a right to require. I take it that vote of the House of Commons meant this:—If you are going to invest men with the exercise of public rights, let that great trust be accompanied with the exercise of public duty. I take it for granted that was what the House of Commons meant. It meant that the being rated to the poor and the paying of the rates constituted a fair assurance that the man who fulfilled those conditions was one likely to be characterized by regularity of life and general trustworthiness of conduct. That is a principle which the House thought ought not to be lost sight of, but should be a sine quâ non in the settlement of the borough franchise.

In having to consider this question, we accepted as a guide that decision of the House of Commons, placing on it what we deemed to be its real interpretation. We believe that the House has resolved and wishes that the borough suffrage should be bound up and united with the duty of paying rates for the maintenance of the poor, and paying them really—that, in fact, a bonâ fide rating franchise is what the House of Commons meant by the Resolution it adopted. Accepting the decision of the House with that interpretation, we had to consider how such a proposition could be united with the principle of value, which hitherto was and still is the law of the country with respect to the borough franchise, and which without exception during all the discussions on the subject for the last fifteen years has been accepted by Parliament. The result of this attempt was not satisfactory. In accepting a real and genuine principle of rating as a basis, we found, the moment we endeavoured to connect it with value, disturbing elements—which promised no prospect of solution, and gave no chance of permanency. Therefore, under these circumstances, in the course of consideration we proposed to ourselves to examine the whole question of occupation in boroughs, and see what would be the effect of the application of the principle of genuine rating without reference to value. Let me call the attention of the House to some figures, which will be in the hands of Members immediately and in greater detail. There are in the boroughs of England and Wales 1,367,000 male householders, of whom there are at present qualified to vote 644,000. There would, therefore, remain unqualified 723,000. In applying the principle of a franchise founded on being rated to the poor, and of personal payment of the rates, we found that out of these 723,000 now disqualified, or rather not qualified, for voting under the existing law, we should at once have had to take away 237,000—that is to say, that beneath the £10 line which now qualifies there are 237,000 persons who are rated to the poor and who pay rates, and who if the law were so changed that value should not be an element would then be qualified to vote for Members of Parliament. Now, if you add these 237,000 persons who are rated to the poor, and who pay their rates, to the 644,000 who are at present qualified, you will find that there would be 881,000 persons, fulfilling the required conditions—that is to say, almost exactly two-thirds of the whole of the householders in the boroughs of England and Wales. There would still remain 486,000, who would not be qualified under these circumstances, because they do not pay rates personally. A great deduction must be made from those 486,000 on account of persons who might claim to pay the rates; but a great amount of those 486,000 persons would still remain without the opportunity of being rated to the poor, because there are certain Acts of Parliament, some of a general and some of a local character, by which the landlord compounds for the rates of his tenants, who, in consequence, are called compound-householders, and most of these are under the operation of the Act with the details of which every Gentleman in the House is familiar—the Small Tenements Act. There are fifty-eight boroughs which are entirely under the operation of that Act, and there are ninety-eight boroughs in which certain parishes only are under the operation of the Act. In considering the settlement of the franchise for boroughs, and the possibility of attempting to establish it, not on the fluctuating principle of value, which is only a question of degree which may vary, and which we might be called on to change from year to year, it is impossible not to take into view the peculiar position of the compound-householders. And the question arises, ought a compound-householder to have a vote? Well, Sir, in our opinion, assuming that the House is of the same opinion, that the foundation of the franchise should be rating and a payment of rates, and that that is adopted by the House, not as a check, as some would say, but, on the contrary, as a qualification, and because it is the best evidence of the trustworthiness of the individual, we have no hesitation in saying ourselves that we do not think that the compound-householder, as a compound-householder, ought to have a vote. But, Sir, we are far from saying that any person who is a compound-householder, from the effects of Acts which have been passed for the convenience of vestries, should be deprived of the opportunity of obtaining and enjoying this right which persons in the same sphere of life may have granted to them, and which, for aught we know, these compound-householders may be equally competent to possess and to exercise. And therefore, Sir, we should have to consider whether it would not be possible, in the case of compound-householders who are deprived of rating for the moment by Acts to which I have referred, either of a general or local character—whether it might not be possible to give them the opportunity of accepting the public duty, and in consequence the public right, which others in the same sphere of life and influenced in their conduct by the same conditions of existence might possess; and, taking this general view of the question, seeing the impossibility of settling it on any principle connected with value, and that it is only by taking the rating principle in its completeness and authenticity that you can get one on which you can rest a perfect settlement, our opinion is, and we shall make that proposition to the House, that we should establish the franchise in the boroughs on this principle, that any man who has occupied a house for two years, and been rated to the relief of the poor and pays his rates—every householder under these conditions should enjoy the borough franchise. By that means the 237,000 persons who are now rated and pay their rates would, of course, be at once qualified. But with regard to the compound-householders, we propose that every facility shall be given to them—that they shall be allowed to enter their names upon the rate-book, to fulfil the constitutional condition to which I have adverted, and then they will, of course, succeed to the constitutional right which is connected with it. Sir, if we pursue that course you have your borough franchise fixed upon principle; you know where you are; you know that the power of electing Members of Parliament must be exercised by men who, by their position in life, have shown that they are qualified for its exercise. And meeting the difficulty of compound-householders by the provisions which are in the Bill, and which will give them every facility to claim the exercise of the same right on condition of fulfilling the same duty, the whole of the 723,000 householders in the boroughs of England that are at present not qualified to vote for Members of Parliament will be qualified by the Bill I am asking leave to introduce. Nor will there be a man among them, who, if he deserves the franchise, may not possess it. Now, Sir, I have heard many observations made on this question of the compound-householders; but the arguments, though plausible, amount only to this—those who wish that compound-householders should not qualify themselves for a vote upon the constitutional condition which we propose as the means by which the right should be obtained really, in fact, make one assumption on which all their remarks are founded, and that is this, that the working classes of this country are really so little interested in the possession and exercise of the suffrage that they will not take the slightest trouble in order to avail themselves of it and possess it. Well, that may be the opinion of those who make such observations, but it is not the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers. We believe that the feeling of the great body of the people on this subject is very different—that it is a feeling very likely to increase in this country, and that the conditions which we have laid down as those which should qualify a householder in a borough for a vote are consistent with the security of society, and are at the same time conditions which would be agreeable to the mind of every industrious man of integrity.

Now, Sir, I may recapitulate to the House for a moment the figures we have to deal with, because such vague assertions are made in the absence of correct statistics of voting and of householders that it is well that the House should bear them in mind. There are, as I have said, 1,367,000 male householders in the boroughs of England, and at the present moment 644,000 of them are qualified.

MR. BRIGHT: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether these houses include warehouses and shops?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: They are houses—dwelling-houses. I am referring to the male occupiers of dwelling-houses. Of the remaining 723,000, if the House accedes to the Bill I have to introduce, 237,000 now rated to the relief of the poor and paying their rates would immediately be qualified to vote; and in the case of the 486,000 who are compound-householders, facilities would be afforded to them, if they chose, of claiming their vote—that is to say, of inserting their names in the rate book, and paying their rates, and then they also, as a matter of course, will succeed to the enjoyment of the right. Well, Sir, that appears to me to be the only solid foundation upon which you can settle this question of the borough franchise. I have heard nothing which gives me any hope that any other plan can be offered which involves at the same time the principle that society has a right to ask that the person who exercises the suffrage is not a migratory pauper; and as regards settlement, I can see no satisfactory settlement unless you lay down the principle that every householder who fulfils the constitutional conditions to which I have adverted proves himself one qualified for the possession and exercise of such a trust; unless you take that settlement I can see no chance of this question being ever settled.

Now, Sir, there is a plan which I am told at this moment is popular among certain persons. Indeed, there are a great many plans, both as regards the suffrage, distribution of seats, and other matters, which I have no doubt will come before the consideration of the House, and when they do it will be very much for the advantage of those who introduce them to our notice, for I believe these subjects never can be better understood than after a discussion in the House of Commons. But there is a plan, I am told, popular with some persons, and which is held forth as a more satisfactory settlement of this question than the one I have proposed on the part of the Government, and that is what is called the £5 rating—that the suffrage should be established on a £5 rating. Now, Sir, I must say, having had very much to consider these questions, I know of no Serbonian bog deeper than a £5 rating would prove to be. Just let the House see how it stands. In the present state of the law, as I shall show to the House, if the interpretation we have placed on the great vote of last year be a sound one—and if it be not a sound one it proves the House of Commons was trifling with the question, there really is no such thing as a £5 rating: you let in a very large and very indiscriminate number to the enjoyment of the right without the preliminary performance of duties, and when they are let in you leave a great many behind them, who, because others are let in, immediately cry out to be admitted. Then where is your settlement? There is no more reason why a £5 rating should give a qualification than one of £4. But then I am told that this great difficulty is to be entirely overcome by a violent change to be effected in the law of England. Nominal £5 raters are to be turned into bond fide £5 raters by the operation of the law, and no Englishman who pays less than that sum is to enjoy the privilege of voting. All below that line are, in fact, to be taken out of the sphere of self-government, and deprived of the opportunity which the humblest now possesses, and would possess under the plan we propose, of performing public duties, and consequently of obtaining public rights. I can imagine no scheme more injurious—I may say more fatal—than a proposition of this kind; and it seems to me that if we were to adopt it manhood suffrage would be the logical and necessary consequence, and that every man who finds that he is in a position in which he may not be permitted to fulfil a constitutional condition which may give him a constitutional right would naturally fall back into the arms of the lowest agitators, and feel that his only chance of ever obtaining the rights of constitutional citizenship would be by a process which has not hitherto been recognised by any authorities in this country.

I have now expressed to the House, as far as the occupation in boroughs is concerned, upon what principle we recommend the borough franchise to be founded. It would make at once 237,000 persons qualified for the suffrage, and would allow all who were not rated before to avail themselves of the right, and so, if they chose, to become electors. But it is said, and it has been said by a very high authority—one for whom I have a great personal regard and respect, although, considering what a high authority he is, I think he sometimes makes, especially with regard to his opponents, very reckless remarks—that the plan of the Government, with which that high authority at the time he said it was really unacquainted, and for which he might have waited, was an assault upon the rights and power of the middle classes. It is certainly not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure which shall make such an assault. Her Majesty's Government are anxious that, on the one hand, the aristocracy, and on the other hand the working classes, shall have their due share in the Parliamentary constitution of the country; but they recognise with sincerity the extreme expediency of the principle that the influence of the middle classes of the country should not be diminished. The Government look to the steady virtues of those classes to exercise a right bias on the constitution of the country, and they believe that the authority which those classes obtained in a great degree under the Act of 1832, has been exercised wisely, worthily, and to the advantage of the country at large. But if there be, by the proposition which I have to make, any chance such as has been intimated by this great authority, why, I think that we meet it by a proposition to institute a franchise founded on a most popular principle, and one of which the middle classes must largely partake—that is, the franchise founded on the payment of direct taxation. We propose that every person in England who pays 20s. a year direct taxation shall possess a vote.

MR. GLADSTONE: Whether he be a compound-householder or not?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Everybody who pays 20s. annually in direct taxation shall have a vote. Thus we build up the constituency which would establish the franchise in the boroughs upon two great principles—the payment of direct taxation, and the payment of rates. But it has been urged that the enjoyment of this franchise, founded upon the payment of direct taxes, is one which would not be enjoyed as intended in a great degree by the class whose influence, it is said, our proposition may assail; that is to say, that most of them are householders, and therefore they would not enjoy this franchise. Therefore we meet that objection by proposing that a person who pays 20s. direct taxation, and who enjoys the franchise which depends upon the payment of direct taxation, if he is also a householder and pays his rates, may exercise his suffrage in respect of both qualifications.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to ask a question very material to the complete understanding of this subject, and that is, whether a compound-householder not paying his own rates, but paying direct taxes to the requisite amount, will have a vote in respect of the payment of direct taxation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: He would, of course, have a vote in respect of the franchise which he enjoys as a payer of direct taxation, and if he chose to pay his rates in addition, then he would have two votes. Now, Sir, before I give to the House a general summary of the result of these franchises upon the borough constituency, there are yet some other franchises with which the House is familiar, but which I again wish to recommend to its consideration. [Mr. ROXBURGH: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain what he means by direct taxation?] I mean the payment of income tax and assessed taxes. But I wish to observe that it will not include the qualification which was so humorously referred to by an hon. Gentleman the other night, because it will not include anything which is paid under licences of any description.

There are other franchises which we also propose. The House is already acquainted with them, and although they are not of vast importance, still I think they are founded upon right principles, and I hope the House will candidly consider them. The vote which we wish to found upon the possession of £50 property in the funds or of £50 in savings banks constitutes property qualifications of this character; that is to say, we will give to small holders of personal property the same privileges which the small holders of real property have, and, as a man possessed of a 40s. freehold has a vote, we think that the person who has an equivalent property of a personal character should also have a vote. We think that by this means a vote would be intrusted to a body of persons belonging chiefly to the working classes, who would exercise the privilege to the advantage of the country. Then there is the educational franchise. It has been said that if you introduce a suffrage founded upon the payment of direct taxation that it would supply means for exercising the vote to those persons who otherwise would have it under the educational franchise. To a certain degree there is truth in that; but having taken some pains to investigate what would be the operation of such a franchise, I am bound to say that there are many persons in whose condition the House would be deeply interested, some of whom would not have any opportunity, either as householders—and this would be peculiarly the case in counties—or as payers of direct taxation, of exercising the suffrage, but who are peculiarly qualified to exercise such a trust. Among others, the position of ministers of religion is very remarkable. I am speaking of ministers of all sects. I find men who entirely devote their lives to solace or to elevate the sense of existence are men who under this franchise would exercise, and I think admirably exercise, a certain degree of political influence, but who, either as householders or as payers of income tax especially to the amount of 20s., would certainly be debarred from the franchise. I therefore trust that the House will allow these three franchises to pass.

I do not think that it is our business to act the part of electioneering agents, and to make estimates, always of a most speculative character, of the number of persons who will vote under the plan we propose. That is not our business as Ministers in Parliament. We are to see who, under the laws of this country, are to have the opportunity of acquiring a vote. And allow me to remind the House of the nature of the arguments which are always used by those who are the promoters of increased suffrage. They are always founded upon the number of the population. But the business of the House of Commons in proposing or in passing laws upon this subject is to ascertain as far as possible the number who will be admitted under the particular measure. They are not to estimate a thing which, after all, can only be done in a speculative manner—the number who may be tempted, in consequence of the passing of the Bill, to register their suffrages. Their business is simply to pass those laws which they think will conduce to the welfare or safety of the country. Well, I say that if this Bill be carried there is not a man, whether he be a ratepayer paying a rental of less than £10, or a compound householder, who may not qualify himself if he choose. In the new boroughs to which I will afterwards advert the estimated number of voters will be 68,000. The number of direct taxpayers who would probably vote in boroughs will be very considerable. The public departments have no means of offering to the House any recent information upon this subject, and it would probably take months to obtain any. Making due allowance, however, for the increased property and assessed taxes—probably at the rate of 23 per cent—since Mr. Macaulay's Returns were made to the House, I should think that the number who would qualify in boroughs would greatly exceed 200,000. [Mr. GLADSTONE: From direct taxes.] Yes, from direct taxes. The educational franchise would in the boroughs give 35,000 voters, the fundholders' franchise 25,000, and the savings bank franchise 45,000. You would thus have more than 1,000,000 voters who could qualify themselves in the boroughs for the exercise of the franchise. It has been said that they will not choose to avail themselves of that great right. I regret to hear that opinion, but I venture to doubt its correctness. But still, whatever may be our opinion, it is the duty of the House so to deal with this question that those whom they believe to be qualified for the exercise of this privilege shall have that opportunity, and the duty of Parliament ceases when that has been accomplished.

I will now proceed to consider the question of the county franchise. We propose that these new suffrages shall be extended to the counties; but in consequence of the great difference which prevails between counties and boroughs, we do not propose, under any circumstances, that any person should exercise the privilege of voting twice. I now come to the consideration of the amount of the occupation in counties. When I last made some observations to the House upon this subject I stated that Her Majesty's Government thought, on the whole, that the county qualification had better be placed at £20 rating. When I made that statement I made it with a feeling on the part of the Government that the opinion of the House of Commons ought to be consulted upon the subject, and because, also, they believed that the House had never had the opportunity of arriving at any decided opinion upon the matter. ["Oh!"] The question was really never put fairly before the House. When the hon. Member for Surrey and others came forward with propositions to reduce the occupation for counties to £10, the House was always asked to consider those propositions in an isolated manner. Now, we thought, and I believe that the House has been long of the same opinion, that this question ought to be considered in conjunction with those of analogous character, and ought not to be treated in an isolated manner. They depend upon each other, and I look upon all those attempts to reduce the county franchise as barren of results, and as a proof of the correctness of that opinion I may remark that they have been barren of consequences. No one ever felt that a satisfactory settlement would be likely to result from those debates. Last year there was an opportunity when the Reform Bill was before the House—when the mind of the House was accustomed to consider in all its details and in all its ramifications the principles of Parliamentary representation—there was, I say, at that time a fair opportunity for discussing this question in a satisfactory manner, and for arriving at a satisfactory settlement. But this subject, always unfortunate, was never more unfortunate than on that occasion, because a great party scene and division took place at the beginning of the evening destined for its discussion. It was brought on in a languid House—["Oh, oh!"]—in a very thin House. ["Oh, oh!" and "Hear, hear!"] It was decided, I grant, in a very full House; but it was discussed in an unsatisfactory and feeble manner. ["Oh, oh!"] My opinion is a perfectly impartial one, for I myself took part in the debate. The division was taken in a full House, and the majority was not only a very slight one, but the question was decided upon a principle which the result of the Session showed was not the conviction of the House of Commons. ["Oh, oh!" and cheers.] Well, if the House of Commons meant anything else, it meant that rating should be the principle of the franchise; and I believe that that decision has been received by the country as one of the soundest at which the House of Commons ever arrived. Well, Sir, we should have been glad if the question had been calmly and completely discussed; and, at whatever opinion the House of Commons had arrived, we should have accepted that opinion as a wise and a sound one. In endeavouring, however, to bring forward a complete measure, and as far as we can to offer a definite and definitive position to the consideration of the House, Her Majesty's Government gave much attention to this question of the county occupation franchise; and, on the whole, they believe that the qualification that would be most advantageous and most satisfactory would be a £15 rating, and that is the amount at which they are determined to fix it. That would qualify 171,000 additional householders for the exercise of the franchise. The savings bank franchise will give 40,000; the fundholders' franchise, 25,000; and the educational franchise, 44,000 voters. A very large number, exceeding 150,000, will vote in virtue of the payment of direct taxes. No doubt many of these would possess double qualifications, but there will still be an addition to the county franchise of upwards of 300,000 voters.

I have now occupied the attention of the House with a subject which I am afraid is at no time entertaining, and which, when the conclusions have been to some extent foregone, must possess less attraction than ever; but I have placed before the House, I hope, with some clearness, the proposal of the Government. There is another part of the subject of very great interest, on which, although to-day I am anxious to touch upon nothing but what is necessary, it is requisite that I should make some observations, and that is the distribution of seats. Now, Sir, that is a question that very greatly interests the public mind; and I know there are Members on both sides of the House who take a very deep interest in it. The proposition which I made upon a previous occasion has been described as quite inadequate to the occasion and to the circumstances in which the country is placed; and we have heard that it is an insufficient response to the demands of the public voice. I am perfectly ready to meet those objections, though I have no desire upon an occasion such as this to invite controversy, for I have no doubt there will be opportunities hereafter for entering upon matters of detail. It is said that there should be a much larger scheme of disfranchisement; that at the very least every town of 10,000 inhabitants or less should lose a Member; and some say we should even go further than that. We are also told that a third Member should be given to many places, and thus, by a process of disfranchisement and cumulative votes, at last a perfect representation of the people would be accomplished. We have given that subject the great consideration which it deserves. My own opinion is that the votaries of this new system are not very numerous in the country, and I doubt whether they are very numerous in this House; but its advocates are no doubt in many cases men of distinguished ability and high character, and persons whose opinions upon any public subject will command and demand attention. But whatever may be the number of those persons who advocate three-cornered constituencies and cumulative voting, there is no doubt that a very great noise has been made by them. I am willing to admit that, as far as the articles and the letters in the newspapers are concerned, the question is settled; but I have always observed that those articles and letters—I do not wish to speak slightly of them, for I have written leading articles for newspapers myself—have one distinguishing characteristic, and that is that they always assume there is only one side of a question; but their writers are wise in their generation, because if they did not act on that assumption nobody at the moment would read their productions. As, then, the question of three-cornered constituencies and cumulative votes has been brought before the consideration of the House, I, and others who are near me, will meet the question frankly and fully. The House will not, I am sure, permit the introduction of any controversial matter upon the present occasion; but it has a right to hear the opinions of the Government upon a question, and therefore I say that, having considered the matter without prejudice, and, having completely and thoroughly tested it at every point and tried it in every quarter, our opinion is that the scheme is erroneous in equity, and would be so in practice. Sir, there are only two courses to follow if you wish to improve the representation of the people by a re-distribution of seats; there is no middle course. You must either create a new electoral map of England, or you must deal practically with the circumstances before you, and follow the line to which I at this moment refer, and which I think the Government has followed. With regard to the proposition that there should be a complete revision of the representative system of the country as far as electoral localities are concerned, if I may be presumed to give advice to the House of Commons, I would say do not make that a question to be settled by a Parliamentary majority, or accepted on the authority of any Ministry whatever. It is a subject too vast and too deep for us to treat of and deal with without preliminary investigation conducted by persons of the highest standing, and character, and experience, and learning in the country. When in possession of the result of their accumulated knowledge and of their mature thought and great experience, a popular assembly might weigh their opinions, and a practical Ministry might embody their Resolutions. There is no other means by which you can deal with this proposition; but if you are not of opinion that the electoral map of England should be re-constructed, then you must proceed prudently and practically; you must inquire what unrepresented places ought, fairly speaking, to be represented, and you ought not to lose the opportunity then offered of giving the teeming multitudes of the counties as far as you can that direct representation which they want, and which indirectly I admit they possess. These are the two practical points which you ought to have before you. There is no medium between dealing with the whole question in a vast and solemn manner by means adequate for the settlement of so great a matter, and the prudent, practical method which I mentioned. Well, Sir, we are not prepared to take the first course, although I do not say it is unworthy of deep and respectful consideration; we therefore propose to follow the second, and we have found towns in this country which we think ought to be represented, and whose representatives would bring fresh vigour to this House. The population of the counties, invigorated and vivified with the new franchises which you are giving it, will demand direct representation in this House, and you ought to move in that direction as far as you can, so that counties may no longer be said to be represented only indirectly by small boroughs. I am of opinion that this may be done without any very serious disturbance of your representative system. Whatever you do, your representation must be fairly distributed over the country; if you give a greater preponderance to one part at the expense of another you create two nations; there will be a want of sympathy and cordiality between the parts, and you will, in fact, be going back to the principles of the Heptarchy. Although I have read the names of the places we propose to enfranchise before, with one exception, I think it becoming to repeat them with the addition of the place that before was wanting. We propose, then, that by the thirty seats that will be obtained by the process of disfranchisement we shall give a representative to Hartlepool, Darlington, Burnley, Staleybridge, St. Helen's, Dewsbury, Barnsley, Middlesbrough, Wednesbury, Croydon, Gravesend, and Torquay, and two to the Tower Hamlets. In respect to the counties, we propose to divide North Lancashire, North Lincolnshire, West Kent, East Surrey, Middlesex, South Staffordshire, and South Devon, and give them two Members each, and, dividing South Lancashire, also, we propose to give it an additional Member. We also propose to give a seat to the London University.

I have placed before the House the principal features of the Bill which I am asking to introduce. The Bill itself will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow, and then they will be perfectly well qualified to form an opinion upon the manner in which the principles I have laid down are acted on. I hope that the House will candidly consider this measure. As far as we are concerned, we have spared no pains, no thought, and have not shrunk from what was more important, perhaps, in endeavouring to bring it before the House. I will not advert unnecessarily to the circumstances attending the framing of this measure which has now been brought before the House of Commons, under very great difficulties and at very great sacrifices. I do not wish to disguise that I have felt great chagrin and great mortification in connection with what has taken place; but I believe I have done my duty, and under the circumstances I do not think I could have done other than I have. In attempting to bring the question to this point we have lost those whose absence from our councils we more than regret; we have had to appeal to a high-spirited party to make what no doubt to some was to a certain extent a sacrifice of principle, much sacrifice of sentiment, and much sacrifice of interest. But we have not appealed in vain, because the Members of that party were animated by the same feeling which influenced us—a sense of duty and conviction; they felt that the time had arrived when this question must be dealt with, and settled extensively and completely. I hope, therefore, the House of Commons will give this measure a fair and candid consideration. We believe it is one which, if adopted in spirit, will settle its long differences; and that it is qualified to meet the requirements of the country. I am told for certain that there are objections against it; but I beg to remind the House of the distinction which we draw between popular privileges and democratic rights. I am told that in this measure there are checks and counterpoises, and that it assumes in this country the existence of classes. If there are checks and counterpoises in our scheme, we live under a Constitution of which we boast that it is a Constitution of checks and counterpoises. If the measure bears some reference to existing classes in this country, why should we conceal from ourselves, or omit from our discussions, the fact that this country is a country of classes, and a country of classes it will ever remain? What we desire to do is to give every one who is worthy of it a fair share in the government of the country by means of the elective franchise; but, at the same time, we have been equally anxious to maintain the character of the House, to make propositions in harmony with the circumstances of the country, to prevent a preponderance of any class, and to give a representation to the nation. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

Moved, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Representation of the People in England and Wales.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. GLADSTONE: In any words, Mr. Speaker, which may fall from me on this occasion, it will be as far as possible from my intention to impugn or question the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he has been acting under difficulties, and that he believes he has done his duty. He has been acting under difficulties; and I, for one, would give him full credit when he says he considers he has done his duty. Neither is it my intention in anything that may fall from me to prejudge the question of what course it may seem right in any Member of this House to take, or what course I, myself, may be compelled to take, in reference to the measure of the right hon. Gentleman. I think that till the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman is in our hands—and he has promised that it will be in our hands to-morrow morning—it is impossible to arrive at any conclusion, or to enter fully into the question with such an amount of knowledge as the gravity of the circumstances demand. But, Sir, having said that, I must frankly state that the impression made on my mind by the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is, in many respects, a perplexed one, and is not on the whole a pleasing one. We commenced the Session with happy and cheerful anticipations. When the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman were produced we waived every question and every difficulty, except only the desire we entertained that a definite meaning should be attached to those Resolutions. When the right hon. Gentleman, acceding very fairly to the general desire expressed by the House, produced the skeleton of a Bill, no difficulty was raised on this side of the House with regard to the principle of that Bill. It never was in print; but the statement which I had the honour to make, and which I know expressed the general feeling on this side of the House, was that from the description given of it by the right hon. Gentleman, I hoped when we saw it in print we might find that—though there might be points—and, perhaps, many and serious points—which should be raised on the provisions of the Bill—yet that those points might fairly be considered in Committee. But though this is the fourth day of our progress—or, if not our progress, of our proceedings—with reference to the Reform question, I am afraid, to use a homely phrase, that the right hon. Gentleman has only “led us still deeper into the wood.” I will now endeavour to state the impression which, in one or two respects, the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to introduce makes on my mind, as far as I understand it, and with due regard to the correction which to-morrow morning will supply. On ordinary occasions, after hearing a statement of this kind from the organ of the Government and the Leader of the House, the course would be to say little; but on the present occasion the circumstances are peculiar. Many of the propositions—the main propositions—of the Bill have obtained so remarkable a publicity, that it has been our duty to apply ourselves, availing ourselves of the information we had obtained, to a consideration of the measure. With the aid of the knowledge we have thus obtained beforehand of the principles of the Bill we have now acquired a more complete—though still an incomplete view of its nature—than we could have had if we had been depending simply on the statement of the Minister. About three days ago a meeting of the more select spirits was held in Downing Street. A portion of the information imparted to that meeting found its way even to us, the mere mob of the House of Commons. ["Oh, oh!"] As my observation is questioned by several hon. Members, I must add to it this remark—that, so far as I know, after an experience of thirty-four years, it is a practice entirely novel for a Minister of the Crown to gather in his house those Members of Parliament who he thinks agree with him, and state to them, days in advance of the House of Commons, the particulars of a great measure which it is his intention to submit to Parliament. I had not intended to make that remark, but I am justified by the circumstances of the case. This is an innovation, and it is an innovation which is not an improvement. I hope, therefore, that there will be much consideration before it is repeated. However much we lacked that advantage, I grant that the privilege accorded to those who assembled in Downing Street was not quite so complete as it might have been, because we likewise had the advantage of a still more singular revelation which had been conveyed two days before to a favoured constituency, which put them and the country in possession, four or five days beforehand, of almost every point of the great and cardinal political measure which was to be submitted to-day to the House of Commons. Thus we have had an opportunity of considering the main provisions of the Bill to some considerable extent; and yet with respect to this most cardinal and vital measure—as I will endeavour to explain—my mind remains up to this moment, after having anxiously endeavoured to catch every word which fell from the right hon. Gentleman, in a state of obscurity and perplexity. In order to narrow the ground, I pass by those propositions which need not now be discussed. The right hon. Gentleman in his final measure proposes in counties a £15 rating franchise, forgetful that he had told us his great object was to proceed on principle, and that every figure was an expedient. I will confess I was amazed and amused at the facility with which the right hon. Gentleman, looking back at two decisions of the House of Commons in Committee last year, arrived at within a few nights of each other—one in favour of rating, and the other in favour of rental as a criterion of the value of the house to which the suffrage should be attached—objected to one of these decisions as merely an insignificant accident, but accepted the other as the deliberate opinion of Parliament. I shall not dwell upon that point; neither shall I now discuss the right hon. Gentleman's plan of re-distribution of seats, further than to say that I think it is inadequate to the circumstances of the case, and to the exigencies of the country. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that there are great difficulties in arriving at a sound scheme of re-distribution. I admit the difficulties of the question; but this is a matter which we may consider hereafter, and which may not unsatisfactorily be dealt with in detail. I stated that as my opinion last Session, when it was in favour of the Government with which I was connected. I still adhere to and stand by it. I pass by also the collateral or by-franchises—the secondary franchises, as they may be called—the 20s. direct taxes franchise, the educational franchise, the £50 fund franchise, and the £50 savings bank franchise—which, by the way, has grown from £30 within the last fortnight. I pass by those franchises with this simple remark:—While I, of course, fully believe in the good faith with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gives us the results which he expects from those several franchises, I must entirely decline to accept his figures. Without questioning the right hon. Gentleman's good faith, I look upon those figures as wholly erroneous and visionary. To speak frankly, I look upon three-fourths of the enormous number of voters whom he paraded in different regiments—as 20s. direct taxes men, educational franchise men, £50 fund men, and £50 savings bank men, who are not enfranchised by any other means—this is not a question of dual voting—as little more than men in buckram. My objection is to the estimate of the right hon. Gentleman. The principle of those votes is open to a great deal of comment, which need not be entered upon on this occasion. The vital point is the borough franchise, and to that I will confine the remarks which I feel called upon to make. The right hon. Gentleman, after a preface in which he dealt in general terms—and, as I thought, in very unexceptionable terms—chiefly on the subject of the British Constitution, has propounded to us to-night a theory which, I confess, is to me wholly novel—that the great security of this venerable Constitution, which has so long been the glory of England and the admiration of the world—if I may borrow those words which are ordinarily used in the speeches at every public dinner throughout the country—really depends upon what the right hon. Gentleman calls the principle of rating. And the right hon. Gentleman says that last summer the House of Commons, by its unerring instinct, and without knowing it, established this great principle of rating. And how did it establish it? How did the House of Commons, then, taking a leap in the dark—to use a phrase much in fashion last year—become so fortunate as to arrive at this blessed result? Why, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman says it was done by adopting the Motion made by my noble Friend the Member for Galway (Lord Dunkellin), the effect of which was that the basis of the franchise was to be found in admitting to the constituencies only men who were rated to the relief of the poor and who paid their rates. These are the two columns of the Constitution, and these two columns were built up on the night when my noble Friend succeeded in defeating the measure of the Government. Well, Sir, I go back to the Motion of my noble Friend the Member for Galway, and I affirm that it had no more to do with either the one or the other of those columns of the Constitution than chalk has to do with cheese. The Motion of the noble Member for Galway simply provided that the pecuniary measure of the franchise should be founded upon rateable value instead of gross estimated rental. It was perfectly indifferent as far as that Motion was concerned, whether a man were rated or not, and whether he paid his rates or not; and under the terms of the Motion of the noble Lord I would undertake to get rid completely of all personal liability to rating and obligation to pay rates. But this is not all. This was distinctly stated in the debate. It was stated by me at the commencement of the debate, and admitted by every speaker who took part in the discussion, and yet the right hon. Gentleman the organ of the Government has now discovered, contrary to the sense of everybody who paid the least attention to the matter in hand, of everybody who had listened to any portion of the speeches delivered that evening—that, in short, the House of Commons was led by an unerring instinct, which it did not understand—which we did not understand—and which, at the time, he did not understand—to make the affirmation that rating was the great principle of the British Constitution. [“Hear, hear!” “No, no!”] I should not, however, have dwelt on this matter if it had had only a retrospective interest; but the truth, Sir, is that this is a very grave question. It is a question which involves a great deal of detail, and upon it depends the entire character of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. He says he is going to enfranchise 237,000 persons who are rated to the relief of the poor and who pay their rates; and he insists upon taking the gross numbers comprised in each class, quite irrespective of the fact that some whom those numbers include are on the register already, that others whom those numbers include cannot possibly get on the register because they have not resided and paid rates for the requisite time; and that others whom those numbers include are absolutely incapacitated for being placed on the register on account of their being habitually excused from the payment of rates in consequence of their poverty. In perfect defiance of all these plain facts, however, the right hon. Gentleman has to-night shown a great taste and faculty for making an army on paper, and to-night accordingly he marches out into the arena these 237,000 men. Now, these include a very considerable number of freemen. They likewise include a very large number of persons who cannot possibly be registered on the account of the frequency of their migration, and on account of their period of residence being too restricted to qualify them. Without entering at this moment into any details, I will venture to say that of these 237,000 men, in point of fact not as many as 140,000, when you have made the necessary deductions, will be added to the register. And those who recollect the difference between the 644,000 male occupiers now upon the list at a value of £10 and upwards, and the 451,000 householders who are actually upon the register, will at once perceive my meaning. However, the enfranchisement of about 140,000 persons who are occupiers under a £10 rental is the whole certain and immediate effect of the plan of the right hon. Gentleman as long as he keeps on the foundation of what he describes as the British Constitution. But I was astounded when the right hon. Gentleman descended from the pedestal of the Constitution on which he had seated himself and dealt with the case of the compound-householder. He said that the compound-householder was, after all, as good a man as anybody else; he might be competent to enjoy the franchise and to fulfil his duties as a voter; but as the owner of the property by paying the rates has deprived him of the position which he would otherwise hold, we will, says the right hon. Gentleman, give the compound-householder every facility. The right hon. Gentleman then boldly proceeded to place upon his list of enfranchised citizens 486,000 persons who do not pay rates, but who come under the description of compound-householders. But, if that is so, where is this great principle of the British Constitution? What is the use of talking about the value of rating and setting forth doctrines like that which the right hon. Gentleman propounds when he talks of the completeness and authenticity of this principle? when he talks of the duties which ratepayers have to discharge and which less fortunate members of the community do not discharge? What is the use of setting up a principle in order to knock it down again? The right hon. Gentleman frankly says he thinks those persons who are not ratepayers just as much entitled to be enfranchised as those who are. ["No, no!"] Several hon. Gentlemen opposite say "No;" but if they will give me a little time I am coming to their method of construing the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. But I have already followed the right hon. Gentleman through two phases of his speech—the first, in which he described the importance and almost the sanctity of the principle of rating as the basis of the British Constitution; and the second, in which he humanely pleaded in defence of the compound-householder, saying that he was as good a man as anybody else, and ought to be placed in as favourable circumstances as anybody else. Now, I will endeavour to make out an approximation to the views of several Gentlemen who do not agree with me as to the proper construction to be put upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. Compound-householders are to have every facility for being registered. ["Hear, hear!"] Well, I should say that the only natural meaning of that term is, that as the names of all the compound-householders are for the most part, and ought to be in every case, entered in the ratebook, the obvious meaning of giving them every facility is that when they are in possession of the necessary qualification they ought to be carried on to the register. That is what I call giving every facility to the compound-householders. But what does the right hon. Gentleman call giving every facility to the compound-householders? He said that they must make their claims, that they must insert their names, and that they must pay their rates. ["Hear, hear!"] I am astonished—I am astounded to hear those cheers. Can Gentlemen have considered the meaning of that manifestation? You say that it is his duty to go and pay to the parish officer the rate which he has already paid in his rent. ["No, no!" from the Ministerial Benches.] You do not say it, then; I am very well pleased at that denial—but what is the meaning of giving them these facilities? I am afraid the meaning of them is this—perhaps it is that the compound-householder is to be fined in the difference between the rate which the landlord is bound to pay under landlord's assessment and that which constitutes the amount he would have to pay if individually rated. But, whether he does that or not, I know very well that unless the right hon. Gentleman will adopt the simple mode of enfranchising compound-householders which he may read in the Bill of last year, there will be two processes at variance with each other—absolutely as different as black from white—in many towns in the country, and dependent solely on the view which the local authorities take of the matter. Did the right hon. Gentleman in the course of his studies on this subject examine the Returns which have been in his hands for a week? Turn to the borough of Lambeth. The right hon. Gentleman will find in that single parish 5,781 compound occupiers on the

Parliamentary register. Let him go on to the parish of St. Giles, Camberwell, and there he will find, at page 152 of the blue book of last year, which I am afraid he has not read as carefully as I have, that 4,921 tenements at and above £10 rental are rated to the owners instead of to the occupiers, and that at present there are only five of such occupiers on the register. And why? Is it because the people of the parish of St. Giles, Camberwell, are sluggish and indifferent about their political privileges, while the people of Lambeth are animated by such a lively fire of patriotism that 5,781 of them have been to the overseer and taken pains to have their names inserted on the register? Or is it because the different processes pursued by the local authorities in different parishes have resulted in placing, in one case five compound-occupiers, and in the other case 5,781 upon the register? Am I to be told, at this time of day, after all the stages this question has passed through, after turning it over and over and over again, after parting with three of your Colleagues [Cries of "Oh!" and cheers]—three of the best of your Colleagues, who were not willing to accept the Bill which you now propose—am I to be told that legislation which affects two-thirds of the whole number of persons below £10 about whose enfranchisement there is a question, is to depend on the pure and simple discretion of the parish officer, and that he is to decide who are to be enfranchised and who are not? When Gentlemen perceive that such is the operation of the proposed system, they will, I think, readily follow me, at any rate, to this conclusion—that the question is one which it is totally impossible for us to leave to the discretion and command of the parochial authorities. Is the right hon. Gentleman going to take it out of their hands—eh? Does he mean that the names of these 5,000 persons shall be put upon the register in the one parish as in the other? If so, let him say so. But it is most important with regard to the view we take that we should know—and the right hon. Gentleman's speech throws no light on this subject whatever, because he has not told us whether these men—indeed, I think he has told us the contrary; I think he has told us that they are to go through some process which is, in fact, call it what you like, neither more nor less than a fine on the labouring classes. ["Oh!" "Hear hear!"] If we say, "You, who by arrangement with your landlords, have nothing to do at present with rates but to pay your rents, which include them, are now to go to one parish officer and claim to be rated, then to another parish officer and see whether any rate be due of which you have no knowledge, and if any be due to tender the amount, and then are liable to be told by the parish officer, as persons were told in a noted case in one of the metropolitan boroughs, 'Now you have made your claim, and as soon as the revising barrister comes in November you may appear and support it' "—if this be the mode which we are to adopt, I tell the right hon. Gentleman that, in my opinion, the mode which he has adopted of applying the principle of rating is a mode that really cannot stand. I do not agree with those who think that the principle of rating is the great bulwark of the Constitution; but I do agree with those who think that if you enfranchise all householders you get into very great difficulties—and I do not perceive that the right hon. Gentleman has made the smallest provision to meet these difficulties—at the lower end of the scale when you come to deal with that class of householder who is usually excused his rates. You then put it in the power of a parish officer, who is a political partizan, and who anticipates that 100 or 500 men are going to vote on the side opposed to his convictions, to allege their poverty and obtain the excuse of their rates, thereby disfranchising these men. There is a cure for that; and what is it? You let in the election agent, who, aware of the politics of the parish officer, and determined not to be behind him, comes with the rates of these 500 men, and in triumph re-instates these bribed and contaminated men. I did expect from the right hon. Gentleman some indications that he had made provision for dealing with this class of cases; but, instead, the right hon. Gentleman went on to make disrespectful remarks upon a plan that is not before the House, a plan for a £5 rating, which he called a Serbonian bog, and which yet, on the only occasion when it was proposed to the House of Commons, in the Bill of Lord Russell, the right hon. Gentleman, if my memory serves me rightly, spoke of not as a Serbonian bog, but in terms of general approbation. The right hon. Gentleman has indicated most guardedly that somebody has got a plan for depriving the persons below a £5 rating of this privilege of paying their rates and so reduc- ing them to a condition of helotism which he thinks is quite intolerable. The right hon. Gentleman does not appear to me to be at all aware of the real history of the laws that have been passed in reference to the personal liability to rating. It is all very well to say that the old principle of the borough franchise was that a man should pay scot and lot. No doubt. But we have contrived to improve, at any rate, the detail of many of our social and economical arrangements; and I take it that in that state of society a very large number of those who paid scot and lot were proprietors of their own houses. But the great mass—almost the entirety of the smaller population of our towns are now tenants, and not proprietors; and for half a century Parliament has been under the conviction that it was much better in the case of those small holdings to deal as to rates with the landlord, and not with the tenant. I am addressing myself to that observation of the right hon. Gentleman, in which he clothed with a kind of mysterious horror the supposition that persons rated below £5 might be relieved from all liability in respect of their rates. But in what light has Parliament regarded this view of the British Constitution? What has it said in the Small Tenements Act?

“Whereas the collection of Poor Rates and Highway Rates assessed upon the Occupiers of Tenements of small annual value is expensive, difficult, and frequently impracticable, it is expedient to make better provision for the rating of such tenements and for the Collection of such Rates, Be it therefore enacted”— that the owner shall be rated instead. This, which is a social reform, the right hon. Gentleman seems to clothe with a kind of horror and dislike, and actually hails the principle as if its application to the small holders of this country were in the nature of a public wrong. I must own that I so far agree with Gentlemen who feel great anxiety on this subject of personal rating, that I should regard it as a fortunate circumstance if the limit of our franchise downwards were to cease at the same point with the personal liability to rates. I think there would be some very great advantages in that arrangement. But is the arrangement you are going to make anything at all like it? I do not mean to say that it is practicable to any very great extent, because I have not the means of obtaining the necessary information; but I believe it is owing entirely to a defect of detail—namely, in the amount of the allowance proposed—that the Small Tenements

Act does not run much more generally through the boroughs. If we are sincere—and I believe we are—in desiring something like fixity, every man must contemplate something like this arrangement; but it is precisely this arrangement which the right hon. Gentleman has selected for his severest condemnation. There are two questions which I wish to submit to the House—the first, what the Bill is now; the second, what it would become if it were to pass into Committee. I will take the second question first—What would become of the Bill if it were passed into Committee. I find that there are three safeguards or securities contemplated by the Bill. The first relates to residence, the second to rating, and the third to dual voting—a phrase which the right hon. Gentleman appeared to me, with a very unerring instinct, to eschew as long as ever he could, and, at last, to pass over with a lightness and delicacy of touch for which I shall be forced to substitute very much coarser handling. Let me look at these securities. The right hon. Gentleman has not adopted the term of the municipal franchise, but an intermediate term of two years; that is to say, he substantially adds a twelvemonth to the term now required for the Parliamentary register. I cannot say, for myself, that I attach the smallest value to that provision. It will operate in reducing the franchise among the people of property and of the upper classes not quite so much as among the lower classes if you consider that an advantage. But I presume it is to apply to all equally, or is there to be one law for persons rated above £10 and another for those rated below £10.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The proposition is the same as in Lord John Russell's Bill. The rights under the existing law will not be interfered with.

MR. GLADSTONE: I presume so. I think that is quite the right way to do it, if it is to be done. I think it proper to preserve existing rights; but, prospectively, I am accurate in saying that the effect of the residence qualification will be to limit in some degree the number of voters. [“Oh!”] Does not the longer term of residence limit the number of electors? At present, however, I merely wish to enter a protest to the extent that it does so. I now come to a question of rating, and here it appears to me that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman is fundamentally and essentially wrong. I can understand that you may remedy, in a certain sense, the evils of that proposition by adopting provisions which will completely nullify it. If you will take the names of the 486,000 compound-householders—I use the term as including those under the Small Tenements Act, although it is not perfectly correct in law to do so—and if you provide that all these names are to go direct upon the register, then you admit the whole question; but it would be much better to get rid of the ratepaying distinction at once, and there is no advantage in adopting a circuitous process for its own sake. I wish to point out the fundamentally incurable part of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, supposing it is intended to be a reality; if it is intended to be a vision and a dream, then the question must be considered from a different point of view. Supposing it to be a reality, there will be found existing in the country laws and practices of many different descriptions, which have the effect, in different modes, of limiting the principle of personal liability. The first of these modes is the adoption of the Small Tenements Act. The ratepayers of a parish, voting with a very high plurality of votes, can, if they think fit, bring it under the operation of the Act, and thereby disfranchise every man who would enjoy the franchise in a direct manner but for the operation of that Act. Assuming the distinction between rating and non-rating is a reality, the first effect of the introduction of the Act is to remove from the register every man who is within its scope—that is, up to £6 rating. Let us apply this to the borough of Leeds. I do not think it possible for a Reform Bill not to add a considerable number to the constituency in that borough; and I congratulate my hon. Friend (Mr. Baines) near me upon the fact. In the borough there are 14,000 ratepayers at £6 and under. Can it be possible that it shall depend upon the will of a vestry—aye, and not of the vestry considered as a popular body, but upon the will, exclusively I may say, of the propertied classes in the parish—whether these 14,000 people are to be enfranchised, or they are not? Again, where the Small Tenements Act has been adopted, it is in the power of the vestry to disallow and expel it. Is that state of things to form a basis for our legislation? In fact, are we to pass a law with respect to the effect of which we are really in the dark; and whether it will establish household suffrage, or not, whether it will double the constituencies or only add to them 100,000 or 120,000 people, depends upon the will of local councils and local officers? I protest against that method of proceeding. If household suffrage is to be established, let it be established honestly, and do not let us leave the wealthier persons in those constituencies to enfranchise or disfranchise at their pleasure, and with reference to circumstances any of them may think fit, this one class of persons, and the most important class of persons affected by the provisions of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. Again, I come back to my point—is that distinction between rated and non-rated persons to be a reality or not? If it is not to be a reality, say so, and do away with the distinction and let us get rid of these unnecessary eulogies on that portion of the Constitution. If it is to be a reality, then do not let us leave it dependent upon the simple will of the local authority what the limits of the constituency are to be. Then there are two other most important points—there are the cases of towns for which special local Acts have been obtained, in which the Small Tenements Act is unknown, and in which these local Acts establish the principle of compounding for rates upon a very large scale. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman is aware that these local Acts establish composition for rates upon the assessment of the landlord up to £10, £12, £15, £20, and, in certain cases in London, practically up to £30 value. I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether a compound-householder paying 20s. in direct taxes is to be permitted to enjoy the second vote—that is to say, the direct tax vote—and he said “Yes.” Certainly, it would be most absurd that he should not, assuming that the direct tax vote is to become the law of the land; but what can be more absurd than this? We recognise his fitness to be made one of the special class who are to be elected, as it were, keepers of the rest of the community by means of this double vote; but he is to be put in a situation of difficulty in respect to his household vote as compared with a man rated at £3 or £4 in towns where there does not happen to be a local Act. Can anything more ludicrous be conceived? In the borough of Thetford the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman will go to establish very close upon universal suffrage; but it is no borough at all—it is like a great number of other boroughs which the right hon. Gentleman finds of use in drawing fancy comparisons between the county and the borough representations. It is a village, or, rather, an assembly of villages constituting a rural district. There is a population of 4,200, of whom 829, or one in five, are male occupiers. That proportion is very close upon universal suffrage, and the same proportion throughout England will give a constituency of nearly 4,000,000—which I imagine will entirely close the mouth of Mr. Beales. That is the way the right hon. Gentleman proposes to deal with the borough of Thetford. An immense proportion of the people there are the mere peasantry of the country—and by that I mean they are unskilled labourers. We have now, I am thankful to say, many highly skilled agricultural labourers; they are an increasing proportion, and, undoubtedly, with the augmented use of agricultural machinery, they must become an augmented proportion. The Bill proposes universal suffrage as far as the borough of Thetford is concerned. There are other examples of these village districts, these groups or clusters of villages—such as Wilton and Westbury—and if you enfranchise the peasantry of these groups and clusters of villages you will have—I will not say in Committee on the Bill, but very soon—to consider whether the peasantry in every village shall not be enfranchised, and whether the principle of population, applied as you apply it in certain cases, not to town populations, but to rural village populations is not to be applied universally to the country? I am not one of those who believe the Constitution of the country is dependent upon the suffrage as absolutely as the Earl of Derby, who spoke the other night of an extended suffrage involving the destruction of the British Constitution. I have a great deal more faith in the British Constitution than to believe that it depends upon rating or upon an exact estimate and the adding of more or less to the constituencies. I believe that we may make many mistakes, and yet the strong good sense and the whole traditions of this country will keep the Constitution on its legs—but that is no reason why we should make mistakes or alter the customary method of our legislation, or why we should establish the new principle of the Bill, as the right hon. Gentleman said the House of Commons did on the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Galway. Before I accede to a franchise which is close upon universal suffrage—equal to it or to manhood residential suffrage—in those rural districts where there is no Small Tenements Act in operation, I should like to ask myself first of all whether I am prepared to endure the application of the principle to all the county constituencies of the country. Nothing can be more preposterous than that you should say to a peasant, or common hodman, or day labourer, earning 1s. 6d. or 2s. a day, in a town where there is no composition in force, “You shall have your franchise for nothing and be put on the register without knowing it;” while in great communities such as the vast parishes and boroughs of London, and many other towns of the country, you absolutely fine in time, or money, or both, the compound-householder who, at the same time, is a man whose perfect competence you propose to recompense by putting into his hand this dual vote which is given for the payment of direct taxes. The second of these safeguards, personal rating, as the right hon. Gentleman proposes it, I venture to predict is doomed. It may be possible to make personal rating a condition of the suffrage—the right hon. Gentleman has condemned the plan by which, perhaps, it might be done—but personal rating is a practical condition of the suffrage, while it is regulated partly by pure accident, partly by the will of the local or parochial authority, and partly by the activity of political agents, and through a liberal use of a candidate’s purse cannot be embodied in an Act to amend the representation of the people. Then comes the duality of the right hon. Gentleman; and here alone he was moderate in the computation of his numbers. He did not venture upon a higher figure than 200,000, although he left, I admit, a broad margin beyond. The right hon. Gentleman knows very well—he must know—that there must be many more than 200,000 of these dual votes. And here I am bound to make a complaint against Her Majesty’s Government. Last year, to the best of our ability, we laboured and spent hours and days, with the best aid we could obtain, to throw into the best form we could devise the best information that our opportunities would allow us to obtain, in order to place full information before the House; and yet we were only proposing a homely measure of a character which might easily occur to any person, without digging beneath the surface, and elaborating refined and philosophical systems like that of the right hon. Gentleman. Now, the right hon. Gentleman comes forward with his proposition relating to dual voting—of all new-fangled schemes the most new-fangled—of all innovations the most innovating—and he does not condescend to lay upon the table any computation of the number of the dual votes so to be created—votes which are to be put, I must say, as arms into the hands of one part of the community against the other. The right hon. Gentleman does not condescend to supply, although he has been so long thinking about it—ever since Lord Derby wrote to him in the autumn to say that the question ought to be dealt with, and that with no niggard hand—he has not supplied us with a rag of information, except his statement that he supposes the number of voters must be much beyond 200,000? How much? Is it 300,000? Is it 400,000? Is it 500,000? No reply. I am bound to say that I do not suffer so much from the want of reply as might be supposed. To this dual vote, from this moment, be the numbers great or small, I, for one, record an implacable hostility. We have used the language of reserve long enough; we would gladly observe it still [“Oh, oh!” and cheers] if the proposition of the Government were such as to make it compatible with the fulfilment of public obligation. But I have enough faith in the British spirit and honour—even of those Gentlemen who gave me that sarcastic cheer—to believe that I should ill indeed study the mode of access to their good graces if, entertaining those opinions, I were to speak of the proposals of the Government in less unmeasured terms. Why, this dual vote is, in the first place, a gigantic engine of fraud. It is an engine of fraud that nothing could control. I do believe that the right hon. Gentleman might, if he had taken pains, have in some degree avoided the pitfall. He might, for instance, have confined the dual vote to payment of the house tax. If he had done so, he would still have been liable to this difficulty—that many persons, to serve the purpose of political parties, might come forward and get themselves assessed to the house tax in respect of houses of less than £20 value. He might have proposed that every man should not only pay house tax, but every other payment for poor rates, highway rates, &c., on the same scale, and that would have been a considerable check on this kind of corruption. But when the right hon. Gentleman proposes a franchise not only for income tax, but for assessed taxes, I declare, and I will show—and not I alone, but all who take the pains to consider the subject—that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is simply equivalent to a proclamation to every man with a purse in his pocket that he may make votes on any scale he pleases for 20s. a year. A man who chooses to dab a little hair powder on his head is liable to pay 23s. a year. A man who chooses to pay the servants' tax may have the vote. A man who chooses to hand about, not the body, but the property of a miserable three-legged jade may qualify 365 persons with a single horse that may not perhaps have cost him £3. Then, take the income tax. Well, in a certain borough where 100 votes are important to be had, that number of persons may sign a requisition to the surveyor of taxes, saying, “You have not assessed us to the income tax?” The surveyor of taxes has no option in the matter—at least, I presume you are not about to put before him the duty of ascertaining whether these persons are liable to be assessed, although it would be quite as rational as some of the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman. Still, it is not included in the present scheme. Well, 100 schedules go to the man who brings the complaint, and who is, of course, the agent of one of the political parties. He fills up the 100 schedules of Schedule D. He writes the words, “Turkish Guaranteed Stock,” or something of that kind. He has them signed by the parties, the operation is complete, and a vote is made in respect of every one of these schedules. I believe it would be absolutely impossible to prevent wholesale fraud in the manufacture of these votes. But, then, the right hon. Gentleman may say—he is merciless in making the past errors of men suit his present purpose—that we proposed it in 1854. That is quite true; but with what exact provision we coupled the proposition I do not now recollect. It wore in our eyes an appearance then which it still wears in the eyes of the right hon. Gentleman—for he will not suppose I impute to him—as I do not—that he deliberately wishes to bring about this great system of fraud. After we had contemplated it we saw what it would come to, and we did not propose it either in 1860 or 1866. We rejected it then, and it is therefore no wonder that we are ready to criticize it now. But, besides being a gigantic engine of fraud, this dual vote is a good deal more. It is a proclamation of a war of classes. It is the first measure in the war of classes. Talk of the British Constitution! The author of this dual vote is the man who strikes at the British Constitution. That British Constitution rests, and has rested from time immemorial, upon the mutual good-will, respect, and good feeling of the people—upon the equality which they enjoy before the eye of the law—upon the manner in which they meet in their public assemblies as men and citizens, and enjoying equal privileges in that capacity. But the day you place in the hands of the rich man, under the notion of fortifying his position, this weapon to use against his poorer fellow-countrymen—that day you seal the doom of the old British Constitution—that day you sow dissensions that never can abate—that day you destroy the confidence that unites all classes of the community—that day, if you could pass this law, if you could promulgate it tomorrow as an Act of Parliament in the terms in which the right hon. Gentleman has proposed it, you would light up a flame the most dangerous and formidable that ever menaced the safety of a State. Entertaining these opinions, there are certain questions still in reserve. I still wait to see the proposals by which this sacred principle of rating is to be applied, and whether it is to be applied in a limited manner, or whether the whole of the 700,000 are to be enfranchised. But I must observe that there is one extraordinary omission in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman, in an admirable passage, which I promise to look out and quote in some future debate, laid down the principle of the lodger franchise. I am ashamed to tread the ground which has been trodden by the right hon. Gentleman, and I should be sorry to spoil the effect by an imperfect description. But the substance of what he says is that the existence of a class of lodgers is a necessity of our modern civilization, and that you have in your great towns, and especially in London, owing to the extremely high cost of space, and consequently the high rate of rent, a vast multitude of men living as lodgers, who in other towns of the country, in the very same condition, with the same character, capacity, and willingness to pay rates—that being the fourth of the cardinal virtues—are householders; you have those men in London in tens, twenties, and fifties of thousands. And yet those men the right hon. Gentleman passes by, and no provision is made for them, except the provision with regard to the savings banks. I never heard myself that lodgers were a class particularly given to putting their money into the savings bank. If they are, it shows they are very fit for the franchise, and I should like to enfranchise them on that account. But the savings bank franchise will do no more for lodgers than for other men, and, unfortunately, a very small proportion of those who are skilled artisans in London are to be found among the savings banks depositors. What I find, then, is this. I find that the safeguard of long residence—I use the word conventionally—is practically of small account. I find that the safeguard of the liability to pay rates cannot possibly be accepted by this House after it has become aware of the nature and operation of the laws with respect to rating in this country. And I say this, expressly guarding myself against being supposed to undervalue the advantage that may belong to a franchise which terminates at the point where the payment of rates terminates. Well, I presume that these limitations must go; that the dual vote must go; the right hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that the dual vote is dead already. The right hon. Gentleman required to muster and pluck up his courage well in order to speak to the House of that; for it certainly was a great effort for a man to propose to the House of Commons that which he must know in his own mind is as completely gone as if it had been a proposal of the times of Lord Strafford and Charles I. Well, then, with the dual franchise gone, there is the lodger franchise coming; and behind the lodger franchise is the broad consequence that must follow, as affecting the county constituencies, of the enfranchisement of the peasantry. That is the form which, in the natural course of things after a long time, perhaps, and not during the present Session, the Bill would assume if it got into Committee. That is a very extensive change; it may be that this measure does not contain provision for it; but, as far as one can at present construe it; it looks as if it would assume that shape. I am convinced that these safeguards must go, and I am confident that a lodger franchise must come in. I do not hesitate to say I think it is generous on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to offer such a measure as I suppose to Gentlemen on this side of the House. Its operation on that scale would, no doubt, be highly favourable to them ; and if the object of the right hon. Gentleman be to confer on them increased power, and increased numbers in the boroughs of the country, I do not say it is for them to quarrel with it. But, Sir, there are other interests than the interests of party involved. I have not said a word since we quitted office in defence of the principle on which we proceeded last year ; but the right hon. Gentlemen stated that last year we proceeded, not on a principle, but "avowedly on an expedient." He may, indeed, have thought it, and may call it an expedient, but assuredly it was not "avowedly" an expedient. We called it, because we believed it to be, a principle ; and our principle was this—the enfranchisement of the skilled labour of the country. We have heard much from the other side and elsewhere about the value of the principle of selection, and the last testimony to the value of that principle which I saw was a remarkable letter from the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Conservative working men of Huddersfield, in which he said that the best portion of the working classes ought to be admitted to the franchise. Sir, I certainly shall be not a little curious to hear from the noble Lord the reasons which have induced him to come down to this House and offer us a Bill drawn in contempt of the principle he thus recommended—a Bill which utterly excludes all principle of selection, which excludes a vast number of the most skilled and most instructed of our working men, and which, where it admits any of them, admits along with them the poorest, the least instructed, and the most dependent members of the community. Having regard to the extreme gravity of the case, it would be too much for me to presume now to decide what would be the practical effect of so large a measure as this Bill if these pretended safeguards—I do not mean to say that the Government do not believe in their sufficiency—but if these fall away, the proposition certainly requires some consideration before I, for one, could make up my mind upon it. With regard to the proposition in its limited form, with this distinction between rating and rental, and the shutting out of men because their houses are compounded for, owing to their residence in particular parishes and towns which have availed themselves of a great social improvement adopted by Parliament with all its might some fifty years ago—to that I am utterly and resolutely opposed. With respect, then, to the plan and proposals of the right hon. Gentleman, I think a more particular knowledge is requisite to enable us to judge in what manner they ought to be dealt with as a whole. To many of them, and especially to that most important one relating to dual voting, I am inflexibly opposed ; and I confess I think it quite impossible, under any circumstances, that any proposal like that, or one conceived in such a spirit, can obtain the sanction of this House.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE : Sir, on the occasion of the introduction of so important a Bill by the Government it is far from my intention to go into any lengthened discussion of the subject, or to presume to give an opinion on many of the questions which it raises. But I feel it quite necessary to say a few words, especially on account of some remarks which have fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman, at the close of his speech, mentioned the difficulties with which he had been surrounded in preparing and bringing forward the measure, and he said at last that he had to bring it before the party with whom he acted, and that, although with great difficulty on the part of many of them on the grounds he had stated, it had been on the whole accepted. I feel it necessary on my own behalf to guard myself against being supposed to be one of those who have already given any assent to the measure. I must reserve to myself the right when the next stages of the Bill shall have come to take such course as I may think proper, without reference to any political connections. And I am bound to say that my present impression of the Bill is not favourable. I have endeavoured to look at it from both points of view—from the point of view which I myself, as a Conservative, naturally desire to regard such questions—namely, with a desire to uphold the balance of our Constitution in order and stability. I have endeavoured also to look upon it from the point of view from which hon. Gentlemen opposite may be expected to look at it, and I must confess that it seems to me with a remarkable infelicity to combine objections which have weighed with both sides of the House. Having guarded myself so far, and having claimed for myself the right, on the second reading of the Bill, or whenever any question may arise, to take my own course in the matter, I will not intrude longer on the attention of the House. I will only venture to say that I am not so singular in my opinion as the right hon. Gentleman seems to imagine.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: Sir, I do not intend to lengthen the discussion by following the example set by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. The right hon. Gentleman stated at the commencement of his speech, as I thought very justly, that the time to discuss the details of the Bill will be when it is in the hands of Members, and when they can clearly see what its provisions are. I think that a very judicious course, because it is utterly impossible, even with the ability of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to give a perfectly clear view of so difficult and so complex a matter in the course of his speech, to which we have listened with so much attention. But what did the right hon. Member for South Lancashire do after making that declaration? He made a speech than which, in the whole course of my experience, I never heard anything more ingenious or more telling as a party speech, more captious, more bitter, or more sarcastic. That was the character of his speech. I do not want to go into any details; but I must mention one or two points in his speech in which he illustrated the character of the Bill. He expended all his art of irony on the rating franchise. He denied what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said with great justice that this House did last Session affirm the principle of rating. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Only in boroughs.] I mean in boroughs. The vote that caused the fall of the late Government involved the rating franchise. And what did the Chancellor of the Exchequer say? He said that the principle was affirmed; but that when they came to the application of that principle, the Government found they could not conjoin it with—and accordingly they carried it out without adding it to a value franchise. That might be a fair question for consideration in Committee. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire spoke rather rashly when he condemned the principle that the men to be intrusted with the franchise are those who bear the public burdens. That is not a new principle. It is a very old principle. If the right hon. Gentleman looked to the proceedings of a Committee—well known to all constitutional writers—presided over by Serjeant Glanville 200 years ago, he would find the different franchises and different rights of voting were fully discussed; and that if any one thing came out more clearly than another before that Committee it was that, according to the ancient common law of England, the men who sustained local burdens and paid local taxes were the men who were entitled to the franchise. That is the class of men who serve on juries, filled parish offices of all kinds, and voted for municipal purposes. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire again ridiculed the principle laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the compound-householders are to have means given them of placing their names on the rate book, and of acquiring the franchise which is attached to rating. The right hon. Gentleman says it would depend to a great extent on the parochial officers whether a man should be on the rate book at all, and that the election agent might pay the rate and so bribe the voter who would thus have a vote. But that applied in some degree to the existing law; because a man at present cannot vote unless his rate is paid. We all know what the ratepaying clause is. A man must pay the rate to have a vote; and if the rate is paid by the landlord the tenant does not have a vote. The right hon. Gentleman assumes that the compound-householder would not have the power to be put on the rate book as proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but that is not a fair argument, for the right hon. Gentleman has not yet seen the Bill, and we do not know what provisions it contains for the purpose of enabling the compound-householder to put his name upon the rate book; and yet, without knowing what the fact is, the right hon. Gentleman assumes that this is to be a source of fraud. I ask him to wait until he sees the Bill and finds out what are its provisions. ["Question!"] But I will not go into further details, for I see that hon. Gentlemen behind me do not like them. However, I will promise to go into them at another time, whether hon. Gentlemen like it or not. One strong conviction has forced itself upon my mind during the speech of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, and that is, that all Reform is impossible. ["No, no!"] I will tell you why. The moment a Reform Bill is brought in by one set of Ministers it is sure to be carped at by the set they have supplanted. They say either that it goes too far, or else that it does not go far enough. It has been thought by most people of late that the Government

were going too far in the direction of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), and it has been a common thing to hear it said at the clubs and elsewhere, "Why, the Government are going to take the wind out of the sails of Mr. Gladstone." But we now find that the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, instead of approving of the course taken by the Government as promising a great advance in Reform, turns round calmly and tells the Government that they have done nothing. I am not going to enter now into the question of the duality of votes beyond stating my own conviction that dual voting will not do. When I heard such an ingenious and bitter speech made against Reform, or against a very extensive measure of Reform—a measure so extensive that it alarmed a great number of the Conservative party themselves—and when I saw the great advocate of Reform making such a speech, I must say I came to the conclusion that Reform is impossible. But notwithstanding my objection to the proposal of dual voting, I must admit I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has acquitted himself with ability of a very difficult task—a task so difficult that I believe it will be impossible to accomplish. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has undertaken to bring in a Bill which will satisfy all parties, and unless it does satisfy all parties, or, at all events, a very large proportion of them, it cannot pass this House of Commons. It has struck me that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in undertaking this, stands very much in the position of a person who, some years ago, advertised all over London that at a particular theatre on a particular night he would get into a quart bottle. Of course, crowds of people went to see so strange a sight; and there they found the man upon the stage, and there they found the quart bottle; but when they called upon him to get into it he said, "Gentlemen, were you such fools as to come here with the expectation that I should perform a sheer impossibility?" Now, it strikes me that we have come here to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer get into a quart bottle, and I must say I am not disappointed to find he cannot do it. I never believed he could. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire, in the course of his speech, said, "We are all of us sincere." Well, I do not know—some of us may be sincere, but I should like to see the sincere man. I should like the man who is sincere to step out before the Mace, for I am sure we should all like to have a good look at him. The fact is, there is but very little sincerity in the whole matter. What have we seen all along? Meetings have been held in different parts of the country, represented in the papers on one side as great successes, and in the papers on the other as failures. I was passing on Saturday through Trafalgar Square when I saw one of these great Reform demonstrations represented in some of the papers of that morning as a great political event. But what was the real fact? I saw 150 people assembled together in the middle of the Square, and Mr. Potter, mounted between two of the British lions, was making a speech to them. The greater part of the people were laughing at him, and I heard a good many people saying, as they looked up at him, "What a damned fool!" Some time previous to that I went to the windows of a club house to see what was called "a great Reform demonstration," and I saw a great number of zealous democrats, some of them on horseback, profusely decorated with stars and ribbons, evidently in imitation of the aristocracy. Some were Knights of the Garter; some Knights of the Bath; and of course they presented a magnificent array. One man held a telescope, with which he appeared to be looking at a representation of the moon; but whether or not that was intended to symbolize the presence of a considerable number of lunatics in the procession I cannot say. There was no sincerity there, however. They were all people going out for a day's holiday. And yet it is upon these demonstrations—than which nothing more hollow and absurd can be imagined—that the violent cry for Reform is demanded. I do not myself deny that there are many unenfranchised persons in this country who might be advantageously intrusted with the franchise; but that is quite another question, which I am ready to consider calmly and dispassionately. But when I find Reform made, as it is, the stalking-horse of party; when I find a determined effort made to get one party out of office and another party in; when I find that the party out of office are zealous for Reform, but not so zealous for Reform as they are zealous to turn out the other party, then I say that Reform wears very much the appearance of a delusion and a sham; and that until people come to look upon it practically, and as men of business, it is impossible to settle it. But people have gone on saying that "the question must be settled," until a great many, though not all, have come to believe it. The real truth is, it is a question which might as well be settled two years hence as now; but when it is settled it must not be approached with any party feeling, but sensibly, as a matter of business, having regard to the interests of the people, and to the admission within the constitution of those persons who ought to be, and who may be, admitted with advantage. There is only one further question upon which I wish to touch, and that is with regard to the redistribution of seats. It seems to have been assumed all along that it is impossible to give representation to all those places which are entitled to it without taking it from those who now have it; but I do not see that myself. I object to the policy which has been adopted on this part of the question of robbing Peter to pay Paul. Because twenty or thirty places require representation, I do not see that you should, therefore, take twenty or thirty Members away from other places. I say nothing of the places disfranchised for bribery—from those places it is quite right to take away their representation in order to give it to others. There is no principle of the Constitution, or of common sense, which restricts the number of the Members of this House. If you want more representation, have additional Members; but do not take away the representation from those places which have it. I am told that there would not be room for any additional Members in this House; but as to that surely we are as bad off now as we possibly can be. I believe that an addition of twenty or thirty Members would produce no perceptible increase of inconvenience in the House; and I hope, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government, if they should think it right—as I believe it is—to give representation to several places which are now unrepresented, will consider the expediency of adding to the number of Members returned to this House.

MR. THOMAS BARING: I believe it would be presumptuous upon my part to prolong this discussion; and I shall not attempt to imitate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), who began by stating that he should reserve himself for the second reading of the Bill, and yet, with an imperfect knowledge of what the measure may contain, pronounced an opinion upon it, and pledged himself to oppose it.

Sir George Bowyer

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood me. I said I required time to consider what course should be taken with respect to the Bill. I only pledged myself against dual voting.

MR. THOMAS BARING: I think this is a very important measure, and one that ought not to be adopted without the most deliberate consideration. I confess that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while he was anxious to bring that question to a satisfactory settlement, has not left my mind free from doubt—first, whether this would be a settlement at all; and secondly, whether it would be satisfactory. The Government in one of their Resolutions lay down the doctrine that no measure would be satisfactory which would give to any one class or interest a preponderating power over the rest of the community, and that such a preponderance would be opposed to the Constitution. But the figures and statements upon this subject seem to me so doubtful that every one of us would have to grope a little in the dark between this time and the next occasion when the measure comes before the House in determining what course ought to be pursued. But there is one question, I think, which the Government are bound to answer before any further step shall be taken, and that is—to what extent will they adhere to those franchises which are offered as safeguards of the extended suffrage? As I listened to the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, I gathered that there was no chance of those safeguards being adopted. If I understood the right hon. Gentleman aright, he considered that any franchise which would depend upon property would only breed discontent throughout the country; and therefore I may fairly ask the Government, before any further step is taken, expressly to state what portions of those proposals they regard as integral parts of their measure, what portions they will stand by, and what portions they will be prepared to give up. I wish to see the question settled; but I am sure it can only be settled with great difficulty, as every successive measure brought forward only appears to embitter feeling, to produce disturbance in the country, and to leave the common sense of the people at a loss to decide what any one in this House means, because no two of us seem to agree as to what ought to be done.

MR. LOWE: There are a great many Gentlemen in this House who have contemplated this household suffrage with very considerable apprehension, and yet find themselves almost irresistibly attracted towards it, because they believe they find in it a new principle, going lower, perhaps, than they would themselves like to go, but still giving them something that will afford rest and tranquillity after the storms of the last fifteen years—something where they may touch ground—something so low that they cannot fall lower. Now, I wish to submit to these Gentlemen one or two considerations which occur to me for the purpose of showing them that although this is, I admit, a very natural, it is not an accurate view of that which is commonly known under the name of household suffrage, or which, as now before us, may perhaps be more properly called rating suffrage. In the first place, there is no new principle in this household suffrage. Hon. Gentlemen may consider that this sounds like a paradox; but it is an undoubted fact that we have got household suffrage already—that the present borough franchise is household suffrage, limited to houses of the yearly value of £10; and when you have got household suffrage in a wider sense you have only got the same genus, although perhaps a different species of it. The foundation of the borough franchise is now household suffrage, and it will remain so if this Bill of the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be carried into law. The difference is not in the nature of the thing, but in the kind of safeguard applied to it. The present safeguard is the £10 rental, and the safeguard of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a certain amount of residence, whatever that may be, and personal rating to the relief of the poor and personal liability for the payment of the rate. The question we have now to consider is whether the new safeguards supplied by the Chancellor of the Exchequer are superior to the old safeguards. For the moment I waive the question of the actual effect of the measure—I deem it prudent to delay pronouncing any opinion on it until we have had the opportunity of seeing the clauses of the Bill; but what I want hon. Gentlemen to consider, and to consider most carefully, is whether the safeguards that would be afforded by this Bill, or by any Bill of the kind, exceed in validity and trustworthiness the safeguards which we already possess; whether we have really found in this rating suffrage that safe holding—that sure anchoring ground—on which we might rely to hold us fast against the storms of democracy. That is a question which, I think, it is not inopportune to consider at the present moment; and upon that subject I wish to point out to the House as well as to the country the number of things they must assume before they can satisfy themselves that they have got any additional security, or even a security as good as that under the proposed measure. At present the security is a feeble and a frail one; it is merely a figure which may be altered; it is easy to substitute one figure for another. It is said that there is no principle in a figure, but that when we get a rating suffrage we then substitute a principle in place of a figure in respect to the suffrage. Is that so? Look at the first safeguard—personal rating. If that goes, everything is gone. You descend at once simply to household suffrage, or nearly so. Now, what security have you for the continuance of personal rating. With respect to a franchise of a £10 rental or a £6 rental, the people within the franchise are general content, and the people discontented are those who are excluded. But when you establish personal rating as the foundation of the franchise it is those within the suffrage who will feel vexation and annoyance, and be hostile to it; and this will be found to be the case the more especially the lower you go, because the burden of these rates and taxes increases enormously in proportion as you descend to the poorer strata of the population. It is sometimes very difficult for them to find the money at the proper time; their habits are not so regular or business-like as those of the upper classes, and they are liable to make mistakes:—and even when they have the money they are apt not to pay it. Thus a considerable number of persons would be disfranchised by the ratepaying clauses, though in substance they might actually satisfy the demands of the franchise. I am not speaking against the rating franchise; I am only putting before you the reasons which will make the lower strata of society hostile to this particular restriction, and which will lead them to make it their business when a Member comes to his constituency for re-election to pledge him to get these clauses repealed. We have seen a good deal of the £10 voter, but he may be said to be an opulent man compared to a person living in a hovel of the annual value of £4 or £5; and when the pressure is put by voters of this class the candidates will yield to it. It will be like the pledges given by Members for Reforms, which they hoped they might never be called upon to redeem. That is one very strong reason why this should be considered a less stable provision than the present security, which depends upon a particular amount of rental. Look at the case practically. See how these provisions are got rid of. The 7th clause of the Small Tenements Act dispenses with the payment of rates altogether, and gives the franchise for municipal purposes to every compound householder. By the Reform Act of 1832 a voter is allowed to come forward and pay his rates; but those ratepaying clauses have been attacked almost from the passing of the Act. And, again, look at the state of opinion upon the subject. The Government brought in a Bill last year lowering the franchise to £7; but in that Bill the ratepaying provisions were abolished, and the then Chancellor of the Exchequer argued most emphatically against the rating principle, and he based his argument not merely on grounds having reference to a £7 franchise, but on the propriety of the proceeding altogether, as any one will see who turns to pages 36-38 of the right hon. Gentleman's speeches. Well, Sir, this is the main security—a security which has been condemned by a great party, by a Government of great ability, and by a Gentleman who has been, and probably will again be, the Leader of a Government in this House. This is the sort of security on which hon. Gentlemen rely, thinking they have touched ground which is perfectly safe, and than which they can go no lower. But let us go a little further. The Government believe—and this is only a specimen of what must be the case with all measures framed on such a reliance—that they will give the opportunity of obtaining the franchise to a vast number of people who will not avail themselves of it, and their measure is conceived in that faith and belief:—I think, indeed—though, of course, I do not expect them to admit it—that nobody would be more disappointed than themselves if their measure should actually have anything like the enfranchising efficacy of which it is apparently capable. The question really turns—and we must look it in the face—on the compound-householders. If the compound-householders are to have votes you might as well, as it appears to me, give up your machinery of rating altogether and take the simple occupation of a house, or of anything that can be called a house, as your foundation. If they are not to have votes, why, then, I apprehend, you make a change which, though in some respects different, does not differ very widely from a £6 rating franchise. It is a comparatively small change. It is all-important, therefore, to know which of the two it is to be, and whether under the existing state of the law, or by what is proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, the compound-householder will be kept out or not. Now, how does the law stand on that subject? It stands in this way—that every vestry is permitted to adopt, and is permitted again to repudiate the Small Tenements Act; and under that Act it is compulsory on those who frame the rates to rate the landlord on behalf of the tenant's occupation when that occupation is £6 or under £6. As long, therefore, as that law is enforced the compound-householder is virtually disfranchised—he is practically struck out. That is the way in which the law stands at present; and the Act has been enforced in some boroughs wholly or partially, and in others it is not enforced at all. Well, I want to know what security you have that these classes will remain compound-householders and will remain disfranchised. I am not speaking of what is right or wrong about the matter, for some will think they should be enfranchised, and others will think they should not; but I ask those who rely on this as a safeguard—as something they cannot go below—what security that state of the law gives that compound-householders may not have votes? Why, it is simply as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) pointed out, a security which depends upon the will of the parish vestry. A parish vestry may, by adopting this Act, disfranchise an enormous number of voters. They may, by repudiating the Act, a majority of two-thirds being required, enfranchise them again, and, without the occupiers having any choice whether they will be enfranchised or not, it will be the duty of the parish officers to place their names on the rate-book. They will become voters without any act whatever of their own, and that having been done the vestry may again change their minds and re-disfranchise them. Of course I am speaking, subject to correction, from what the Bill may show us to-morrow—but that, as far as I could gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is the state in which the law will be left by the Bill; that is to say, the House of Commons, setting itself to work to make a vast change in the constitution of this country, delegates the quantum of that change to the varying decisions of parish vestries. Is that, let me ask, a proper state of matters? And here I must use the same argument as I used with regard to the other point—namely, that my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, in the same speech, and in the same pages as those to which I referred just now, has emphatically denounced the notion of disfranchising the compound-householder. He says, and says with truth, that the compound-householder pays the rate indirectly, because he pays it to his landlord, and the landlord, receiving an abatement of one-fourth, pays it over to the collector. It is a mere matter of convenience in the collection, the landlord being made a sort of sub-collector; and my right hon. Friend emphatically condemned the present state of the law, and as far as his Bill touched the question he proposed to abolish it. Again, therefore, I ask, where is your security? Here you have a rule which upon the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is utterly indefensible, on the ground of payment of rates, because it is a mere subterfuge to say that compound-householders do not pay rates; they do pay rates, but in a different way from the ordinary way, and this is done merely for the convenience of those who have to collect them. Nobody will suspect me of wishing to enfranchise them—I think there are other and excellent reasons why they should not have votes; but the reason given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that they do not pay rates, is utterly indefensible. Well, these are your foundations; it is this quicksand—this quagmire—on which hon. Gentlemen have been led to believe, by a little confusion of language and ideas, that they can find rest for the sole of their feet, and that having sunk so far they can sink no further. This, Sir, is what I wished to put before the House. But let me add one word more. References have been made to the municipal franchise. The franchise which the right hon. Gentleman is going to create is not the same as the municipal franchise. It differs in this respect—the municipal franchise is for other things besides houses in which people reside, for it includes warehouses, shops, and so forth; and it also differs from it in this, that the compound-householder possesses as a matter of right a vote in municipal elections. Now, does it not strike hon. Gentlemen—those to whom I am addressing my argument—only a limited section of the House I am aware—does it not strike them very forcibly that people will be apt to think it very invidious, having gone so far, to have in the same borough two different franchises both professing to be based on household suffrage, one for the municipal and the other for the Parliamentary qualification? Do you think that this is the solid granite which you have reached; that this descent to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman will support you, and that it will not slide off into the lower depth of the municipal franchise—if it even rests there? I think, by the way, it would be more satisfactory—at all events to me, in attempting to grope my way by such light as experience can afford—to have a little information about the working of the municipal franchise. That, however, is beside my argument. The argument I address to hon. Gentlemen is this—that I believe there never was a greater mistake than to suppose that such a proposal as that made to-night, or anything similar to it, really comprises in it any elements of stability or permanence whatever. It is not a point to which you can honestly go by surrendering your individual opinions in the belief that it gives you any security against going lower still. On the contrary, I believe it is more slippery ground than we stand on already, and that whatever may be the demerits of the present system, you are safer to rest on it than on the personal payment of rates and the power which is given to compound-householders. A suggestion was thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, which appears to me well worthy of the consideration of the House. I cannot say, indeed, that I received it with pleasure; but, circumstanced as we are, it may be well worthy of the consideration of the House whether, instead of going into these clap-trap schemes, by which you give a good deal with one hand and take it away with the other—assuming to give rights in the hope and belief that they will never be exercised—we should not honestly adopt the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion, and see if we cannot frame a measure on the principle which he shadowed forth—that is, of making the franchise reach that point where it is found convenient to collect the rates from the landlord rather than from the tenant. That seemed to me a little ray of light in the midst of all this darkness. Sir, I have one word more to say on a subject which I cannot pass by in silence, and I should like to reiterate the question asked by the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Thomas Baring.) The right hon. Gentleman on the 25th of February proposed to us a Reform Bill, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department was asked whether the Government would resign if they were beaten on any part of it. In reply, the right hon. Gentleman said that they would certainly not submit to a defeat on any vital point, and that what was a vital point they reserved to themselves. Well, Sir, they were not long in putting their resolution to the test, because the next day they withdrew the scheme altogether; and, therefore, I suppose there was no vital point in it at all. But I think that, on the present occasion, it is only fair—fair to their own party especially, to Gentlemen of their own party who really have convictions, and who do not change them from year to year—I think it is only fair to them that some Member of the Government—my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, for instance, who is a connoisseur in vital points—should tell us what are the vital points of this Bill. I should excessively like to know whether duality is a vital point. I think we ought to be informed on that matter; because, though I cannot imagine why it should be so, there may be Gentlemen who might be reconciled to the rating by the notion of duality, and they have a right to know whether it is really a vital point, or whether it is only a tub to the whale, which, having served its purpose, may be dismissed like the scheme of the 25th of February. Whatever comes of the principle of duality, I must assure the House—because, after the line I have taken, and am prepared to take whenever I have an opportunity on this matter, it might be supposed that I was as likely as anybody to be caught with that bait—that I cannot express the repugnance with which I view it. I shall take the liberty—because I do not think we are likely to hear much of this point on the second reading—to make a few observations on it now. It seems to me that anything more invidious could not be devised. I will not, however, dwell on that point, because it has been already noticed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. It seems, too, to me that the principle of it is eminently unsound. You may quote precedents for it; for instance, the principle of joint-stock companies and other voluntary societies, whose object is to obtain capital. Of course, if you want to get capital into a voluntary concern, you must offer capitalists privileges and advantages to attract them, and no doubt it is a great inducement to capitalists to put money into a company if they are allowed votes in proportion to the amount of their capital; and the object being to realize profits, that is all very reasonable and fair. So in boards whose business is almost entirely confined to the subject of taxation, I think you need not wonder that such a principle should be introduced; and if you were dealing with nothing but taxation, there might be a certain fairness in saying that a man should have a voice in the electoral body according to the quantum of property that he was liable to be taxed for. But it is a most narrow view of this House to consider it only as a taxing body. No doubt that has been the foundation of its power; but this House, in fact, comprehends within itself the Executive Government in all its branches, and the Legislature in all its branches; and, therefore, it is very important that we should clearly distinguish in our minds whether we are such abject worshippers of wealth, and are so inclined to bow down to it, that persons whom we admit to have a right to come into the Constitution, and to exercise the full privileges of citizenship, are to be swamped and overborne by others because they happen to be in more affluent circumstances. I recoil instinctively from such a proposition. I hold that, as a matter of policy, nothing can be worse. I have been, as the House knows well, most unwilling to extend the franchise. I have thought it most inadvisable lightly to yield to the demand for what is called access to all the rights of full citizenship in this country. But when I find that you seek by this Bill to create a sort of bastard plebeian oligarchy, to set up where there is no substantial difference a difference of power, I say you will only irritate people by giving them the franchise with one hand while with the other you set up people to swamp it with double votes. For see the admission you make. Why is this innovation on the Constitution proposed? Why is it that we require "to arm" certain classes, as the right hon. Gentleman said, with greater power than the others? I will tell you. It is because those who do it cannot conceal from themselves that they are doing what they know to be wrong; they are giving franchises in which they have no confidence; they are seeking to take into a share of the government of this country classes whom they do not think fit to partake of it, and therefore they wish to compensate that imprudence—and worse than imprudence—by raising up a sort of sham oligarchy to control and counterbalance it. Now, whatever we do let us do fairly and frankly. I, for one, will be no party to giving power to classes in whom I have no confidence; nor will I associate the giving of power with any shabby expedient to counteract it. Then there is another ground upon which I am opposed to this proposal. I do not know whether it would please those who may have these extra votes. For myself, I should feel it a degradation. It may be that others would not think it so, for people differ in feeling very much; but whatever pleasure it might create in some, it would be more than counterbalanced by the rage it would create in others. It would be more than dishonest—it would be dangerous, from the amount of discontent it would create. Those who have not these double votes will feel themselves treated as inferiors, and will be more discontented than if they were excluded from the franchise altogether. Even those who are most opposed to the present state of things must admit that the franchise was always open to a man. He can raise himself and attain it; within it all were equal; but now you can take advantage of some fortuitous circumstance—such as a man's having been educated at an University, or something of that kind—in order to give him the permanent stamp of superiority, although he may be no better than his neighbour. The consequence will be that you will make the discontent in the lower order of citizens still greater; they will combine with the non-electors to take away the invidious distinction, and when they succeed they will give these votes which they will wrest from the newly privileged class to the non-electors as a reward for having aided them. Instead, therefore, of settling, you would unsettle everything again. You would provide a machinery for getting up a further agitation for a further lowering of the franchise, and a further breaking in upon the institutions of the country. We are going now, as I think, to break up a machine which, though not perfect, has on the whole worked exceedingly well. We are going to try a new, dangerous, and, as I would say, desperate experiment. We are going to make an attempt which many persons, whose opinions are not to be despised, think highly dangerous, in pursuit of “that firstborn of things,” divine equality. And, having made all those sacrifices to obtain equality, are we at the very moment that it is obtained to destroy and annihilate it by creating a gross inequality of our own? The differences of mankind create inequalities enough, and more than enough. It is the order of Providence that men should be unequal, and it is, in my opinion, the wisdom of a State to make its institutions conform to that order. But to invert that order, to give the lower classes a preponderance over the others, to make the highest inferior to the lowest, and all for the sake of levelling inequality, and then to set to work to create a fresh aristocracy to counterpoise and balance the evil you have done, seems to me an amount of absurdity which I could not have believed any Government capable of. Therefore, it is from no wish to see this country in the hands of an unbridled democracy that I am opposed to the dual vote, but because I believe it would be invidious, ineffectual, and dangerous. These are the remarks which I have had to make; these are the opinions which I was anxious to submit to the House on those points. I beg to impress upon the House that it is my firm conviction that you will not find a resting-place in a rating franchise, and that all you will do by establishing it is to get up a new agitation on the back of the old one.

MR. HENLEY: Sir, after hearing the speeches of right hon. Gentlemen, he would be a daring man who would think there was any probability of making any progress with this question at all. Considering the difficulties of the subject, it is a very easy thing to pick holes and raise difficulties which it may seem impossible to overcome. But how do we stand in regard to this question? You must look back a little to the past. Last year we were told—and I am sure with great sincerity—that the time had come when a certain number of those who are now excluded ought to be admitted to the franchise; and in the opinion of those who brought forward the measure of last year that might be done with safety. Now, I have always thought with respect to this question that it was much more important to know what sort of people you were going to admit than how many—that, I confess, was a matter which always weighed strongly on my mind: and when you come to draw an arbitrary line—I do not care whether it be at £6, £5, £7, or £8—you must take all that come within that line, be they good, bad, or indifferent; and in all classes, as we know, good, bad, and indifferent are to be found. Well, I am one of those who think it better, in making a great change like this, to take within the franchise which we are about to establish those who come under the definition of the more steady than of the less steady. I may be wrong, but still I have a notion that, ordinarily speaking, those who pay their way and bear their share of the public burdens come within the category of the more steady. This is no new opinion of mine. I told my constituents the same when I stood on the hustings in 1865, so it cannot be said that I have come to the conclusion hastily. I certainly did think then that the time would come when a very considerable enlargement of the franchise would be necessary, and I believe that it is the safer course to extend it to those who pay their rates. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has, as it seems to me, almost arrived at the same conclusion; because, if I heard him correctly—and I believe I did—he said it would be desirable that by some means the franchise should be fixed at that limit at which the law for other purposes had fixed the personal payment of rates.

MR. GLADSTONE: I did not say the particular limit at which the law is now fixed, but if a point could be chosen it would be desirable to do so.

MR. HENLEY: I think there is not much difference. Well, if that be so, should we not see whether the difficulties which attend both the one and the other of these provisions cannot be dispassionately considered and fairly overcome? As to the question of compound-householders, I am by no means blind to the difficulties which beset it; and yet all those difficulties would arise wherever you were to draw an arbitrary line, because, though the Small Tenements Act has fixed the limit at £6, in the local Acts it rises as high as £25 or £30 in different towns. Therefore it is a difficulty every way, but not one which cannot be overcome, if we fairly agree upon the principle, and set our shoulders to the wheel with a determination to overcome it. That principle I understand to be this—that in towns those who bear the burden of the poor rates, whatever be the amount of the tenement, shall have a vote. There are many advantages which I see in a proposition of that sort, not the least of them being that it does not take in all one class down to a hard line. There are steady men below the arbitrary line—men just as worthy of the franchise as the others, though perchance they pay a little less a week. But it is a great advantage that, in matters of this kind, you draw in various classes of the community, and therefore to that part of the Bill I cordially give my assent. I believe the difficulty with regard to compound-householders may, if we act dispassionately, be overcome, with fairness both to one side and the other; and entertaining that belief, I do think that the proposal of the Government is as likely, or more likely, to settle this vexed question of fifteen years' standing than any other which I have seen proposed to the House. I did not intend to say a word on this question to-night; but since I have risen I cannot avoid making one remark on another part of the subject. I think that the amount fixed for the occupation franchise in counties does come very near what I have always held to be a fair boundary of that franchise, and that is the limit at which the house tax is paid. £15 rating is very near to that, after you deduct 25 per cent. I have always thought that a just limit for the county franchise; but so far as this is concerned, if it had been more liberal, I, for one, would have had no objection to it. To one part of the scheme I should not be frank if I did not at once state my difficulty and objection. I have heard no reason which leads me to believe that dual voting is other than unmixed mischief. I never believed for one moment the statement which I have heard from both sides of the House, of parties being likely to be swamped by the effect of numbers. I do not believe that those who come on to the franchise will be all of one side. That would be contrary to all experience. All tradition, all history tells us so. Some go one way and some another. I do not know why they should now do what they never did before. But if any human ingenuity could devise a scheme that would have such an effect, to my mind the system of dual and cumulative voting would.

I never heard any real argument in favour of either of them—on the contrary, I believe that the almost inevitable consequence would be to drive the humbler classes to go all on one side, and, if so, the other would have a dirty chance indeed. I think the House will entirely agree in what I think should be the principle of the Bill—namely, payment of rates, which should constitute the ground for the borough franchise—that is the old principle, and with it I entirely agree.

MR. ROEBUCK: There is nothing to me more bewildering than a debate about Reform. First of all, we heard that all parties desired that the Reform question should be settled, and then it was said it could only be settled by a liberal admission to the franchise of parties who are now excluded. These points were laid down not to be controverted. Last year the Government of Lord Russell, represented in this House by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, brought in a Reform Bill, and the way they proposed to admit those persons now excluded was by means of a £7 rental qualification. That was not pleasing to this House. They determined that should not pass, and the Government of Lord Russell went out. To them succeeded the Government of Lord Derby; and now comes another plan. The House last year said the qualification should not be rental, but rating; and the Government now, taking advantage of that, say we shall not have any sum to give a right of voting, but we shall take the rating and payment of rates as the qualification for the suffrage. Thereupon up gets the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire and makes a speech, inspired I know not by what sort of spirit, neither can I tell what object he had in making it, except to hurt all and sundry. The right hon. Gentleman, having imported into the discussion all sorts of little petty objections which were only calculated to give pain and to do mischief, proceeded to discuss the Bill, this not being the time when the Bill should be discussed. He went headlong into the Bill; and it is remarkable that his speech was not only disingenuous but it was inconsistent. He began by saying that the Bill was a fraud—that it pretended to let in people while it shut them out. That was the right hon. Gentleman's first proposition. His next proposition was that it let in everybody, and that it would utterly ruin the British Constitution.

["No!"] It may be said that he never said it; but I say that he did say it. Then he went through the Bill step by step, and his first objection was taken to the rating clause. Now, I do not wonder at that, because that was the provision that turned the right hon. Gentleman out of office. But, not content with objecting to the rating clause, the right hon. Gentleman misrepresented its effect. Let us see what the rating clause really is, and what is the object that all of us—with the exception, I believe, of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright)—have in view. Our object is to let into the enjoyment of the franchise that portion of the working classes who by their intelligence, their probity, and character are persons to whom we can confide the interests of the country. That I believe to be the object of every right-minded man in this House. But how did the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to carry that object into effect? Not by letting in everybody, not by letting in the uneducated rabble. "No," the right hon. Gentleman said, "if I reduce the franchise to a £7 rental, I shall obtain just the very class of men we desire to have as voters." That was the way in which he endeavoured to bring in these persons. The attempt was made and failed. Now, the mode in which the right hon. Gentleman opposite attempts to effect the same object is by introducing a rating franchise. And what is the rating franchise? Simply this, that we do not ask what a man pays in the way of rent; all we ask is, Is he rated to the poor? If he is rated to the poor, then the next question is, Does he pay his poor rates? That I believe to be the difference between the methods of the right hon. Gentlemen. It may be that a man is rated to the poor, but that the rates may be paid by the landlord; and the law has stated that, for the purposes of the revenue, in certain cases the rate shall be paid by the landlord. Could anything be more absurd than to raise up a phantom objection of this sort, when we know that when the Bill gets into Committee the thing can be established at once—that by a few words we may render the whole thing so plain that those who run may read. There can be no difficulty or heartburning about the matter. Who can be injured by such a scheme being carried into effect? "Oh!" says the right hon. Gentleman, "you will create heartburnings in those people who don't pay their own rates." Now, did he not do exactly the same thing when he stopped at the £7 rental—did he not, by doing so, create heartburnings in the hearts of those who only paid £6 rental? What possible distinction can the right hon. Gentleman draw between the two cases? But, then, why make the objection. Oh, the “why” is very clear—because those Gentlemen sit upon the opposite Benches. The next question is that relating to the residence required by the Bill—a question which appears to me to be an all-important one. If anybody is allowed to vote the day after he comes into a house, you give the franchise to a passing, wandering class of people, in whom you have no confidence, and who are open to every possible mischievous influence; but when you say to the voter, “Before you can vote you must have resided in your house for so long, and thus paid a sort of respect to the requirements of society,” you will enfranchise a class of persons in whom you may place the fullest confidence, while you will keep out of the franchise the wandering and passing population. I want, therefore, to know whether there is any difficulty about that point. On the third proposition of the Bill, that relating to duality of voting, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, that it is not only mischievous but utterly impracticable. But when the right hon. Gentleman says that is a proposition fatal to the Bill, I do not agree with him. We can throw out the clause containing that proposition in Committee, and then, I believe, we shall have a very good Bill. But supposing we were to throw out this Bill, I want to know what is to succeed it? Let us follow in our own minds the steps that would be taken. The Bill is thrown out. I will not take Lord Derby’s threat of a dissolution for anything. I do not think it a proper observation for him to have made. [An hon. MEMBER: He never made it.] I hope he did not. I will suppose, then, that no dissolution will take place. Well, then, the Government Bill is thrown out, and the Government themselves go out after it, and the right hon. Gentleman comes in. And then what is he going to do? The right hon. Gentleman has tried the £7 franchise and has failed. The household suffrage has been tried and has failed. Is there anything between them? Will the right hon. Gentleman suppose that, after having failed to carry a £7 franchise he will be able to carry a £6 one? Why, we shall then come to a dead standstill; we shall never carry a Bill at all, and the question of Reform will not be determined, and we shall not have admitted to the franchise any of the lower classes of our population. Therefore, our plain and simple course is to discuss this Bill upon the second reading—to read it a second time, to bring it into Committee, make it what it can be made—if necessary, take it out of the hands of the Government:—but, at all events, let us pass the Bill. While this debate is going on the country is in a state of disquietude. The mind of every man is disturbed, and until this question is determined England will know no quiet. It will probably be said “Oh! but we must have some resting-place.” But is there any resting-place in human affairs? “Sufficient to the day is the evil thereof.” Let us pass what we believe to be the best Bill we can pass at this time, and let us leave it to posterity to settle its own affairs. No Reform Bill you can pass will ever be a stable measure—it will go on from time to time changing as society changes, and as wants, necessities, and intelligence change, so will change with them the laws of this country.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE observed, upon the position in which independent Conservatives who objected to the Government Bill were placed as to their action in regard to it. It was always painful to have to express one’s sentiments when truth and honour were on one side, party allegiance on the other. He regretted to say that, in his opinion, they had now reached one of those stages. Appeals were made from the Treasury Bench to the Conservatives on their party duty—he might almost say their political chastity—to support the Bill, and they were bound to ask themselves were these views of their duty sound. They were still more bound to do so after having listened to the able and exhaustive and really Conservative speech of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire that evening. [“Oh, oh!” from the back Conservative Benches.] He repeated his assertion, it was really Conservative; and what wonder? He was himself an old enough Member to recollect when that right hon. Gentleman was the rising hope of the unbroken Conservative party, then under the great leading of Peel. He would not say what the unfortunate differences were which had caused the separation, and by whose management they had been aggravated and made perpetual. Faults, no doubt, there were on Peel’s part of manner and policy much to be regretted; but these need not have led to a perpetual breach, they need not have engaged the Conservatives in the unfortunate mistake of resisting the good policy of free trade. But for that mistake, and that management, the Conservative party would have been standing in a very different position that evening. If, then, the right hon. Gentleman would at last come back to those good views which they had held in common when they were a united and powerful party, led by the great name of Peel—if he said there were a way opened for them to return to those days, ought not any man who loved Conservative principles more than Conservative tactics and dodgery to rejoice? The Bill of last year, comparatively moderate as it was in its provisions, was rejected because the Conservative party were led, by those who were placed over them, to believe that it would cause a dangerous disturbance of the influence which property had previously maintained in the country. Were not they deluged with speeches and papers as to the predominance of numbers over property which it would involve? Did not their breakfast-tables groan with clever pamphlets written by Mr. Dudley Baxter, confessedly by inspiration from the governing powers, all harping upon this strain? So Lord Russell was turned out, and the present Government came in, wholly unpledged on the question of Reform, except in the negative way of having voted against every proposition of the other side. However, it chose to bring in its own Reform Bill, and though the House had not as yet seen the Bill of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they had heard him that night describe to them the provisions of the third or fourth public edition of his measure, the previous editions having it seemed been printed for private circulation amongst a select number of his political Friends. Now, by the proposed Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, the relations of property to representation were entirely thrown aside. They were told that the personal payment of a rate of any amount was quite sufficient to make a man so good a citizen as to entitle him to be intrusted with the franchise. That principle might be right or wrong, but it certainly was not the principle upon which the Conservative party had contended against the Bill of last year, it was not either the principle of that Bill, and still less was it that of the Bill of 1832. Nothing had given him (Mr. Beresford Hope) graver cause to distrust the Chancellor of the Exchequer's scheme than the use he made of the original Reform Bill to support his position. It was idle, on the part of the Minister, to go back to times before the Reform Act, while a measure that required to be bolstered up by the preposterous assertion that the poor had been deprived of the franchise in 1832 could have very few merits of its own on which to depend. The reason which mainly prevailed for passing the Reform Act was that the old so-called popular franchises by which "potwallopers, freemen, and scot and lot voters" were qualified had broken down, and had led to the domination of what in another part of the same speech the same debater had not scrupled to call "a heartless oligarchy." These franchises had, in their barbarous rudeness, become wholly unsuited to modern civilization; and, as all moderate and reasonable persons acknowledged, were the fruitful source of manifold corruption. This was the weakest spot of the old system; yet it was these bad, pseudo-democratic boroughs which the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to regret and to be desirous to revive. The Act of 1832, founded on the assertion of middle class intelligence, might not be perfect; but it was a great point of departure in our political history, and was followed by many beneficial measures, many of which the Conservatives supported, and many of which they originated, until at last the great crisis of free trade was reached, when, listening to evil counsels, they unfortunately deserted their great Leader. Had they not done so the Conservative party would not have been in the plight in which they now found themselves. In 1832 the connection between a certain amount of solvency on the voter's part and the enjoyment of the franchise was established by law, and that principle had hitherto been recognised by every one of the proposed Reform Bills which had been introduced since that date. In all of these the real question was to establish a solvent constituency. The line may or may not have been drawn too low; still, the principle remained. The Bill of the present Government, however, was a sudden, a wanton, and dangerous deviation from that sound principle; and it was not fair for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to call on those who sat on the Ministerial side of the House upon their party allegiance to pass a measure which was framed with such intentions. So far as he could understand the Bill had two intentions: one, the public intention, was to outbid the Liberal party in the market of liberalism—the other, the private intention, was, that the Conservatives should believe in the rotten and fallacious restrictions with which the measure was incumbered, and which the first Parliament elected under the new suffrage would destroy. This was not an honest Bill; it was a Bill with two faces—a Bill that did not explain itself. It might really be a restrictive Bill, and then its effect would be to raise the fiercest passions of the people by pretending to gratify their wants and then snatching away the gift from their very mouth; or, on the other hand, it might carry out all that on its face it was meant to induce Mr. Beales, Mr. Odgers, and Mr. Leicester to believe that it would do; and then it would be nothing less than revolution. Suppose the Bill passed in its broadest and most dangerous form, it would induce either democracy—a system under which property and intelligence had not their due weight, and under which mere numbers and the cravings of those who wanted and had not become predominant—or, what would be still worse, a more base form of plutocratic government than any that we had known hitherto—worse even than the plutocracy which was an element of the system before 1832. The nomination boroughs were not the worst evil of the system which preceded the Reform Act. They might have been reactionary, exclusive, and so on, but there was no bribery about them. Old Sarum and Gatton had not the corruptible elements in them, for the transaction which made the Members was recognised and approved by the customs of society; and although the system was indefensible, their representatives were often men of genius and statesmen. But there were other boroughs which were purchasable by the highest bidder at that time—the boroughs in which the reduced town franchises, of which the Leader of the House is so fond, “potwallopers, freemen, scot and lot, and ancient right voters,” and so forth prevailed. So, although Totnes and Reigate, Lancaster and Yarmouth, had taught us that we had not so completely extinguished corruption as we had imagined, that was no reason why we should add to its opportunities by placing the whole body of householders at the disposal of that omnipotent agent of evil, the election attorney. If this measure did not land us in democracy it would land us in all the worst evils of corrupt, dirty, and low electioneering. The machinery of the present Bill by which compound-householders would be able to obtain the franchise, was one that would undoubtedly lead to very extensive corruption. Under such machinery the scot and lot voters would obtain a new vitality, and be shuffled by a political pitchfork into the new constituency. Nothing was easier than an arrangement by which the rates now paid by the landlords could be transferred to the credit of the compound-householders, when their votes could be secured in favour of certain persons. He seriously appealed to the conscience of hon. Members whether they could with their eyes open consent to a measure which would lead to such a result. Let any of them in the privacy of his own heart look back upon the incidents of his own electioneering, and he (Mr. Beresford Hope) ventured to say that none could be quite satisfied with the retrospect. None there was who would not be conscious of things said and done and allowed, which, under other circumstances, he would have shrunk from. That which with the most truthful of men is truth, and with the most honourable is honour, too often changes its name and nature when driven to mingle in elections, and that is connived at which at no other time would even be tolerated. Yet the great advantage of this Conservative Reform Bill, brought in by a Conservative Government, was to extend and perpetuate these evils. The right hon. Gentleman had passed very lightly over his educational franchises; but there was one about which he must say a few words, although it had not been referred to that evening. It was proposed by this Bill to give votes to all persons who had passed the Oxford or Cambridge middle-class examinations. Now, as one who belonged to Cambridge, and who had the highest respect for a real degree, he must say that nothing more preposterous or degrading to the Universities could be conceived. The University degree could only be obtained as the result of prolonged and continuous training, and its possession showed that a man enjoyed a certain social status, and so the enfranchisement of the genuine graduate was defensible. But how were the certificates of these middle-class examinations obtained? A lot of hobble-de-hoys, about eighteen years of age, were brought together in a room and examined for two or three days by a delegated master of arts, and to every one of them who, after being crammed for the occasion by the village schoolmaster, obtained a pass, was to be for the years to come enfranchised by this precious scheme. He might, in after life, fall lower than the lowest; might become tapster, crossing-sweeper, or anything else; but he would have the franchise in his pocket, and would be able to exercise it for a consideration. The boroughs and counties would be crowded with the very worst specimens of the poor scholar, who had spent six weeks in acquiring a little learning which he would occupy sixty years in forgetting while selling its results to the briber at every successive election. The number of holders of these middle-class certificates might not be very numerous just now; but once it was known how convenient an avenue it was to the suffrage, might they not trust the industry of election agents to behold the advantages of the Oxford and Cambridge local examinations. He ventured to suggest one more fancy franchise to the consideration of the Government for a class of persons who, by their possession of the qualification which he was going to name, showed an improving mind and a great deal of industry, and above all gave pledges for a lengthened fixity of residence—namely, a suffrage for the ticket-of-leave man. He hoped that by the time the Bill got into Committee the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would frame a clause to admit the ticket-of-leave man, for that would crown the edifice.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, that however unwilling he might be generally to trespass on the attention of the House, he felt that on a question of so much importance as a Reform of the Representation of the People he could not remain silent. He confessed that the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had not filled him with misgiving or alarm on this question; but, on the contrary, they had inspired him with hope, because he thought he saw a way open for the satisfactory settlement of this difficult and vexed question. He cordially agreed in the spirit of the speech that had been delivered by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), and the man he should best like to see intrusted with the framing of a Reform Bill was the hon. and learned Gentleman. His reason for this was that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not give way to those terrors and fears which were unfortunately entertained on the Ministerial side of the House; and also because the hon. and learned Gentleman was not impressed with any desire to pull down old institutions, which were endearing to Englishmen, and therefore stable, in order to substitute in their stead new-fangled and unstable devices. He thought, too, with the hon. and learned Gentleman, that we need not be over anxious to settle this question from any fear as to the effect of another year's agitation—he had too much confidence in the sound good sense of Englishmen to have any fear on that ground. The picture that had been drawn by the hon. Baronet the Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) showed the common-sense English view of the question. The remarks made by the audience at the meeting in Trafalgar Square, presided over by Mr. Potter, seated between two of the lions of the Nelson Monument, were a good sample of the opinion of the country on the matter. Englishmen did not wish to take the settlement of the question out of the hands of responsible statesmen, but that it should be settled in that House. There was nothing more significant than the conduct of the people during the last six or nine months. When the House was not sitting they got up demonstrations in the country and in the metropolis; but the moment the House met and the question was taken up, to be dealt with by the responsible Ministers of the Crown, these demonstrations collapsed and died a natural death. The people wished to see the question settled, and he was even more anxious to see it settled by the unanimity of leading Members on both sides of the House than that it should be a better or a worse Bill. When he heard that the reported conference between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had not taken place, he thought it was an unfortunate thing; because in altering the franchise they were, in fact, framing a new constitution, and it was more important that such a Bill should go forth to the country with the seal and imprimatur of the leading statesmen of the country than that it should be a better or a worse Bill. A Bill would be well received in the country just in proportion as it received their assent. He was anxious that a Reform Bill should be carried this Session, because so long as Reform remained unsettled the unity of the country was destroyed; because a feeling existed in the country among a large class of the community that they were unjustly excluded from a share in the Government of the country. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) stated last Session that the artisans in the large manufacturing districts read the American papers and took more interest in the politics of the United States than of their own country, and that he looked upon it as an untoward state of things. And in that he (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) cordially concurred. It was a far greater evil that our mechanics should be careless of the position, and indifferent to the interests, of their country than that they should succeed in getting passed laws with which the present House of Commons disagreed, or that they should run counter to the preconceived ideas of the upper classes, or even somewhat overtax the rich. England, unhappily, was not now so united as she ought to be; but was like those animals which possessed a double organism—two centres and two hearts. The heart and pulse of England did not beat in unison as it ought to do, and would not until this great question was settled, and the sooner the better. If this country was to be engaged in a life and death struggle with any of the nations of the world—if we had to defend our overland route to India—if we had to maintain our passage through Egypt—how should we fare if the whole country was not united? He believed that the difficulties of the recruiting sergeant were, in the last resort, to be traced to the question of Reform—if the question of the representation of the people were once settled, the question of recruiting the army would soon be solved. With a fair representation of the people we might have even a conscription; but we should never have a national army until we have a national suffrage. The question could not, however, be satisfactorily settled until both sides of the House took each other into their confidence; and with that feeling, although the Bill contained many points to which he seriously objected, he thought they might carry a satisfactory measure of Reform. He objected to duality of voting. A Reform Bill was wanted to do away with the inequalities that at present existed, and make the nation as one; but by adopting duality of voting they would create an invidious distinction greater than any inequality which at present marred our representative system. They might call it counterpoise or what they liked; but he was sure neither the country nor the House would accept it, and the Government must throw it over. The House would then be able to adopt the household suffrage with two years' residence, and endeavour to solve the question of the compound-householder—a difficulty which he thought they might soon satisfactorily get rid of. The present Government had, no doubt, committed many errors; but they had not, like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, committed the error of breaking its bridges and burning its boats. The Government were disposed to take the House into their confidence with reference to the Resolutions; and why should they not continue to act in concert with the House on the Bill, and so pass a measure which would be satisfactory to the country? If any check were wanted for household suffrage, it was not to be found in duality of voting, but in the redistribution of seats in such a way as to give to neighbourhoods and districts a common life and consciousness of their own, in which case the voters would elect the best man in the neighbourhood to represent them in Parliament; and that, he thought, would be the best check against a democratic Parliament. There would then be no fear of danger, for there was no country in the world where public men were so much trusted as in England.

MR. BUXTON said, he only wished to make one remark. He was not about to enter into the question of three-cornered constituencies and cumulative voting; but he wished to say that he found that so many of the most thinking minds of the country were very strongly impressed with the advantages which would arise from this principle, that he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would afford the House an opportunity of discussing its merits. He could not but express the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would be brought to perceive the intrinsic merits of such an arrangement. At any rate, it was only a question of what would be the most judicious and convenient mode of allotting the seats at the disposal of the Government. The system had been advocated by some of the most profound reasoners. The hon. Member for Westminster had supported it; and that such an arrangement was not without its intrinsic merits was obvious from the fact that such practical men as Lord Aberdeen and his Colleagues actually introduced a Bill to Parliament to carry it out, and he was assured they never altered their opinion with reference to it.

Mr. SANDFORD said, it was recently announced that the Government were about to revert to "their original policy." In accordance with the right hon. Gentleman's original speech, if that meant anything, it pointed to the fact that the Act of 1832 abolished the ancient franchises of the country, and that he was willing to restore them. Well, what was the basis of this Bill proposed to-night. It proposed to substitute another uniform system of suffrage for the uniform £10 value suffrage which now existed. That was not in accordance with the speech originally made. If there was one of the Resolutions recently brought forward on which this Bill was founded—and he, for one, doubted if it was founded on the Resolutions at all—the Resolution which most commended itself to him, and he believed to the majority of the Conservatives, was the third. It was in these terms—

"That, while it is desirable that a more direct Representation should be given to the Labouring Class, it is contrary to the Constitution of this Realm to give to any one class or interest a predominating power over the rest of the Community."

He asked any hon. Gentleman who sat behind the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman himself, how he proposed to carry out the principle of that Resolution? In the Bill they had heard explained, there was only one attempt to carry it out, and that was by dual voting. Never had there been made to that House a proposition at once so illusory and so insulting. Why, the right hon. Gentleman himself had laid no facts and figures before the House. He could account for that. He did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman had got them himself. But he (Mr. Sandford) had taken the trouble of going into the matter and finding what would be the practical working of this measure in his own borough (Maldon). While in that borough this plan would give an addition of several hundred votes to one class, the counteracting principle of dual voting would add about sixty votes to the constituency. He believed that this was a fair example of the effect the Bill would have in a large proportion of the boroughs. But if this proposal was ineffectual as a check it was effectual as an insult, for by a dual of infelicity the Bill proposed to enfranchise a large number of persons and to insult them. For, at the same moment, the Government told Lazarus that he was in a position to receive the electoral trust, but that it was not fitting he should be put in the same position as Dives. They gave one vote to one man because he was poor; and they gave two votes to another man because he was rich. If the Government chose to introduce this principle of plurality, it should have been done in such a way as to make it an effectual check; but this hybrid measure had the worst features of both systems. It did not protect minorities, and it insulted majorities. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich had addressed his constituents on this Bill. Now, it was to be borne in mind that when a Cabinet Minister made a speech at a hustings on the occasion of his being returned without opposition he was very much in the position of a parson preaching a sermon. There was no one to reply to him. He thought that circumstance was very much to be regretted; because if it were otherwise, in both these cases the quality of the article would be very much improved if there was any one present to give an answer. He ventured to say that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich would not have dared to make that speech in the House of Commons if any one of his retiring Colleagues was there to answer it. What had he said? Why, that his retiring Colleagues had not taken such a liberal view of the question as he had done. Might he take the liberty of asking the right hon. Gentleman what was his meaning of "liberality?" Was it close proximity to Messrs. Beales and Potter? If that was his definition the right hon. Gentleman had a right to consider that liberality was almost entirely concentrated in his own person. He believed the only interruption the right hon. Baronet had received during the delivery of his Droitwich speech was from an individual who exclaimed, "Why, you go further than Bright." [Mr. BRIGHT: No; "You are worsethan Bright."] He thanked the hon. Member for correcting him, and gave the right hon. Member for Droitwich the benefit of it. He begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman, also, whether he held his liberality to be a test of his excellence? What, then, were the principles in the names of which the right hon. Gentleman took his seat on the Treasury Bench? Was he there as a Liberal?

He had thought that the present Ministry were Conservative; but perhaps he had been mistaken. If the right hon. Gentleman prided himself on being a Liberal, he now begged to congratulate the right hon. Member who sat behind him (Sir John Parkinson) and his Colleagues. The right hon. Gentleman at Droitwich also charged his retiring Colleagues, not only with illiberality, but with precipitation. It was evident that he had received the permission of Her Majesty to disclose Cabinet secrets to the electors of Droitwich; because he was sure that without such permission the right hon. Gentleman would not have made the disclosures he had made there. He therefore begged to ask him how long the Government had had this Reform question under their consideration? He would ask him another question also. When had this Bill become a definite part of the Ministerial programme? He had every reason to believe that when Parliament met a Reform Bill was not in that programme. It was adopted subsequently to the commencement of the Session. He now asked the right hon. Gentleman to tell him the exact date at which the question of Reform was formally brought under the practical consideration of the Cabinet? He was sure the right hon. Gentleman would speak that night; and it would be very hard if he should not be as communicative to the House of Commons as he had been to the electors of Droitwich. The meeting of the Cabinet which led to the examination of the Bill by the Members of the Government who subsequently retired took place on the 23rd of February. How long before that had this Bill been practically proposed to the Cabinet? He would get an answer. Was it a week? The right hon. Gentleman did not answer. Well, he thought he could inform him. It was a week. [An hon. MEMBER: Ten Minutes.] No; the first Reform Bill took about a week. It was the second which only took ten minutes. This great question, which had been agitating the country and every one in it for months, first received the practical and serious consideration of the Cabinet one week before they assented to it. As he understood, the retiring Members of the Government had given thirty-six hours' consideration to it after the meeting of the Cabinet on the 23rd of February. He begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman how many hours' consideration he had given it? He asked him whether he had ever seen any figures or statistics on the subject up to the Monday on which his three Colleagues refused to assent to it? He ventured to think he did not. He might have had something casually read to him by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he would be bound to say that he had not had the handling of a fact or figure in it up to the 25th, the day on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer came down and proposed the other Bill. As the right hon. Gentleman had praised this measure as such an excellent and such an honest one, he might remark that there was something to be said on the other side. Its excellence was, of course, a fair subject of discussion, it being a question of opinion; but with respect to its honesty, there was a practical test which might be applied. Supposing the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had proposed this measure last year, would the Gentlemen who now formed Her Majesty's Government have acceded to it, or would they have opposed it? Perhaps, however, he might be told that he was putting a hypothetical case; but he might remind the House that they had the means of approximating to a correct opinion on this point. When the late Government brought forward their proposal for a £7 rental franchise in boroughs, did the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich, or the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, propose the present scheme by way of Amendment? He had searched the notice book in vain to find any such Amendment. So much for the honesty of the measure. Twenty years had now elapsed since the Conservative party was first led by their present chiefs—by the Earl of Derby in "another place," and by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire in the House of Commons. Everybody, however, was aware that Lord Derby, like many other Sovereigns, reigned, but did not govern, and we all know who the Mayor of the Palace really is. In the course of the period referred to, the Conservative party had held office three times. On the first two occasions its tenure of office had averaged about twelve months—and, for his part, he did not think that term would be exceeded on the third occasion. How was it that the Conservative party had retained office for so short a time? Because they did not command a majority in the House. And why did they not command a majority in the House? Because they did not command a majority in the country. And why did they not command a majority in the country? Let us be frank. The Conservative party depend for support on the respectable portion of the community. But the Conservative party could not command the respect of that portion of the people unless they assumed a policy that was respectable. To be respectable it must be respected; and they might depend upon it that no Government would ever command the respect of that portion of the community unless it carried out in office the same principles which it had professed in opposition.

MR. OSBORNE: I apprehend, Sir, that there are below the gangway some respectable compound-householders, if I may so term them, who are not very well pleased with the course which has been pursued by Her Majesty's Ministers. Now, it appears to me that the question before the House is not the consideration of the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) to his constituency—not the confidential communications which he made to his constituents upon that occasion, but whether we are to read for the first time the Bill which has been propounded to us. Since I have had the honour of a seat in this House I have never seen—have never heard a Bill which was not actually in our hands so discussed and so torn to pieces as this has been. I think that we have, above all things, one great duty to perform. I confess I am a party man; but I am not so much of a party man that I cannot on an occasion like the present elevate myself above mere considerations of party, and give to a subject which is stirring the heart of this country that fair consideration to which it is entitled. What is the use of our having talked about our forbearance if on the first blush of the Bill being introduced we throw cold water on every proposition it contains? and if, because we do not agree with particular clauses, we say we will not discuss the Bill? Now, Sir, I have small weight and no following in this House; but there may be people outside the House who may agree in what I am about to say, and if there be any in this House of the same opinion, I would say to them, "Do not imitate the course of the three seceding Cabinet Ministers;" or, to use the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich, "Do not be too precipitate in your condemnation of the Bill." You know not exactly what you are about to condemn; do not therefore be too precipitate, but give the measure a fair consideration. Let this Bill be in our hands, and let it proceed to a second reading. There may be some mistakes in it; but let us remember what a great mistake our own party made on a former occasion. I firmly believe that it is possible to settle this question if we approach it in a fair spirit. I grant that the occasion is tempting to twit right hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, as has been done by the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) with his ready wit and facile manner; but, for my part, I shall not twit them for their inconsistency. As a Member of Parliament I have a higher duty to perform. This question of Reform stops the way, and the problem to be solved is how are we to get it out of the way. We cannot pass a Bill on this side of the House; we have tried our hands at it and have failed. Let, therefore, the hon. Gentlemen on the other side try to settle the question. No doubt they have behaved generally ill; but it is no argument to tell me that they brought in a Bill which failed, and that then they brought in this and that. I give them credit for wishing to settle the question. Why, then, should we put the whole business of the country in suspense by evoking a desperate party spirit? The effect of that would be to strangle all chance of passing a Reform Bill. At least, I humbly think so; and I say, whatever we do, let us give this question fair consideration, and, after discussing the principles and the propositions of the Bill, let us proceed to the second reading. I apprehend that no one intends to throw out the Bill on the first reading, although it would almost appear from the speeches of some hon. Gentlemen that they had no desire to see the Bill in print. I confess the Bill contains several things with which I do not agree; but these matters may be corrected in Committee. One great principle which I have voted for—namely, household suffrage—is embodied in that Bill. Now, I take that and will make the best of it; and I think the House will be wrong if they prematurely come to any decision on the subject. I say, go to a second reading. Reverting to what was said by the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring), I may express an opinion that the Government ought not to be called upon to state the vital points of the Bill at this early stage. The proper time for that is on the second reading. With regard to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I shall not go into small details, such as the duality of votes, which, I believe, is already consigned to the tomb of all the Capulets; but I may remark that I did not hear any allusion in that speech to a Bill in which I took part last year, with the hon. Baronet the Member for Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley), for the prevention of bribery and corruption. If, after the speech of the hon. Member for Maldon, I am not exhibiting unnecessary inquisitiveness, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether that bribery Bill is also embodied in the measure propounded this evening. So much for the Bill itself. I may, however, say that I entertain one great objection to the proposed scheme of re-distribution. I think it possible that by the Bill you are bringing in you may settle the question of the franchise; but I feel very certain that if the re-distribution is as you have announced it to-night it is no settlement of the question at all, and I shall feel myself called upon to move a Resolution, unless some greater changes are made and the re-distribution Bill be altogether separated from the franchise Bill. That is a separate consideration. But, although I may be in a minority, I, for one, will not consent to give a precipitate judgment upon a Bill which I have not seen, because I have some sanguine hope that by mutual give and take on both sides of this House we may pass a Reform Bill during the present Session.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: I most cordially re-echo the exhortation of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down that we should give a fair and candid consideration to the Bill which the Government has introduced. I think nothing less is due to those frequent professions of anxiety to settle the question of Reform which have been made by all the Members of this House. But I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman that discussion upon the first reading of a measure is inconsistent with that desire; because if I did so I should be pronouncing upon many Gentlemen in this House, and on myself among others, a severe condemnation. Last year when the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was introduced, we debated that Bill on the first reading for two nights; and I am bound to say he did not then reproach us on that account with failing to give it a fair and candid consideration. On the contrary, there are great difficulties of principle as well as of detail to settle; and the more we attempt to approach a solution by the exchange of thoughts, the more likely we are to attain that desired end. There is another point on which I confess I am unable to agree with the speaker who has just sat down. It is very desirable to give a fair and candid consideration to this Bill; but I think it still more desirable to know what it is that we are giving a fair and candid consideration to. A Bill may be brought in upon two plans. You may either bring in a Bill intending to stand by all its main provisions, and in case those main provisions are not carried through Committee to abandon the Bill. If you do that those who vote for it on the second reading know what they are doing. But you may adopt another plan. You may take the House into your confidence; you may bring in a Bill intending to drop out any provisions to which the House may show its objection; and after all you may adopt whatever Bill comes out of Committee. But if you adopt that course the inevitable result is that you ask those who support you on the second reading to take a leap in the dark. I think the House has a right to know which are the main provisions of the Bill to which the Government attaches importance. The House, I think, has a right to know that in the case of all great Bills; but above all it has a right to know it in the case of a Bill the very plan of which is a system of counterpoise and compensation. Suppose you drop out household suffrage and adopt the dual vote, every Gentleman opposite will agree, I think, that the character of the Bill passed in that shape would be materially changed. On the other hand, if you drop out dual voting and retain the household suffrage, the character of the Bill will be changed as violently in the other direction. We therefore have a right to know the character of the Bill in any discussion that takes place with regard to it. I ask for this information with the more confidence because, from what I know of the character of my right hon. Friends, I feel certain that the recommendations which have been addressed to them by two or three Members of this House to take any Bill the Committee liked to give them, to allow a personal payment of rates and dual voting to be struck out of the Bill, and to send up household suffrage pure and simple to the House of Lords will meet from them with a firm—I might almost say indignant refusal. Just think for a moment of the figure they would assume—the aspect they would wear in the eyes of their countrymen, if, after all we did last year, they became the instruments of engrafting household suffrage pure and simple upon the Constitution of this country. A Reform Bill is a very important thing—few more so could come under our discussion; but I venture to think that political morality and the respect in which public men are held by the people of this country are of more importance than any provisions even of a Reform Bill. I would far rather see a very bad Reform Bill passed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) than a Reform Bill inconsistent with all their traditions, with all their preceding action, with all their professions, and with all the provisions on which they have induced others to vote passed by my right hon. Friends upon these Benches. I hope that in saying this I shall not be misunderstood. I do not wish to insinuate in the slightest degree suspicion of my right hon. Friends; but I heard with something approaching indignation the recommendations of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who I am sure made them without thinking of the amount of dishonour those recommendations involved, and I am anxious to repel on the part of those whom I respect the very suspicion of such a course of action. I am anxious not to preclude myself from any line of action which hereafter I may feel it right to take. And I am sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech rather seemed to hold out that those who met Lord Derby on Friday last, and did not express disapproval of the Bill, thereby had given their consent to its provisions. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I did not say that.] Then I am glad I misunderstood my right hon. Friend. I went to that meeting to show my sincere respect for the noble Earl, and to hear the statement which he had to make. But I expressed my disapproval of the principle of that Bill by the very strongest act a public man could take, and therefore I should be very sorry to be held out as having so lightly abandoned my opinion. My objection to this measure is of this nature. It is a household suffrage Bill, practically with two compensations, for I do not say much of the third or residential clause. I thoroughly approve it; as far as it goes it will do good; but its effects will be very small. The two compensations are, first the dual vote, and secondly personal payment of rates. Of these, besides other objections which may be made to it, one I regard as inefficient and ineffectual for its purpose; the other, though most effective—almost too effective—for its purposes, is certain to be swept away. The dual vote labours under this disadvantage. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire complained—and I thought with justice, for I have made the same complaint myself—that there was not sufficient information before the House to enable it to judge of the precise effect of this proposition; but as far as we are enabled to speak, we can say this confidently, that wealth aggregates itself round large centres. Those, therefore, who will have the dual vote are congregated in masses in the large towns. And consequently, while household suffrage will introduce into the middle-sized and smaller boroughs an overwhelming mass of voters, the dual vote, which is supposed to compensate for that reduction, will take effect chiefly in very large towns, where it may affect a few seats, but in all probability very few, being lost in the mass of the population. This is a matter which can only be proved satisfactorily by statistics, and the papers on which statistics should be founded are not on the table of the House. As far as the statistics at our command go, I can only say I have a strong belief that for all practical purposes you may set aside the dual vote as any compensation whatever; and if even it were any compensation, no one could have listened to the debate this evening without perceiving that whatever abstract logical reasons there may be in favour of the proposition—and I am far from denying that such may be urged, for I believe that the proposal is good in itself, and I am by no means ready to endorse the hard names which have been given to it this evening—still, rightly or wrongly, no one can fail to have seen that the proposition is thoroughly unpalatable to this assembly. In saying this I am not condemning the dual vote, for I joined in recommending something analogous. I believe it to be just and fair in principle, but that it is not acceptable to this House. Setting aside the dual vote, which will not pass, and if it did would do no good, I come to the personal payment of rates. That is a very important limitation. But what chance have you of sustaining it?

The personal payment of rates means this—that in towns where the Small Tenements or other local Act is in force, no one whose house is compounded for shall be allowed to vote unless he will pay on the sum he has hitherto been accustomed to pay his landlord an advance of some 25 per cent. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire described that as a fine, and some hon. Gentlemen received the remark with derision; but though the metaphor may have been somewhat violent, the fact remains that a man who lives in one of those houses will be obliged to pay something more before he can obtain a vote. Upon a £5 house the poor rate paid by the landlord would be, say, 4s.; the tenant paying an advance of 25 per cent would pay 5s.; and thus a compound-householder wishing to be upon the register would have to pay every year 5s. for the privilege. The difficulty may be solved in one of two ways. The obvious, and I believe the practical way in which it will be solved will be this—the electioneering agent will keep upon the register those whom he may be desirous of seeing there, and every person who has studied that edifying portion of our Parliamentary literature which deals with election expenses will know that the sum of 5s. a head for voters is an exceedingly cheap price. What will the result be? Out of our 200 boroughs there are ninety-eight in which this Small Tenements Act is partially at work—that is to say, that in one parish in each of these boroughs a compound-householder will have to pay 5s. for his vote, and that in another parish in the same borough a man of exactly the same social status, living in a house exactly the same size, will be able to have his vote without paying 5s. for it. Do you not imagine that this inequality brought so close home to him, and taking so practical a form, will be most galling to him? The peculiarity—I was going to say the absurdity—of this proposition is this—that you not only inflict upon him a mortification which he will feel, but with the same hand you give him the power of sweeping it away, because that very man who pays 5s. for his vote will insist that his Member's first Parliamentary act shall be to sweep away this obligation. I am quite willing to join in setting up any securities against democracies that may be thought good; but I confess I think that a fence put round a person in whose hands you place a weapon which will surely knock it down is the most futile fence it is possible to set up. Therefore, I cannot but come to this conclusion, that if you pass this personal payment the first act of the Parliament under which it is elected must of necessity be to abolish it. Thus you will come to simple undiluted household suffrage. I will not discuss on the first reading of the Bill the general arguments of the hon. Member for Birmingham in favour of democracy. I am content to fall back on what seems to be a simple proposition of political morality, that the party which behaved in opposition as ours did last year is not the party to propose household suffrage. I am sure that my right hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench are actuated by the purest and most honourable motives; but if they fail to comprehend the obligations of their position, they will inflict a severe blow on the respect in which public men in this country have hitherto been held. We are told that the Conservative party, as a body, have so far advanced in principles and sentiments that they will accept this Bill. Well, if that be so, I think they will be committing political suicide. When they go to the constituencies and say, "We have supported household suffrage," and there stands on the other side of the hustings one who has all his life been a Radical and has always supported household suffrage, I think the constituencies will say, "We shall prefer the long-tried champion to the new and sudden convert." Be that as it may, I feel certain that if the Conservative party listens so much to party discipline, and listens so little to the dictates of those principles in which they have been accustomed to protest they believed, they will repent—that it will be their ruin politically, and that no preservation of party discipline and no support of individual statesmen will compensate to them for that result. I know what is said by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield, "What are you to look to next? What will happen afterwards?" Well, I confess that is a consideration which presses, and has pressed very heavily on my mind. I heard some one to-night say that the right hon. Member for South Lancashire had become Conservative. I am not at all inclined to believe in that conversion. I have no reason to doubt that he will adhere to the principles he has so long and consistently supported. But still, I confess, with that prospect before me, knowing that if this Bill should miscarry, and if a change of Government should occur, the right hon.

Gentleman will probably have the framing of the next Reform Bill, my imagination is not sufficiently fertile to see how we can well have a more dangerous Bill than that proposed to the House. I say so for this reason—I believe this Bill in its end is household suffrage. Although I deprecate the result, I say that, if you are to come to household suffrage, you had better come to it openly and boldly; you had better not reach it by a process of irritating those who have not the franchise, but who will win it from you step by step. This personal payment of rates will be removed, but only after enormous irritation has been caused to those upon whom it presses. Therefore, I cannot but fear that we shall reach the same end as we might if a Radical party was in power, only we shall reach it by a process which will irritate, and aggravated the results when they are attained. If household suffrage should come from the other side, I do not know that it will be worse than this Bill. I earnestly hope that whatever may be the result, the patriotism of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House will not suffer our action to degenerate into any mere party victory, and that whatever Minister is in power, the moderate party—the large majority in this House—will be able to exercise sufficient control to procure a measure which shall to a considerable extent satisfy the yearnings of those skilled artisans who are conscious of political opinions and desire to see them represented in this House, without submerging under a flood of numbers the capital, wealth, and intelligence which has hitherto had so large a share in the Government of the country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: What strikes me as most singular in this discussion is the extreme inconsistency between the views of the different speakers and even the extreme inconsistency exhibited by individual speakers themselves. The most remarkable and significant of all the addresses we have heard was unquestionably that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. It was half alarm, half derision—alarm at the revolutionary proposal, derision at the petty consequences it will produce. He said, “You propose in your Bill to admit 234,000 persons who are now rated and pay their rates; but it won’t admit half as many, for you do not make the deductions that are inevitable.” I never denied them; I gave Returns showing them; and hon. Gentlemen are quite competent to make them. The Members of the House of Commons are acquainted with the management of property, and know as much about rating as any assembly in the world. I suppose the chairmen of many assessment committees have seats in this House, and with a Return before them, they are as capable of forming an opinion as any statist, and I would as soon take their opinion as that of any other person. The right hon. Gentleman says we are not admitting half as many as 234,000. If his estimate is correct, you must apply it also to the great mass of the compound-householders, and what is the result? The result would be that of the whole 700,000 you will not have more than 300,000 or 350,000 persons. The right hon. Gentleman, in that moderate Bill the moderation of which has been so much vaunted, proposed to admit 220,000 persons. When we are talking about household suffrage, about revolutions, and about all those terrible consequences to which my noble Friend has just adverted, it is just as well that we should keep an eye on the real facts before us. The question now, is not between the proposition we make, taking it at its greatest possible amplitude, and the measure of the right hon. Gentleman last year, which he says would have admitted 200,000, though I think the estimate was higher; but it is between this and a £5 rating measure, which would increase the estimate of the right hon. Gentleman, so that probably you would arrive within some 40,000 or 50,000 of the whole number that by what is called household suffrage you could possibly admit. It is inconsistent that one moment we should hear that the alternative of the proposition we make is, no doubt, the admission of some 300,000 to the constituency, and we are to accept it in order that we should avoid the horrors of household suffrage, which would probably admit a greater number; but would it not admit that greater number on some principle on which we might stand, upon a condition understood by the people of England, which has been practised by their ancestors, which is understood by every working man, and which no working man complains of? “Oh! but those checks.” I do not admit they are checks. I say they are constitutional conditions of which a man ought to be proud. These checks, we are told, will be swept away in a moment. Were the checks placed upon the suffrage by the Act of 1832 swept away in a moment? What became of the ratepaying clauses of that Act? Why, you had a period of revolutionary excitement when that Bill was passed. You have had moments of great dissatisfaction and discontent, while there has been one much more fearful organization of labour than is in existence now. You have had great excitement against the ratepaying clauses, and you have had Members returned to Parliament in order to ensure their repeal. But the common sense of the English people never sanctioned that agitation. The people who paid knew very well that it was an English, a rational, and a patriotic condition. They were proud to fulfil it, they felt it was a security that the suffrage should be exercised by men who were trustworthy, and all that agitation against the ratepaying clauses failed, and they have prevailed for thirty or forty years. And what are the ratepaying clauses compared with the conditions we make? The conditions we make are those which every Englishman understands. He is invested with the fulfilment of a duty and the possession of a right; and you misunderstand the character of your countrymen—you are misrepresenting the idiosyncrasy of the English people if you suppose they look upon such conditions as these except as those which are worthy of freemen. Sir, if you cannot found public rights upon public duties, then I say that the liberties of the English people are in danger. But you calumniate your countrymen if you lay down such a principle. I therefore maintain that the principle upon which we propose to establish the borough franchise is an English principle, a constitutional and sound principle, which will recommend itself to the conscience and conviction of the country, and one which, if any, holds out to us the prospect of security and peace.

Sir, I will make no further remarks upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because that is the essence of it. Lord Derby may have committed an indiscretion which the right hon. Gentleman has noticed, in calling his party together and speaking to them with the frankness which is characteristic of his nature. I have heard something in my time of the great fault of eminent statesmen who have failed in public life because there was a want of frankness, and because they did not consult their party. We have all heard something of that kind. I think it has often been told us that the political history of this country would have been altered if some in eminent positions in times of great crisis and emergency had deigned to consult those who had been their companions and colleagues during a long political and Parliamentary life. That reserve is not the temper of Lord Derby. But on this Lord Derby may be congratulated, that his frankness has given the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity of preparing a speech—a speech which was evidently intended for the second reading. And I thought as I listened to it that, perhaps, the real intention was to have prevented the second reading ever being put from the Chair. I think, however, that the candour and good sense of the House of Commons have already repudiated that manoeuvre. Whatever may be the fate of these propositions, they will be decided upon after fair discussion [Mr. BRIGHT: Hear, hear!], and after a calm investigation by the representatives of the people of the propositions we make and which, at all events, touch the most important questions in politics. There was another right hon. Gentleman who also favoured us with his views of the conduct and policy of Her Majesty's Ministers. Still charmed with the success of his tactics of last year, he seems to emulate a repetition of those brilliant achievements. Sir, he has not been sparing in imputing to us the most unworthy motives. He has not been sparing in anticipating for this country the most gloomy fortunes. But this I must say, after listening to the ingenious and vivid remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, that on a question on which the people of this country require some information, and which at this moment interests and animates all classes, the right hon. Gentleman shed no ray of light, and the whole result of his arguments and the whole tenour of his reasoning were that under no conceivable circumstances could any improvement of the House of Commons be accomplished. Sir, the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr Osborne), who addressed the House, I thought, with much candour this evening, seemed to find fault with me because in the Bill I am asking for leave to introduce I made no mention of any provision for preventing corruption and bribery. But if the hon. Gentleman had been in his place on a preceding occasion he might have remembered that there was a general understanding and a general wish on the part of the House that upon this matter we should proceed in a separate measure. I then expressed to the House the principal propositions which we had to make in order to prevent bribery and corruption. And I undertook that I would lose no time, after the introduction of the larger measure, in bringing before the House the consideration of this matter in another Bill. And, Sir, I shall be prepared to fulfil that engagement. My noble Friend the Member for Stamford has, in a manner that must have interested the House, touched upon the conduct of the party of which he is still a most distinguished member, and he has expressed his regret and his anxiety that we should not deviate from the course which it becomes us, in honour and in truth, to maintain. Sir, my noble Friend seems for the moment to suppose that there is an inconsistency in the course we are pursuing, because we are introducing a Bill to amend the laws which regulate the representation of the people of the kingdom in Parliament. [Opposition Cries of "No, no!"] But can this be said with any justice of a party that eight years ago attempted to the best of their ability, and at great sacrifice, to grapple with the same question? And what have we ever said, or what done, to justify any such suspicion in the mind of the noble Lord? Let my noble Friend, or any hon. Gentleman who has spoken, point to any conclusion during the debates of last year, to any vote that was given, to any Resolution inconsistent with the course we have taken. ["Oh!"]

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: I never imputed any inconsistency to the course taken by the Government. What I said was that if the Government introduced household suffrage pure and simple I then thought they would be guilty of inconsistency.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Government will never introduce household suffrage pure and simple. It is not merely my noble Friend, but another right hon. Gentleman has spoken of our inconsistency in bringing forward a Reform Bill. I maintain there is no inconsistency. This is not the first Reform Bill we have brought forward. Nor is there a single vote that I gave last year, nor is there any single Resolution in which I have joined, at all inconsistent with the course which I and my Colleagues are pursuing at the present moment. I state that without reserve, and it is not to be answered by a mere jeer. I state that to the country and to Parliament, and I will maintain it as truth in every place and in all circumstances. I think that we were perfectly free to deal with this question, if the circumstances of the country required that we should advise Her Majesty upon it. And the circumstances of the country did require it. I hope the House will give to our proposition a dispassionate consideration. I hope we shall show in the discussion which it may produce, that there is in this House a sincere desire to bring to a satisfactory settlement a question that has too long existed. If you throw out this Bill on the second reading you may affect the position of Ministers, but you will still more affect the position of this House. You will on this question place it with respect to the country in a position which no friend to our institutions can desire. This question has existed too long and lingered too long. Do not decide rashly against a measure which you have never even seen. Let it not be said that to-night, excited by rhetoric which I may at least describe as prejudiced, you are deciding on a question on which the people of this country are deeply interested without even a complete cognizance of the propositions that we are bringing forward. You are deciding on hearsay. [Cries of "Oh!"] You are deciding upon a narrative of the proceedings which took place under a roof where you were not present, and where you quoted expressions on a most important subject which were never used. I think it would be wiser at least to take this Bill and read it before you decide upon its merits. I believe that it at least has this great object—it seeks to bring about the settlement of a question deeply interesting to the people, in a manner conservative in the highest sense of the institutions of the country.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Representation of the People in England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, and Lord STANLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 79.]

PETIT JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON), in moving the second reading of this Bill, briefly explained its object to be to provide a remedy for the want of a sufficient supply of jurors which was experienced in the administration of justice in Ireland. The Bill, with a few alterations, was the same as that which had been introduced last Session.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Solicitor General for Ireland.)

MR. COGAN complained that the mode in which jury panels were constituted in Ireland was highly objectionable. They could be packed even by so humble an individual as the sub-sheriff of a county, and that in cases in which sectarian or party feeling come into play a fair verdict could not as a consequence be obtained. There had been recently in Monaghan a trial for homicide, in which it was, notwithstanding that very little doubt as to the guilt of the accused persons existed, found impossible to secure a conviction. Among the first 100 names on the panel there were those of only three Roman Catholics, though the majority of the population in the county belonged to that persuasion.

MR. O'REILLY thought that it was impossible to exaggerate the importance of convincing the people of Ireland that justice was impartially administered in that country. He also thought that the privilege which the Crown enjoyed of challenging jurors was liable to abuse, and that some alteration should be made in the present system.

MR. LAWSON said, he did not rise to oppose the Bill, for it was substantially the same as he had himself introduced last year. His experience was that in some of the counties of Ireland that class of leaseholders had almost entirely disappeared, and it was difficult to get a sufficient number of jurors for the work required of them. Therefore, what the Government proposed to do was absolutely necessary. But he trusted, as the administration of justice in Ireland should not only be, as he believed it was, pure, but above suspicion, that the subject adverted to by the hon. Member for Kildare and the hon. Member for Longford would receive consideration. He thought that the proposal of his hon. Friend ought to be adopted.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday, 1st April.

SALE AND PURCHASE OF SHARES BILL.

(Mr. Leeman, Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie, Mr. Goldney.)

[BILL 38.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Leeman.)

MR. GRENFELL, in moving that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, said, he must preface his observations by apologizing to the hon. Member for York for again asking the House to discuss the matter after an apparent decision had been arrived at. He did so not as the representative of any body or community, and much less of his colleagues in the Bank of England, but he made that proposal because he believed that the failure of the joint-stock banks had been erroneously attributed to the proceedings of certain speculators on the Stock Exchange, and that the Legislature ought to be exceedingly careful before interfering in transactions that were common not only to the Stock Exchange, but to many other places where men engaged in different branches of commerce met under special regulations of their own together. He believed that the causes of the disastrous failures of joint-stock banks last year lay deeper than the hon. Member for York seemed to suppose. The real cause of these unfortunate failures was, that the managers of those institutions had failed to regulate their proceedings by those rules of prudence and caution which had been effectual in the past few years in securing for the Bank of England the confidence of the Government and of the country; and it was because of this belief, and because he had no faith in the assertion that the joint-stock banks failed last year from the operations of Stock Exchange speculations, that he moved that this Bill be referred to a Select Committee. It was well known to the House that certain economists were in favour of a more unrestricted currency than was allowed by the Act of 1844. Whatever might be said on that score, there could be no doubt that every panic created a most unlimited paper currency in the shape of pamphlets and letters to the newspapers. And in none of these pamphlets—many of which were replete with wisdom and sound commercial advice—could be found the name of any joint-stock bank which had stopped from the cause assigned by the hon. Member for York; and when he (Mr. Grenfell) asked for information as to what bank had so stopped he was always answered, “Oh, the Agra and Masterman Bank.” Now, what were the facts with regard to Agra and Masterman’s Bank. Far be it from him to say anything to add one atom to the pain of those who had lost their incomes or their capital in these banks. Still less did he wish to offer impertinent criticisms of his own on the management of that or other similar establishments; but when he was told that Agra and Masterman’s Bank had stopped, solely through the action of speculators, he was justified in asking for something like proof of the facts. He had sought in vain among all the pamphlets and papers that had been written on the subject, and he could not find anything like a statement in figures of the position of the Agra and Masterman Bank which would justify the directors in attributing their misfortunes to those causes. But he did find statements directly in contradiction of that allegation. He had before him an extract from a grave review which appeared in The Economist of the week before, on the whole commercial events of 1866, in which it was stated that the causes of the principal bank failures was unsound financing, and it especially mentioned the cases of the Bank of London, and Agra and Masterman’s. If that were so, and all that legislation accomplished after the panic was the punishment of a small body of jobbers, the result would be very insignificant indeed. In 1847, the late Sir Robert Peel said, in a speech on the commercial distress of that year, it was the fashion to put down commercial failures to the Bank Act of 1844, and cited the balance-sheets of some of the houses which failed, the partners of which had the assurance to say, “We could have got money if it had not been for this confounded Act of 1844.” So it was in the case of the panic of 1866. Managers and shareholders of banks which had stopped payment, in consequence of imprudent financing, came down to this House and said, “Oh, we have stopped in consequence of the proceedings of a certain number of speculators for a fall on the Stock Exchange. But the House must recollect that besides those who speculated for the fall were those who speculated for the rise, and in his humble opinion the latter did the greater mischief of the two. They had already appointed a Select Committee on Companies with Limited Liability, and if it were wished to interfere in the regulations of the Stock Exchange, he thought that the reference of this Bill to a similar Committee would complete the investigation. He moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. NEATE, in seconding the Motion, disclaimed any intention of casting any reflection upon the honour of the great body of the Stock Exchange in a previous debate.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,”—(Mr. Grenfell.)

—instead thereof.

MR. BARNETT said, that if this Bill really was likely to accomplish what it professed—the prevention of an undue depreciation in bank shares by fictitious sales—he should cordially support the measure; but he did not think it would be effectual for the purpose. Notwithstanding all its machinery, there was nothing to prevent collusion being resorted to to effect the objects which the Bill sought to put down. If the Bill could be made effectual, he admitted that it would be a boon to the public; but, believing that it would be totally inoperative, he thought it was only a waste of time to discuss it.

MR. LEEMAN said, it was somewhat late in the day to be discussing the principle of this Bill—if there had been any real intention of opposing its progress some indication of that purpose should have been made known earlier. The observations of the hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment would have been made more appropriately on the second reading, when, however, the hon. Gentleman was not present. The arguments in favour of the Bill did not proceed merely upon what had occurred during the monetary panic of 1866, but its object was to prevent the recurrence of acts which were well known, and which might otherwise be repeated. Nor was this Bill merely introduced with reference to London, which was not the only place where a Stock Exchange existed; for many of the Stock Exchanges in the provinces had expressed their thanks to him for introducing the measure; indeed, since the Bill had been read a second time, a great many petitions had been presented to the House in its favour and not one against it. He hoped the House would reject the Motion for referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that his reason for abandoning his intention of moving that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee was that the House had affirmed the principle of the Bill after full discussion, and therefore he did not like to be a party to defeating it by a side-wind. The Bill contained only one clause, and he thought the House was quite competent to consider it with sufficient effect in Committee of the Whole House. He did not think it would be desirable to bring the question of the Stock Exchange before that House, any more than it would be proper to introduce there the business of the Corn Exchange, or any other similar body; but if such a mode of proceeding were taken it ought to be by a distinct Motion, and not by a mere side-wind. So far as the Bank of England was concerned, it was indifferent to the Bill. As to the petitions that had been presented, he knew there had been a great number of them, but he thought they were not entitled to much weight, the mass of them being lithographs, and emanating from some central authority; and everyone knew the little reflection with which signatures were attached to petitions got up in such a manner.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that on the second reading he thought it his duty to state the objections he felt to the measure. He approved its object, and certainly felt no sympathy for the speculators against whom it was directed; on the contrary, he would like to "Put in every honest hand a whip

To lash the rascals naked through the world."

He questioned the means proposed for effecting the object, and his doubts had been confirmed by an Amendment on the paper to extend the operation of the Bill to railway shares; and if so, why not to all other shares and all other kinds of property? The House, however, decided in a contrary sense, and he bowed to its decision. The matter being one of principle rather than of detail, he saw no reason for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, nor would he now have troubled the House had it not been for a matter partly public and partly personal. The hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) was reported to have said the other day—

"The Vice President of the Board of Trade was connected with one of the largest institutions in the City of London, of which in that debate he must be taken to speak as the representative."

He did not catch the hon. Member's words at the time, or he would have noticed them then. He begged leave to state that he had no interest directly or indirectly affected by the fate of the hon. Member's Bill; and if the hon. Member alluded to his former connection with the Bank of England, he gave up that and every other directorship when he accepted the office he had now the honour to hold. He apologized for saying so much about himself; but he thought it inconvenient that public men, even in the humble, responsible position he held, should be supposed liable to be actuated by personal or interested motives on such questions.

MR. BASS read an extract from The Economist newspaper to the effect that it would be difficult to propose a restriction more foolish than that contained in the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Contracts for Sale, &c., of Shares to be void unless the Numbers by which such Shares are distinguished are set forth in the Contract.)

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK proposed in line 15, after the word "banking," to insert "railway or other," contending that if the principle of the measure was good in the case of banks, it should be good in the case of railway and other companies.

Amendment negatived.

MR. LEEMAN moved, in line 15, to leave out "England and Wales" and insert "the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

MR. CRAWFORD protested against extending so absurd a Bill to Scotland.

MR. LEEMAN said, it was at the request of an Irish and Scotch Member that he proposed the Amendment.

MR. AYRTON inquired whether the hon. Gentleman intended that the Bill should apply to any foreign bank carrying on business in this country, as well as to banks established under the Joint Stock Companies Act?

MR. LEEMAN said, he did not.

MR. AYRTON said, that as the measure was penal in its character, its language ought to be more precise, and he would appeal to the legal Gentlemen opposite whether the words of the measure as they stood would not embrace the institutions to which he had referred.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK moved to omit, in line 18, the words that the contract or token "shall be in writing and."

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 18, after the word "token," to leave out the words "shall be in writing and."—(Mr. Lusk.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. ALBERT GRANT, to prove the sincerity of his desire to facilitate the passing of the measure, would recommend the hon. Member who had charge of the Bill himself to move that the Chairman report Progress, and he gave that advice in consequence, not only of the lateness of the hour (a quarter to One o'clock), but also from the construction of the measure itself.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it would be better to alter the words in the clause so as to cause the shares to be designated by number in writing, leaving it to the parties to decide whether the contract should be in writing or oral, as might be most convenient.

MR. BASS said, the difficulties of passing this measure appeared to be so great that he thought it would be better to report Progress, which would enable the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Leeman) to consider the Amendment. He moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Bass.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 35; Noes 75: Majority 40.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK then moved that the Chairman leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Lusk.)—put, and negatived.

MR. LEEMAN said, he would adopt the suggestion of the Solicitor General, and expressed a hope that he would be allowed to proceed with the Bill.

MR. MOFFATT said, they ought not to be called upon in this Bill to enact something like the Statute of Frauds, and he moved that the Chairman report Progress. The Bill required further consideration.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Moffatt.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 23; Noes 71: Majority 48.

MR. LEEMAN felt it was impossible to withstand the determination of the minority, and therefore himself moved that the Chairman report Progress.

METROPOLITAN POOR BILL—(No. 45.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DEVON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that the objects of the measure were three-fold—first, to provide for the sick poor, both outdoor and indoor, within the metropolitan area, for the insane and other classes of the inmates of workhouses, better accommodation than they at present enjoyed;

secondly, to assimilate the powers and duties of guardians in certain parishes under local Acts to those of guardians acting under the general law; and thirdly, to provide for the equalization of certain charges over the whole metropolis; and for other purposes relating to the relief of the poor within the metropolis. The evils which the Bill was intended to remedy might be classed under two heads—first, the inadequate, inefficient, and ill-managed accommodation for the sick in the metropolitan workhouses; and secondly, the want in many of those workhouses of a sufficient and well-trained staff of nurses. That the accommodation for the sick in workhouses should be exceedingly bad was hardly to be wondered at when they recollected that at the first introduction of the Poor Law Amendment Act it was hardly at all contemplated that the sick and infirm should be received within the walls of the workhouses, which were mainly intended as places for able-bodied paupers. But as years passed on the law was so administered that the workhouses became, to a great extent, hospitals for the sick and infirm. A paper which he held in his hand showed that in 1865 no less than 25 per cent of the inmates of all the metropolitan workhouses were sick and infirm, and that this was considerably above the average throughout the country; and when they considered the great number of cases of this kind which were continually received into the metropolitan workhouses, it was easy to understand how the amount of accommodation was inadequate. From the Return with which the Poor Law Board had been supplied, it appeared that whereas indoor relief in England and Wales amounted to only 14 per cent upon all cases, in the metropolis it rose as high as 27 per cent. He was happy to be able to acknowledge that in many cases within the metropolis well-considered, judicious, and philanthropic provision had been made by Boards of Guardians for the accommodation of the sick and infirm, and had thus met to some degree the want of sufficient hospital accommodation. But that was not the case throughout. There were many cases in which it would be impossible to provide proper accommodation for want of space, and he feared he must say there were a few in which when motives had been scrutinized the guardians did not show an inclination to provide a remedy for wants which in other districts had been more liberally supplied. Another cause which prevented the improvement of the accommodation for the sick was the limitation which applied to the Poor Law Board, as to the amount of money which they could compel the guardians to expend. It was well known to their Lordships that until last year the Poor Law Board could not compel a Board of Guardians in any parish to carry out any alterations, the cost of which would be more than £50. It was thus obviously impossible for the Poor Law Board to provide that any great alterations should take place. Another consideration which pressed upon the Poor Law Board was this. Until a late period the Poor Law Board were advised by competent medical authorities that a space of 500 cubic feet was sufficient for each sick person. Doubts, however, had been thrown upon the correctness of that belief, and in order to solve them, a Committee was appointed to inquire into the matter. That Committee, at the head of which was Sir Thomas Watson, the distinguished President of the College of Physicians, was composed of physicians and surgeons and other gentlemen whose studies and duties had familiarized them with the subject. The Committee reported that not less than 850 cubic feet on an average ought to be allowed to each sick inmate, and in certain offensive cases not less than 1,200; but that in chronic infirm cases, in wards occupied by day as well as by night, 500 cubic feet would be enough; and 300 cubic feet for healthy classes of children. It had been determined, therefore, by the Poor Law Board that 850 cubic feet was the minimum which the guardians would be authorized to provide for the sick. But in addition to these general grounds for this measure, there were some special and individual cases which had strongly impressed the Poor Law Board with the necessity of amending the present system. He referred to the cases of Timothy Daley, who died in the Holborn Workhouse on the 23rd of December, 1864, and that of Richard Gibson, who died in the workhouse of St. Giles and St. George. In consequence of the complaints which had been made with respect to these cases, inquiries were held by Poor Law Inspectors, and the result proved not only the allegations of personal neglect in these particular cases, but that also the sick wards in these hospitals were insufficient and ill-arranged; and inquiries that subsequently took place into the management of the Paddington Workhouse showed in that case also that the staff of nurses was insufficient, and the provision for the sick and the medical arrangements generally unsatisfactory. In speaking of the investigations carried on by paid officers of the Poor Law Board, he would not be doing his duty if he passed over without acknowledgment the services rendered by professional and scientific gentlemen connected with The Lancet, who, at the cost of much valuable time and money, visited the workhouses of the metropolis, and supplied the Poor Law Board from time to time with most material facts in reference to their condition. The result of the information thus collected was the appointment of Mr. Farnall and Dr. Smith to make a special investigation into the state of the wards in the workhouses, and their Report, though differing in other respects, agreed in this—that the wards were overcrowded, and that the general arrangements for the sick were very unsatisfactory. Shortly after his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) came into office, two other Inspectors were appointed to make inquiry, not merely into the state of the sick wards, but into the general accommodation in the metropolitan workhouses. These gentlemen were instructed to take as the basis of their judgment the opinion given with respect to the amount of cubic feet. Having made a careful inquiry, the Inspectors came to this conclusion—that in twenty-four unions and parishes the existing workhouses were such that by partial re-construction they might be made adequate to the necessities of the case; but with respect to the remaining fifteen, the greater number of them were not capable of being made suitable to the purposes for which they were required. Sufficient proof had therefore been brought forward to show that the Poor Law Board had ample grounds for adopting some comprehensive measures for the improvement of the workhouse infirmaries. With regard to the provision of an efficient and proper nursing staff, the evidence was not less strong. The subject had often engaged the attention of the Poor Law Board, and had been pressed by their Inspectors on the Poor Law Guardians, to whom a circular had been issued and re-issued. It would be improper on such an occasion to omit reference to the improved feeling on the subject which had resulted from the admiration the country must feel for the exertions of that excellent and gifted woman, Miss Nightingale, whose name would always be received with that respect which was due to her Christian activity and self-devotion. Contemporaneously with her labours, the ill-arrangement of the sick wards of the workhouses, and the want of a proper nursing staff, had pressed themselves on the Poor Law Board as matters requiring attention; and the available remedies seemed to be additional buildings, increase of staff, and greater means of classification. The first consideration that presented itself to the Poor Law Board, on reviewing the question, was that there were no fewer than thirty-nine different areas of taxation within the metropolis, fifteen of these being unions under Boards of Guardians, and fourteen parishes under the general law; while no less than ten were governed by guardians elected in different ways by vestrymen. The obvious conclusion that pressed itself on the Board was that it was absolutely necessary to create new and larger districts in order to carry out the remedies that were proposed. Having thus adverted to the evils which it was sought to remedy, and the reasons of the Poor Law Board for introducing the measure, he would proceed to call attention to some of the provisions of the Bill. Three Committees which had inquired into the subject had stated in their Reports that the extension of the power of the Poor Law Board over local guardians was necessary. The Bill therefore gave power to the Poor Law Board to provide asylums for the reception and relief of the sick, insane, or infirm poor; to combine unions or parishes, or unions and parishes into districts, to constitute bodies of managers partly elected and partly nominated, with powers to erect new buildings, purchase lands, and borrow money. It was further provided that the appointment and duties of the officers were to be determined by the managers; but their salaries were to be determined by the Board. Auditors were to be appointed, and might be removed at the pleasure of the Board. In the provision for the application of the asylums, the words were very general, and included fever, small pox, and lunatics. There was also a provision for the establishment of dispensaries to afford outdoor medical relief, with a committee of management and the necessary officers. The medicines were to be provided by the Board of Guardians, in order to secure that they should be of the best description. The next clause to which he would call attention was that very important one which provided for the establishment of a general metropolitan fund, to which all unions and parishes were to contribute, and out of which would be made the disbursements required by the purposes of this Act. The question of the equalization of all the metropolitan rates had for years been under consideration both in and out of the House. The equalization of metropolitan rates involved grave and serious considerations; but, stopping short of that, there remained a middle course, which he thought the Poor Law Board had properly decided to adopt—namely, to take certain charges, and make them payable equally over the whole of the metropolis. The charges proposed to be thrown on this common fund were—first, the maintenance of lunatics in the asylums, and licensed houses for the insane poor; secondly, the maintenance of the patients in the asylums for patients suffering from fever or small pox; thirdly, for the medicine and attendance supplied for the relief of the poor; fourthly, salaries of all officers employed in the relief of the poor and the management of schools, asylums, and dispensaries; fifthly, for compensation in cases arising under this Act; sixthly, for payment of fees for registration of births and deaths; seventhly, the payment of fees for vaccination; eighthly, the maintenance of pauper children in district or licensed schools; and lastly, for relief of destitute persons under peculiar circumstances. He trusted that when the measure passed into law the effect would be to extend to pauper children an education which would fit them for the duties of their after life. He had thus endeavoured to explain what appeared to him to be the material provisions of this Bill, which came up to their Lordships with the almost unanimous approval of the other House. The measure had been generally approved by his right hon. Friend the late President of the Poor Law Board, and he believed it had commended itself to most of those who were aware of the evils which it sought to remove. He was anxious to say that the Bill was brought forward in no spirit of distrust or jealousy of the local authorities. It was intended to extend the authority of the Poor Law Board no further than was absolutely necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Bill. That harmonious co-operation between the central authority and the local Boards of Guardians, which he was happy to say had hitherto prevailed, would, he trusted, continue to prevail, and would show itself in the ready assistance which the Poor Law Board hoped to receive from the guardians in carrying out the provisions of this measure. In the full confidence that the Bill would be beneficial, alike to the poor and to the ratepayers, he now moved that it be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Earl of Devon.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that as he had had charge in that House of the Bill relating to the houseless poor in the metropolis, and as he had always taken a great interest in the subject of the Poor Laws, he might perhaps be allowed to say a few words in reference to this measure. Speaking of it generally, he must say that he viewed it with unqualified satisfaction. He believed it would lead to the introduction of a much better management of the metropolitan poor than had heretofore existed; he thought, also, that the Bill reflected great credit on the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Poor Law Department. His noble Friend (the Earl of Devon), in moving the second reading of the Bill, had fully explained its provisions; but he was astonished to hear the remark that the Bill was not framed in consequence of any distrust of the local Boards. It seemed to him, on the contrary, that this Bill was based entirely and properly so based, on that distrust of the Boards of Guardians which experience had shown to be too well founded. The local guardians of the metropolis having disregarded the rules and orders of the Poor Law Board, that Board had very properly brought in a measure to remove the management of the metropolitan poor, to a certain extent, from the local authorities. He therefore thought the Bill was prepared in distrust of the local guardians who had been found wanting. For himself, he regretted that the Bill did not go somewhat further in this direction—although he did not say that it might not be prudent not to make a greater change on the present occasion. He would suggest, however, whether it might not be well worthy of consideration whether they ought not to remove altogether from the guardians the management of the sick poor, and to establish for the sick poor separate infirmaries or hospitals where they might be placed under the management of persons specially qualified for the purpose. Notwithstanding what had been said by his noble Friend, a striking proof of the existence of distrust of the local authorities was to be found in the very valuable provisions of the Bill under which the Poor Law Board was enabled to appoint a certain number of ex officio guardians. That provision would enable the Poor Law Board to appoint persons to control the management of the guardians in cases where that management was not satisfactory. He feared, however, it might turn out that notwithstanding the provision for appointing ex officio guardians the poor might not be sufficiently cared for. Another provision of the Bill was one that he regarded as of great importance—that by which the expenses of certain classes of the poor are thrown on the whole metropolis instead of the separate parishes. This extended further the principle introduced into the law by the late President of the Poor Law Board in the Houseless Poor Act. It no doubt infringed the old maxim of each parish meeting its own expenditure. But looking at the peculiar position of the metropolis, at the great wealth accumulated in some districts of it, and at the enormous aggregation of poverty in others, those expenses which were not likely to lead to any abuse ought to be borne by the common fund of the whole metropolis. At the same time, he was glad that the Bill did not carry this principle further, for it would be dangerous to enact that the whole expenses of the poor of this great metropolis should be borne out of a common fund. If that system were adopted the management must necessarily become lax, while the expenses would be greatly augmented. He saw in this Bill another feature which afforded him great pleasure, and that was that Parliament had no longer that extreme jealousy of the Poor Law Board which it had so often evinced. At one time—more than once, he might say—the Poor Law Board had been looked on with such jealousy that it was difficult for them to carry any Bill through Parliament prolonging their existence. He was glad to see that by this Bill the powers of the Board were to be increased. He thought such an increase absolutely necessary for the proper management of the poor. The Poor Law Board which had always discharged its duties with diligence and care, whatever Ministry had been in office, should have the power of enforcing compliance with its orders. Unfortunately, at present they could only do so by mandamus in the Court of Queen's Bench, which was not a very easy or agreeable proceeding. Much as he valued the principle of local management, he thought Parliament had done wisely in saying that a central body should have the necessary power to compel the local authorities to carry out its rules and regulations. He trusted that the powers conferred by this measure would be sufficiently extensive, and in conclusion stated that he cordially supported the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

TRAFFIC REGULATION (METROPOLIS) BILL—(No. 46.)

(The Earl of Belmore.)

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order.)

THE EARL OF DENBIGH remarked that the effect of Clause 9 (Prohibition of Carriage of Advertisements) would be to throw out of employment about 700 persons who were now earning an honest livelihood by carrying advertisement boards about the street. He admitted that these board men—or “sandwiches” as they had been called—might, in some instances, be a great nuisance, and therefore they ought to be placed under proper control; at the same time, he thought it would be unjust to deprive these men of their means of subsistence. He therefore moved an Amendment to the 9th clause to the effect that no picture, print, board, placard, or notice should be carried or distributed in the streets except in such form and manner as might be approved by the Commissioner of Police.

Amendment moved, after (“Notice”) to insert (“except in such Form and Manner as may be approved of by the Commissioner of Police.”)—(The Earl of Denbigh.)

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, he was willing to accept the Amendment suggested by the noble Earl; but if they were inserted, he should move the insertion of other words also, which would prevent the distribution in the streets of papers or posters relating to medical subjects.

LORD STANLEY or ALDERLEY thought the clause was better as it stood.

On Question? their Lordships divided:—Contents 24; Not-Contents 16: Majority 8.

Amendment agreed to.

EARL GRANVILLE observed, that their Lordships were placed in a rather curious position. He heard other noble Lords had come down prepared to support the measure; but in the division just taken the Government had divided against a clause in their own Bill.

THE EARL OF BELMORE moved an Amendment prohibiting the exhibition of prints, &c., or the distribution of pamphlets and posters relating to medical subjects in the streets.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON suggested that it should be postponed till the third reading.

THE EARL OF BELMORE agreed to postpone the Amendment.

RAILWAY TRAFFIC PROTECTION BILL.
(No. 43.)—(The Lord Redesdale.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill."—(The Lord Redesdale.)

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, when this Bill was before the House on a former occasion, I understood from the noble Lord who has charge of the measure (Lord Redesdale) that he would not be unwilling to content himself with the second reading at that time, postponing its further progress to a period when, as we were informed was probable, a measure of a more complete and comprehensive description would be brought under our notice. As, however, the noble Lord has desired that we now should proceed with the Bill, I trust your Lordships will allow me to do what otherwise would not be necessary, to express the very great alarm which I feel at legislation which, as far as I remember, is entirely unprecedented. If this Bill proposed to deal with nothing more than debts contracted by railway companies at a future time, and did nothing more than prevent creditors from issuing executions upon railway property in respect of claims of that description, I should have nothing more to say than this—that it appeared to me a grave and difficult question whether we should allow great mercantile companies to contract debts without incurring the usual responsibility of being subjected, as regards their property, to executions at law. But that is not the nature of the Bill now before your Lordships, by any means. This Bill deals with debts which are already contracted. It takes up the case of creditors who have lent their money or supplied goods to railway companies, and who now are entitled to recover judgment and issue execution against the railway companies; and it absolutely prevents them from issuing execution upon any judgment which they may obtain. That is the operation of the Bill, which at present is limited to the 1st August next. I have always understood that in your Lordships' House one of the most sacred principles was that legislation, as affecting contracts already entered into, should not be retrospective. But this is not the only evil. On looking closely into this measure, I find that, not only does it affect the rights of creditors which already exist, but it raises an invidious distinction between one class of creditors and another. It takes away from one class of creditors the rights which they possess, and to another it preserves those rights intact. If your Lordships will refer to the Bill that you are asked to assent to, you will find that from the operation of the measure are entirely saved those executions that may be levied for the recovery of local rates. And not only so, but from the wording of this Bill it would have no operation upon Crown debts : and we all know that very large sums are due from railway companies to the Crown in respect of taxation and other charges on companies. It comes to this, therefore—that for local rates and Crown debts you leave the local and Imperial authorities perfectly free to issue executions against railway companies ; while you deprive the creditors who supplied, it may be, the very materials with which the line was made or with which it carries on its business of all means of enforcing their claims. It may be said that the enforcement of their rights is only postponed till August, and that after August the 1st they will be able to enforce their judgments. But when August arrives it is quite possible that the unfortunate creditors may be met with this answer—“No doubt, sufficient property was in existence at the time this Bill passed, but since then that property has been swept away in discharge of local rates and Imperial taxation.” What, then, is the reason given why this Bill should be assented to ? It is said that it would be of great public utility to save railway companies from executions being levied upon the rolling stock, lest the public traffic should be inconvenienced. That is to say, for a great public object you sacrifice the rights of the private creditor. You desire that a public object should be attained ; and, in order to attain, you sacrifice not the rights of the public, who are to be benefited, but the rights of the private creditor, who receives no benefit. I ask your Lordships to observe some of the effects which this Bill will have in depriving creditors of the means of recovering their debts. I take, for example, the very ordinary case of a railway leasing its line to another company on certain terms of yearly or quarterly payments. According to this measure, if the payments in respect of the leased line should be in arrear, the only means of recovering these will be absolutely withdrawn, though the lessees continue to receive the profits of the line. Again, what are your Lordships asked to do with regard to that large and important class of actions arising out of accidents upon railways, either in respect of carelessness in the carriage of goods, or of accidents to limb, possibly to life ? We are in the midst of the various assizes of the country, and in the annals of the different circuits we read every morning in the newspapers of considerable sums recovered against railway companies. The persons who recover those damages are sometimes the parties themselves who have been injured, and are frequently the families of those who have suffered, and who are themselves reduced, it may be, to very great distress and indigence consequent on the sudden withdrawal of their means of support. They have recovered judgment, they are ready to issue execution, they have no means of obtaining the money awarded except through the medium of an execution : and your Lordships are asked to prevent this execution from issuing, at all events till the month of August next, when there may not be monies enough remaining. I will go further. It may have been the fortune or misfortune of some of your Lordships to have had some of your land taken by railway companies. There is an erroneous impression abroad that a railway cannot take land without first paying for it ; but your Lordships know that if a railway company desires to take any land it has only to obtain the certificate of any two surveyors as to its value, pay the sum named into court, and then take possession. When the real price of the land is ascertained, however, it generally amounts to twice or thrice the sum paid into court on the certificate of the surveyors, and for that additional price the landowner has to bring an action or obtain a decree in equity to obtain the purchase money. In the meantime the land has been taken, the railway made and earning money upon it ; and yet when the landowner issues execution, your Lordships are asked to say that he shall not have his execution in satisfaction of his claim. There is, however, a still stronger case. There is too much reason to suppose that a great portion of the rolling stock at present possessed by the railways of the country is not paid for, but has been supplied on the credit of the company. I hope and believe that in most cases creditors are safe in giving credit ; but your Lordships are asked to protect railway companies in the enjoyment of that stock and their earnings by its means, but to cut off from the unpaid creditor, whose rolling stock it is, and for which he has not been paid, the means by which he could recover his money. Who, I ask, is to be benefited by this proposed legislation ? Are the shareholders ? There may be a railway company so utterly insolvent that it may be a temporary accommodation to it to have its rolling stock protected from execution; but the effect on a solvent company will be to go far to destroy its credit. My Lords, every railway company is obliged to have very large supplies of coal and oil, it has to pay for labour, and supply and replace rolling stock. At present solvent railway companies have no difficulty in obtaining all they require on credit, because those persons who supply these goods know perfectly well that when the time comes for payment and their claims are not met that they can at once levy execution and compel payment; but if that right is taken away they will refuse to give credit on the ground that the debenture-holders will sweep away the earnings and they will not consent to make supplies except on the terms of being paid in ready money. This Bill, if passed, will have a most serious effect on all the solvent railway companies in the country. The Bill by the preamble no doubt points to the benefit of debenture-holders; but if passed it will do little good even to them, for it takes away from them the right, whatever it may be, that at present exists, of issuing execution for the principal and interest overdue, and instead of their having a valuable security it will be considerably deteriorated. It is said that the public will be benefited; but I venture to think that the public are never benefited by anything which is not an adherence to contract and to the rights acquired by the members of the public; and I cannot imagine how the public can be benefited if you materially alter the law of contracts. These are matters deserving of great consideration before we make further progress with the Bill. I have another objection against the Bill. This Bill appears to me to deal with nothing more than the merest fragment of one of the greatest and most important questions your Lordships can be called upon to consider. We have many millions invested in railway shares, and in debentures, and there is also a large floating unsecured railway debt. It is manifest to your Lordships from the progress of events that sooner or later—and I venture to think it cannot be done too soon—it will be necessary to consider not merely the interests of one particular class, but the whole subject. The legislation with regard to railways has gone on for some time upon the old and antiquated idea that a railway is a public highway; and that all you had to do was to set the highway going and then everybody would be able to pass over it and the railway company would have nothing to do but to guard the highway. But this idea has vanished for some years, and we have now got the great carrying trade of the country monopolised by and centred in the railway companies. They have become in the progress of years great commercial undertakings, and we have to consider whether we are prepared to sanction the continuance of these great commercial undertakings on a footing different from all other commercial undertakings of the country. What would be said if it were proposed with regard to any other trading undertaking that it should be carried on with impunity against execution for debts? That would be impossible; and yet your Lordships cannot fail to observe that virtually this is the principle which is introduced into this Bill. I entreat your Lordships—I entreat the noble Lord who has introduced this Bill, whose great wisdom and experience on questions of this kind no one more readily recognises than myself, to pause in the progress of this measure until we have before us that which we are likely to have before long—namely, a comprehensive measure which can be considered with care and attention as a whole, and which I trust may, in its reception by the Legislature, have some beneficial effect in settling this large and most difficult question.

LORD REDESDALE said, he felt he had a most difficult task to perform in answering the searching argument of the noble and learned Lord who was so experienced a pleader, and knew so well how to express what he felt in the most complete and comprehensive manner. But, in the first place, he submitted that the chief object of the Bill was to allow the more comprehensive measure to proceed unimpeded. At the present moment nothing would impede that legislation more than a seizure of the rolling stock of any important railway by any one creditor or body of creditors. It could not be said that solvent railways would be damaged by it, because almost all the solvent railway companies in the kingdom desired it to pass. Even the most important companies, who, as far as regards income and expenditure, were perfectly solvent, but who found great difficulty in raising money to meet debentures and other liabilities, which were on the point of falling in, looked with great apprehension to the consequences of the possible seizure of their line or rolling stock. The answer to the many suppositions cases conceived by the noble and learned Lord was the same. The Bill was simply designed as a temporary measure to prevent an evil which was imminent as long as the whole class of railway evils remained without any effectual remedy. Nor could it be said that the security of the creditors would be depreciated by the passing of this Bill; it was important above all things that the earnings of a company should be protected, and that the ability of the company to make profit should be continued. Without the protection which the Bill proposed to afford, the whole security of creditors might be rendered worthless by the stoppage of a line. Take the means away and the whole became worthless. If an unpaid landowner seized the line, it ceased to work and nothing was earned; and although that individual landowner might get satisfaction none of his fellow creditors could hope to do so:—and, in the same manner, the money required for the interest of the debenture-holders, the payment of wages, and other matters would be wanting. He most decidedly differed from the noble and learned Lord that railways were not public highways. He held that they were, and Parliament acted on that principle with regard to them, although, for the convenience of the public, they would be more beneficial to the public, by companies undertaking the working of them. It had been held that railways were granted for the public benefit, and that one class of creditors had not the power of stopping the line. Now, he thought that principle ought to be applied to every creditor as well as to one class; and Parliament, when it granted borrowing powers to railways, intended that the lenders should have the best remedy for the recovery of their money, though it might have turned out in regard to the working of the Acts that those remedies did not belong to them. He thought the principle of the decision recently given by the noble and learned Lord, that debenture-holders had not the remedy of seizing the rolling stock, ought to be applied to all other classes of creditors, because, whatever might be the strict construction of many Acts, there was no doubt Parliament had intended that debenture-holders should have the same rights as other creditors. Although on abstract grounds it might appear unfair that creditors should be deprived of their present remedy, the proposal was a fair one as affecting the bulk of persons to whom railway companies were indebted, and the rejection of the measure would increase the depression which now prevailed, and would prevent companies from raising money on reasonable terms. He should, however, place himself in the hands of their Lordships, and if they desired that the Bill should be postponed or abandoned it would be useless for him to press it.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE thought the noble and learned Lord had conjured up a number of imaginary injuries which might befall creditors, but had not sufficiently considered the injury which a railway would sustain by the seizure of its rolling stock and the suspension of its traffic. The consequences to the entire body of creditors, whether shareholders, debenture-holders, or ordinary creditors, would be ruinous in the extreme. At the present moment there were so many railway companies under difficulties caused by the peculiar state of the law with regard to the different rights and claims of debenture-holders, that it was almost impossible for any railway, however solvent (except in the case of the very large railway companies which were paying good dividends), to renew their debentures. There were, in fact, many large railways which could not and did not know how to get money for that purpose. The present condition of the whole of the railway companies arose from the state of the money-market; and the emergency was such that the only means of relief was in passing a measure similar to that then before their Lordships. The railways had got the monopoly of the traffic of the country, and the inconvenience and injury to the public from a stoppage of the traffic would be enormous. This was only a temporary measure to prevent such a disastrous state of things arising before Parliament could pass a comprehensive Bill to put matters on a more satisfactory footing. The comprehensive measure which had been spoken of was yet in nubibus, and if it should get into Parliament it was impossible to say whether it would pass. If, however, it did, the present Bill would present no hindrance to it, and indeed he believed it was calculated to facilitate its passage.

LORD CRANWORTH said, there was no doubt some force in the objections to allowing the rolling stock of a railway to be taken in execution; but his noble and learned Friend had convinced him that, whatever course their Lordships might take, it ought not to be such as would lead the public to believe that for any purpose whatever their Lordships' House would initiate that which was a positive injustice to present creditors. There were persons who no doubt had sold rolling stock to railway companies upon the faith that they would get paid in the ordinary way, and for Parliament to say that they should not be paid between this time and the 1st of August, might bring ruin and bankruptcy upon many. Whatever inconveniences might arise he hoped, for the honour of their Lordships' House, they would refuse to sanction a measure of so unjust a character.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, he trusted the noble Lord would not proceed with the Bill, for it was doubtful whether it would obviate the inconveniences anticipated, and it might possibly act prejudicially both to solvent and to embarrassed companies. They might prevent by this Bill the seizure of rolling stock between this time and the 1st of August; but during that period debentures would require to be renewed; and it would be difficult to obtain an advance of money, even in the case of perfectly sound and solvent railway companies, when the nature of the security was in any possible doubt. If this Bill were passed, capitalists would naturally hesitate to advance money for the repayment of which the only practically available security had been placed in abeyance. If the whole law of debtor and creditor as regarded these large undertakings were placed in abeyance for some months, what security would capitalists have that it might not be altered again? The result, therefore, of the Bill would be to depreciate railway securities and to raise the rate of interest which lenders would require, and this might place in embarrassment many companies that were at present able to meet their obligations, by absorbing the margin which now existed between receipts and expenditure. Was the evil anticipated so great as to demand and justify so extreme a remedy and so doubtful a policy? He did not think the inconvenience to the public from the seizure of rolling stock could be so great as had been supposed, because the rolling stock was only available for use on railway lines, and adjoining lines having also rolling stock and the right to run over those lines would find it to be to their interest to prevent any stoppage of the traffic, when the traffic was worth carrying. There was hardly any case in which adjoining railways had not a powerful interest in the traffic and interests of the principal lines, and which would not suffer proportionally by the seizure of the rolling stock and the stoppage of the traffic. Believing, then, that the Bill if passed would be a cause of great difficulty and embarrassment to solvent as well as insolvent companies, he urged upon the noble Lord seriously to consider the propriety of postponing the further progress of the Bill until the measure on the general subject before the other House of Parliament had come before their Lordships.

LORD REDESDALE said, after what had fallen from the noble Duke, and the general expression of opinion, he had no wish to press the Bill through Committee. He certainly, however, did not think that the measure was looked upon with an evil eye by railway companies generally. He should, therefore, assent to the withdrawal of the measure.

EARL GREY thought that the noble Lord was perfectly right in withdrawing the Bill. He wished, however, to be informed when it was likely the measure of the Government would be before their Lordships' House. Although he disapproved of the present temporary Bill, he nevertheless thought that the present state of the railway interests was such as to demand not only very grave but very prompt consideration. When they considered the many important questions to be disposed of by the other House of Parliament—considering that besides the financial business before them that House was also engaged in remodelling the Constitution—it appeared to him that there was very little hope of the general measure on this subject being speedily submitted to their Lordships. It was, he thought, to be regretted that that measure had not been initiated in their Lordships' House, when they would have had the valuable assistance of many noble and learned Lords who were thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and were great authorities upon it.

Then the said Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

INCREASE OF EPISCOPATE BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for enabling Her Majesty and Her Majesty's Successors to erect Three additional Sees in England, and for providing Assistance to Bishops disabled by Age or other Infirmary—Was presented by The Lord LYTTELTON; read 1<sup>o</sup>. (No. 51.)

QUESTION.

LORD HENRY THYNNE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he proposes to call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to those magistrates who have been reported on by the Commissioners who lately sat on the corrupt boroughs, as being privy and assenting to corrupt practices, with a view of their being struck off the several Commissions of the Peace to which they may belong?

MR. WALPOLE, in reply, said, he was not acquainted with the facts of the case to which the noble Lord's Question alluded.

BENGAL—QUESTION.

MR. J. PEEL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been directed to a report which has been published in the newspapers of the intended amalgamation of the Banks of Bombay and Bengal: and, whether any change is contemplated in the arrangements now existing between the Indian Government and those establishments?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, his attention had been called to a short paragraph which appeared in the City Article of one of the newspapers some time ago to that effect, but the Government had received no official communication from India on the subject; and he was unable to say whether the Indian Government contemplated any change in the existing arrangements with regard to it.

HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT—THE RE-PORTERS' GALLERY.—QUESTION.

MR. BRADY said, he had a Question to put to the noble Lord the Chief Commissioner of Works on this subject which required a word of explanation. He understood there were some thirty seats in the Reporters' Gallery. He regretted that there was not a great number more. All those seats were appropriated to the metropolitan morning papers, to the entire exclusion, he believed, of the weekly London papers and also of the English provincial papers, as well as of the whole Irish and Scottish press, and to which it was therefore felt that great injury was done by that arrangement. He desired, therefore, to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Why it happens that, while accommodation is provided for the representatives of the London Press in the Reporters' Gallery, the representatives of the Irish and Scotch journals are excluded from all facilities for reporting the proceedings of the House?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in reply, that the Reporters' Gallery of that House was under the management of the Serjeant-at-Arms, and he had every reason to believe that officer paid every attention to the comfort and convenience of the gentlemen who had duties to discharge there. It was true the accommodation there was very limited; but the desire was that the arrangements which were made should be such as would be most conducive to the convenience of all organs of public opinion, whether they were printed in London, in the Provinces, or in Ireland, or Scotland. And although, owing to the confined space, it was impossible to accommodate more than the reporters of the London press, yet it was well known that arrangements existed by which certain representatives of the London morning journals also acted for the leading newspapers of Dublin, Glasgow, and Edinburgh. In addition to that, there were telegraphic summaries of the debates sent to such of the provincial papers that required them. The provincial journals were thus enabled to publish, simultaneously with the London papers, ample reports of what took place in that House.

MR. BRADY said, he would appeal to the noble Lord to enlarge the space set apart for reporters.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the subject should receive careful consideration; but he was not prepared off-hand to say that the space could be enlarged.

CASE OF MR. CHURCHWARD.
QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor), Whether he will enlarge his Motion for an Address to the Crown to remove Mr. Churchward from the Commission of the Peace so as to include all magistrates who have been found guilty of, or consenting or privy to, corrupt practices by Bribery Commissions?

MR. TAYLOR said, he thought the hon. Member could hardly be serious in the question he asked. He (Mr. Taylor) had given a notice of a specific character in regard to a specific case, of the circumstances of which he had done his best to make himself master; but the hon. Member now asked him to deal with cases of which he knew nothing. If, however, the hon. Member himself would bring forward and prove those other cases, he would undertake to give him his support.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would give notice that he intended to move an Amendment to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.
QUESTION.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY said, that on a former occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that if the House should be of opinion that it would not be convenient to couple legislation on this subject with the measure of the Government relating to the franchise and the re-distribution of seats, he would personally undertake in a separate Bill for dealing with it on the very same night. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman had unintentionally and inadvertently violated the letter of the pledge which he then gave. He wished therefore to ask him, Whether he was prepared to redeem the spirit of that pledge by introducing a Bill for the prevention of Bribery and Corruption at Elections; and when he intended to do so?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope to be able to lay the Bill on the table before the holydays. I cannot exactly say on what day.

Mr. Brady

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY: Will it not be before the second reading of the Representation of the People Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have made inquiries, and I find that that would be impossible.

BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. BRIGHT: I beg, Sir, to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and possibly he may object that I have not given him notice of it. If therefore he cannot answer it to-night, perhaps he will reply to it on Thursday, though I hope he will be able to give an answer at once. The reason I put the question is because it may affect the views and course of a good many Gentlemen on this side of the House on Monday evening next. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether, after the expression of opinion last night with regard to an important portion of his proposition—I mean what is called the dual voting—he intends to adhere to that proposal of the Bill, and whether he considers it an important and essential portion of his measure?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have no objection whatever to answer the hon. Gentleman's Question at present, and I do not wish him to put it off till Thursday. The Bill which I asked leave to introduce yesterday is only just in the possession of hon. Members. I wish them to consider it; and I think, when we discuss it on the second reading, when every important part of it has been fairly considered by both sides of the House, that is the legitimate occasion on which to express an opinion on a point so important.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have several Questions, Sir, to put to the Government with reference to this Bill; and they differ from that of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), inasmuch as they do not touch any matter of policy, but only ask for information. The right hon. Gentleman having truly said that the Bill was in our hands only this morning, I have not been able to give him notice of my Questions; but I shall be most happy to place them on the votes in case he finds it inconvenient to answer them on my reading them over to him. My Questions, Sir, are these—the Bill of the Government, are to be the same for occupiers of the value of £10 and upwards as for occupiers under £10 ; or, if not, in what respect they differ ?

Secondly, Whether it is intended by the Bill that the occupying franchise in Boroughs, which now depends upon the occupation of "any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building," is henceforward to depend upon the occupation of dwelling houses exclusively ?

Thirdly, Whether the total number of male occupiers stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech on Monday consisted exclusively of the occupiers of dwelling houses ?

Fourthly, Whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the table their estimates of the numbers of Voters to be enfranchised under the several Clauses of the Bill, together with the data, so far as they think fit, upon which such estimates are framed ?

And lastly, Whether an occupier claiming to be registered under Clause 34, when a composition or other reduced rate on the premises has been duly paid by his landlord, must, in order to be registered, pay the difference between such reduced rate and the rate which would have been chargeable upon him if directly rated ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : Sir, it is impossible for me to give an answer to those Questions at once. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman had better lay them on the table, so that I may see them in print before I reply to them.

MR. GLADSTONE : Shall I put them on the Notice Paper for to-morrow ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : Yes, for to-morrow.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, he wished to put a Question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer somewhat of the same nature as that which was addressed to him by the hon. Member for Birmingham. That hon. Gentleman desired to know whether the Government regarded the principle of dual voting as an essential part of their scheme of Reform ; and whether, if that proposal were negatived by the House, it would be regarded by them as fatal to the principle of their Bill. Now, he hoped the Government — ["Order, order !"]

MR. SPEAKER : The hon. Member is quite in order in addressing a Question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer ; but not in entering into any discussion on the subject.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE : The Question he wished to put was, Whether or not the last Government, in dealing with Reform, having refused to answer any inquiry as to the course they would take in the event of certain parts of their Bill being rejected, the present Government would not best consult their own honour — ["Order, order !"]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : I think, Sir, the proper mode of dealing with these Questions is to give the explanation which may be deemed necessary in fair discussion, when my Colleagues and myself have an opportunity of generally reviewing the whole subject. I cannot help being of opinion that by answering those Questions now, when such an opportunity does not present itself, we may give a very false impression as to the motives by which we are actuated and the object which we desire to attain. It is only when we can avail ourselves of such opportunities as that to which I have referred that the Government will be able clearly to indicate the policy upon which they mean to proceed.

QUESTION.

MR. BAGGE said, he rose to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Mr. William Henry Leatham is the same Mr. Leatham who was found personally guilty of bribery by an Election Committee of this House after the General Election of 1859, and ordered by this House to be prosecuted by Mr. Attorney General ; whether Mr. Philip Vanderbyl, who is stated in the Great Yarmouth Commission Report to have entered into a corrupt agreement with a Mr. Brogden that, in the event of his being returned, he would repay the said Mr. Brogden one-half the money advanced by him for the purposes of bribery ; whether Mr. E. W. Watkin, who is mentioned in the Report of the Great Yarmouth Commission and is included in the list, Schedule D, of persons having given bribes at the Election in that Borough in 1859 : and, whether Mr. Alfred Seymour, who is mentioned in the Report of the Totnes Commission as having been privy and assenting to the corrupt practices that prevailed at that Election, are Members of this House, and, if justices of the peace, it is the intention of the Government to remove them from the several Commissions to which they belong?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Questions put to me by my hon. Friend are Questions which it is no doubt very difficult to answer; because in the annals of jurisprudence there is, it appears to me, no circumstance more startling than the frequent instances of mistaken identity. I think therefore, Sir, that any individual occupying at the present day so responsible a position as that which I have the honour to hold, ought to be extremely cautious in giving an opinion on matters with regard to which such mistakes might occur. There is certainly a startling similarity in the names which have been quoted by my hon. Friend, and those which are habitually used by some Members of this House. But then if, on the other hand, I were to judge of the accuracy of the views on this point, which he seems to entertain by the general tone of expression and conduct of the gentlemen to whom I suppose he refers, I should say, looking at the unquestioned purity of their motives, the highly liberal tone which they always adopt, and the readiness which they invariably show in condemning anything like Tory corruption, there is prima facie evidence that they cannot really be the same persons. I regard it to be my duty, as Leader of the House, to give all the information I can to its Members, and to suggest to them on all occasions the most practical means of securing the object they wish to attain. I would, then, suggest to my hon. Friend that a Select Committee might furnish a better mode of ascertaining the truth in this instance, than any information which I have it in my power to supply.

MR. WATKIN: Sir, I rely upon the good feeling of the House and its love of fair play on both sides, to allow me to read a letter I addressed to the Lord Chancellor this morning, and which as I furnished a copy to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer I had hoped he would have read, and so saved me the trouble of making any explanation to the House. I perfectly agree with the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bagge), that a man who would either give a bribe himself or wilfully and knowingly suffer a bribe to be given on his behalf, was not worthy to hold Her Majesty's Commission. The moment I saw the notice it struck me that the most honourable and manly course for me to pursue—and allow me to say that in following an honourable or manly course it is not necessary for me to take lessons in propriety from hon. Gentlemen opposite—was to immediately address the Lord Chancellor, and I accordingly wrote to his Lordship as follows:—

“House of Commons, March 19, 1867.

“My Lord,—I respectfully apply to your Lordship to order a full inquiry into my personal conduct as impugned in the Report of the Great Yarmouth Commissioners. I entertain the opinion that any man who would himself give a bribe, and knowingly or wilfully would enable, or would knowingly countenance bribery and corruption, commits a serious offence, and the fact that persons in high places may have been led into such an offence would not justify my honour or conscience did I feel myself fairly open to accusation. When the Commissioners first assembled, I think in August last, I volunteered to give evidence, but I regret to say that I was not called till October. I was my own voluntary accuser of an imprudence and indiscretion which I would rather exaggerate than excuse, and the blame of which I will not seek to lay at the door of others who might have protected me. In volunteering evidence, I felt it my duty in the public interest to assist the labours of the Commissioners, however far truth might compel me to inculcate myself, and I shall never regret the step I took, although it has enabled a more unjust and ungenerous report, which I challenge as contrary and in excess of the evidence as regards myself. The moment the Report was printed I drew up a notice for a further and a searching inquiry, but under the advice of friends, both in and out of the House, I postponed giving it. The discussion as to one of your Lordship's recent appointments has led to various notices en revanche, and although I might pass them by as factions and unworthy, I am impressed with the gravity of the question which lies behind; and therefore, in now respectfully applying to your Lordship, I beg to say that I shall refrain from acting as a magistrate until I learn your Lordship's decision.—I have the honour to remain, &c.”

MR. VANDERBYL: I think, Sir, the introduction of my name into this Question was totally uncalled for. The hon. Member for West Norfolk must be sufficiently well acquainted with the constitution of the House to know that I am a Member. With regard to the second part of the Question, as I am not in the Commission of the Peace I have nothing to do with it, and I cannot see what was the use of introducing my name into the Question. I think it is pretty well known that there must have been some peculiar motive which has induced the hon. Gentleman to put this Question upon the Paper.

FIRE INSURANCE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN rose to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, a further reduction of the Duty on Fire Insurances would have a tendency to bring within the protection of Insurance a large amount of the present uninsured property of the Country, and that a further reduction of the Duty should therefore be made at the earliest opportunity."

He said: There was nothing contained in this Resolution that was new to the House. The House had on more than one occasion given its assent to Resolutions having for their object the reduction of the duty on fire insurance. In the course of the various discussions which had taken place on this subject in former years, the House had stated its opinion to be that if a considerable reduction in this duty were to be immediately effected great results to the revenue might be expected; and it had, under every circumstance, and notwithstanding the arguments used by those who opposed a reduction of the duty, affirmed the proposition that it was of consequence to the country that this duty should not remain at its present amount. He did not think that the House would require any apology from him for bringing this question before it at this time; as the only chance which he, or any independent Member of that House, had of obtaining a reduction of any particular duty was to submit for the consideration of the House, prior to the introduction of the general financial scheme of the Government, a Resolution of the nature he proposed. After the ample discussion the question had undergone in previous years, he should not think it necessary to repeat the figures and arguments which he had more than once submitted to the House. The House had invariably come to the conclusion that the duty was excessive, and could not on fiscal grounds be maintained; that it ought to be materially reduced, and that the reduction ought to be direct and immediate. He should then confine himself to a very brief statement of the arguments on which he and those who agreed with him generally relied for a reduction of the duty on fire insurance. He had the misfortune at the time to which he referred to come into conflict with the right hon. Gentleman who was then the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone), and who had large financial plans of his own for the amelioration of the burdens on the people of this country. Therefore no arguments that he (Mr. Sheridan) used could induce the right hon. Gentleman to look at a subsidiary question like this before he had accomplished his own great designs. But at length, yielding to the pressure of the House, the right hon.

Gentleman consented to consider this question, and he proposed a reduction of a qualified character upon stock-in-trade. The objectors to the tax had invariably objected to the peculiar unfairness which characterized the levying of the duty. But having consented to a reduction to 1*s.* 6*d.* on stock-in-trade, the right hon. Gentleman was induced, by a further Resolution of this House, to extend the reduction generally to all descriptions of property, and now the duty on all descriptions of insurable property stood at 1*s.* 6*d.* per cent. It was entirely an experiment on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. The persons who advocated the reduction had invariably urged that the duty should not be more than 1*s.*, many said 6*d.* was sufficient, and some indeed proposed 1*d.* The reduction to 1*s.* 6*d.* was a great reduction, but it had brought about an increase in the amount insured of £145,000,000. If from that amount was deducted the increase which might naturally be expected from the increase of wealth in the country, some definite conclusion would be arrived at. The Report of the Inland Revenue showed there was an increase of £65,000,000 more than was to be expected under former circumstances. But it could not be expected that this small increase would satisfy the advocates of a reduction, for they held the belief that unless the reduction was made of a wide and sweeping character, no perceptible influence would be exercised on the revenue. Therefore, he maintained that the 1*s.* 6*d.* was an experiment rather than adopted in obedience to the wishes of this House. The country was still anxious for further reduction. The House had only to refer to the petitions presented to this House to satisfy themselves that such was the case. During some two or three years nearly 1,000 petitions were presented. There were 300 this Session alone. They were not the petitions of ordinary persons, who signed without distinctly understanding their nature; but the petitions of Town Councillors, merchants, magistrates, persons in official position, and generally taxpayers. No less than 466 petitions had been presented within the last two years from Chambers of Commerce and Town Councils under their corporate seal. Also from Insurance Companies and Agents. They all favoured the object he had in view, and they favoured it mostly on this ground: that it was unlike any other tax in our fiscal system—it exhibited unfairness in a most unequivocal manner. It taxed one man and let off another. All other duties—on sugar, tea, tobacco, spirits—were different; in this instance the prudent and saving man was taxed, while the imprudent escaped. It was not a tax upon property, but upon a principle of action, upon the doctrine of insurance. Unlike other taxes, too, its effect was to weaken itself; because it taxed the man who desired to take care of property which was valuable, not only to himself, but to the country. If uninsured property was destroyed by fire the loser was often unable to pay either Imperial taxes or local rates, and might, indeed, sink from a thriving tradesman into a miserable pauper. The object of the Legislature should rather be to give a man a bonus to insure than levy a tax upon him for so doing. It should rather tax the man who did not insure. Property insured was of the greatest possible value—of as much value to the country almost as to the owner. It was a security for numberless taxes, for Government taxes, for metropolitan and other improvement rates, for poor rates, and other local burdens. It was so much realized wealth. There was no nation in Europe which imposed a tax of this kind like England. It was a tax upon an idea, a sentiment, an intention, an unfulfilled resolution, upon a desire to provide one's self against a terrible social calamity. It would be far better to tax the amount insured than the small deposits. Those deposits, in some cases, had been paid for over fifty years, and yet not the smallest result been gained; therefore he contended it was unjust to tax them. The tax upon insurance was a tax upon an idea, it was a tax upon a mere expectation that if property were insured against fire, something would be obtained for the money expended on insurance. But if no fire took place nothing would be obtained by the insurer. Mr. Newmarch said it would be just as sensible to tax a person who deposited, say, 1s. 6d. at a time in a money box to provide against a rainy day, as to tax a person who deposited money in an insurance office to provide against fire. It would be just as sensible to tax the inclination of a testator to leave a legacy as to impose a tax on insurers against fire. And if the Government must tax ideas, it would be better to tax vice rather than virtue. But it could never be contended that it was necessary for the support of the Government to put taxes upon prudence. This tax had been condemned by all writers on political economy, by the Insurance Companies and their agents, by public opinion, and by the press. He proposed nothing to alarm the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He merely said it was expedient a further reduction of duty should take place. He proposed to reduce the duty from 1s. 6d. to 1s. during the next year, commencing at the June quarter, and in the following year again to reduce 6d., leaving the duty a sixpenny duty. By the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue it appeared that four quarters' receipts of the duty at 1s. 6d., up to September, 1866, had amounted to £989,673. If they took this as a basis of calculation, and assumed that subsequent receipts would be on the same scale, the calculation would stand thus:—A reduction to 1s. from the 25th of June 1867, would give: One quarter at present rate, from March to June, at 1s. 6d., £247,000; three quarters, from June to March, 1868, at 1s., £495,000. The natural increase was now £50,000; with reduced duty the increase would be £100,000. The receipts for the year ending March 1868, would be £842,000; that would entail a loss the first year of (in round numbers) £147,000. In the second year the first quarter would again be at the 1s. rate—namely, one quarter, from March to June 1868, at 1s., would produce £190,000; three quarters, from June to March 1869, at 6d., £285,000. Assume the increase to be from this reduction £100,000 more than the present increase at the unreduced rate, that would give £150,000; making the receipts for the year ending March 1869, £625,000. The loss in the two years would amount to £511,000. And it might be fairly estimated that the revenue would continue at that rate to increase steadily, until a larger amount than at present received was produced. He proposed to leave the matter entirely in the hands of the right hon. Gentlemen the Chancellor of the Exchequer, merely suggesting to him the propriety of reducing this tax from 1s. 6d. to 1s. per cent on the sum assured from the June quarter, and from 1s. to 6d. in the following year. Such a reduction would not only satisfy those who petitioned the House, but would gratify the general wishes of the country, whilst a great boon would be conferred upon—nay, simple justice would be done to—the insuring public.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, a further reduction of the Duty on Fire Insurances would have a tendency to bring within the protection of Insurance a large amount of the present uninsured property of the Country, and that a further reduction of the Duty should therefore be made at the earliest opportunity.”—(Mr. Henry B. Sheridan.)

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that the hon. Gentleman had acted most consistently in bringing this question before the House, and he had done great good on former occasions by bringing it forward. He regretted, however, that the hon. Gentleman had brought the matter forward on this occasion; because, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, a Committee had recently been appointed to inquire into the whole of the system pursued by insurance companies, and as to the best means of securing property from fire. The property in the metropolis was worth £900,000,000. Only about one-third of that was insured. The insurance companies were the only parties who protected property in the metropolis. That cost them £25,000 a year. If the owners of the uninsured property could be induced to insure it, the insurance companies would then be able to expend £75,000 a year in protecting the property of the metropolis. He thought the Government ought to protect the property of the country against fire, as the French Government protected property in France. The French Government protected not only the property but the lives of the people against fire. Last year he believed there were 1,200 or 1,300 fires in the metropolis, attended with great loss of life! Therefore this was an important Imperial question, which materially affected the Government, and which must be carefully investigated by the Committee on Fires. They might as well put a tax on fenders and fireguards as upon insurances against fire. The insurance rate was so high that he had known cases in which it was found that the destruction of property by fire caused less outlay than the insurance of it would have cost. He spoke of farm buildings in his own county. The small amount of property insured in this country proved at once that there was something wrong in this tax. He thought the tax ought to be abolished altogether. Whatever it produced to the revenue, he thought it was a vicious tax. It would be as just to tax the arms by which a man defended his life, as to tax insurance against fire. The loss of life by fire in the metropolis and in many large towns was lamentable; and he thought the Government, as in great cities abroad, ought to be the parties to whom the people should look for protection against fire instead of actually making a profit out of insurance. This question had always been brought forward by the hon. Gentleman with great ability, and he had always supported him. Still, he could not but think that it was not opportune so soon after the appointment of the Committee on Fires to have brought it forward now, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not ask the House to divide.

MR. HUBBARD said, he was not only opposed to the duty on fire insurance, but also to the duty on marine insurance. He would venture to ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his Motion, not because the subject required investigation, but because it had been so often investigated. He thought the obnoxious nature of this tax had been fully acknowledged by public men on both sides of the House, and the House itself had repeatedly expressed a wish for its abolition. The total abolition of the tax was a mere question of time. It was due, however, to the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that at this moment the proposal should not be forced upon him. He could not doubt that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was exceedingly desirous of meeting every fair claim, and of redressing every grievance that might be brought under his notice. Not long since the right hon. Gentleman had yielded to the representations of Irish Members in reference to the extension of time for the repayment of loans to Irish railways; and no doubt in the matter of the tax on insurance he would be equally ready to listen to the views that might be pressed upon him.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, my hon. Friend who has just sat down has made an appeal to the hon. Member for Dudley to withdraw his Motion, and has founded that appeal upon the conviction he entertains that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make provisions for complying with the wish which the hon. Member says this House has repeatedly expressed that the tax upon insurance shall not continue. I do not think the hon. Gentleman is accurate in his declaration that the House has more than once expressed a desire for a reduction of this tax. I do not think such an opinion has been expressed since the reduction of the tax to 1s. 6d. I shall be glad if the hon. Member for Dudley withdraws his Motion; and the opinion that I shall express in reference to the tax is not one which ought to deter him from that course. I would object to any Motion the effect of which would be to fetter the discretion of the House in forming its impartial judgment when the revenue and Estimates are before us, as to whether we have any means of granting remissions, and if so, what those remissions should be. Both in office and out of office I have uniformly contended for that principle. It is a very disagreeable office which the Finance Minister has to perform, in interfering with the very natural, reasonable, and often very legitimate desires of hon. Gentlemen with regard to particular taxes. That Minister has to hear many representations of grievances, those who come to him caring only for their own particular grievances; and, as happened at the doors of Westminster Hall on Monday morning, those who came to hear the Minister tried to outrun each other, and none of them cared what became of those who were left behind. I do not wish that the repeal of this tax should depend upon the energy or activity of the Members who are the advocates of such repeals; but that it should depend in part upon the judgment of the Government, who must take the initiative, and supremely upon the judgment of the House. To make it satisfactory to the country it is in general necessary, though there may be cases of exception under extraordinary circumstances, that that judgment should be formed by the House when it has the opportunity of considering at once and comprehensively the whole state of the finances, and of balancing one claim against another. Upon that ground I hope that the House will not accede to the Motion. In any case, I feel it my duty to support the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the discharge of a disagreeable duty, from which I understand he does not intend to shrink. The principal error—if he will forgive me for using the term respecting one who has so deeply studied the question—into which I think the hon. Member for Dudley has fallen, is, that if the tax were reduced the revenue would be recovered through the augmentation in the number of insurances. That, I contend, is an entire delusion. The reduction of taxes on articles of consumption affecting the masses of the people enormously widens the field of consumption; and we know from experience that those reductions—great as they have been—result in a positive increase of revenue even on the article itself. The Customs revenue of the present year—after the vast operations performed on it—will be almost larger than in former years. But this is not true with respect to taxes upon property. I know no case in which loss caused by the reduction of taxes upon property has been recovered. Let us not, therefore, entertain expectations that cannot be realized, but look to the case as it stands. I think my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham has distinctly shown to us two things: first of all, that this is a tax upon property; and secondly, that it is a bad tax upon property. Still, in the present relative position of the taxes upon property and upon labour, it is a serious matter to abandon taxes upon property without obtaining compensation from other taxes upon property. I own, and I will even urge, that the tax upon insurance demands, upon the first convenient opportunity, the consideration of the Government; and that the object of that consideration should be, in the first place, to reduce that tax itself to a point so low that it cannot be a sensible restraint upon insurance. We might, perhaps, meet the objection to relieving property from taxation while taxes press so heavily upon labour which has so much higher claims to reduction by finding another means of taxing property in lieu of it—means that would be equal instead of unequal. It should not be a tax upon the virtue of prudence, but should be entirely independent of it, leaving that virtue to operate thoroughly in its own field. We should leave the whole community to insure their buildings, and everything requiring to be insured, I will not say without a tax, because our condition requires us to tax those transactions of trade and industry that are the life and vigour of the community. I would not, therefore, propose a total exemption, for that would strike at the root of the whole system of taxes, with which we cannot dispense; but we might go down to something so near the nature of a nominal rate as to make insurance easy, but couple with it the condition that we ought not to make that the opportunity for relieving property, the taxes upon which at this moment are anything but extravagant, and which have been lightened by the reduction of the income tax. Leaving property to bear its burdens, we should accede when possible to the reduction of the tax to a low point, analogous to some of the small taxes which are so low that they do not interfere with the transactions to which they relate. I strongly support the Government in refusing to give a pledge that will fetter the future discretion of the House, while I hope that in a proper manner, and in conjunction with other collateral arrangements, the existence of this tax, with the evils it produces, will receive the early attention of those competent to deal with it.

MR. HADFIELD said, he should support the Motion, the adoption of which he thought would induce a larger number of persons whose property was now uninsured to provide against losses which would result from fire. He did not see that there was any difficulty in the way of the Government giving a pledge that at as early a period as possible the tax would be reduced. He considered the tax immoral, injurious, and intolerable, and could not long rest on its present footing.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he should support the Motion. The hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. H. B. Sheridan) had to contend with the usual obstacle which beset private Members when pleading for the remission or reduction of a duty—the inconvenience which the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being would be sure to insist would result from choosing so inopportune a time for the proposal. But for the perseverance of the hon. Member for Dudley, there would have been no reduction of the duty. He was right in enforcing the consideration of the subject again on the House; because, from the reduction having been insufficient, the question had not had a fair trial. The effect of the tax at the present time was that a vast amount of property was uninsured; the owners being deterred from insuring by the excessive tax they would have to pay for so doing. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had stated that he had never known a case in which the reduction of a tax upon property had been followed by recovery; but the right hon. Gentleman had forgotten the case of the income tax. When a high rate prevailed there was a great amount of evasion of the tax; but when the rate was lowered a greater amount in proportion was received.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I do not intend to enter into the merits of the question, and I must reserve my opinion upon it until the proper time arrives; but I must ask the House to support me in resisting the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. It appears to me that it is extremely inconvenient, and I think disadvantageous to the public service, that upon the eve of a statement of the general condition of the finances of the country, and the consequences of that condition, the House should be called upon to pledge itself to a Resolution of this kind, which must not only be a source of great embarrassment to the Minister, but also to the House. The House has had experience of the inconvenience of Resolutions of this general character — as, for example, that in regard to the income tax; and I trust the House, recollecting that, will not sanction further a course which every one connected with the finances has found to be inconvenient. The hon. Gentleman has had an opportunity of placing before the House his views upon the matter. It is a question which he completely understands, and always expounds with great ability; and if, after mature consideration, the House should agree with him, it will be due to the information which he has placed before them, and which may influence their judgment. But what I ask the House to do is, that they should keep themselves perfectly free as to the course which they may see fit to sanction when they are in complete possession of the financial condition of the country. It is said that the House may, by waiting for the financial statement, lose the opportunity of expressing its opinion on what should be the financial policy of the Government. That, however, hardly applies to existing circumstances. When the statement is placed before the House it will have sufficient power to control any course which it may think fit to suggest. Such course will depend upon the wisdom and expediency of the recommendations which I may offer. I trust therefore the hon. Gentleman will not press his Resolution to a division. As I do not wish to give any opinion upon the merits of the question which has been brought before us, I must, if the hon. Gentleman does not yield to the requests of his friends and supporters, move the Previous Question.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he could quite understand the argument which the right hon. Gentleman had addressed to the House. It was the usual argument which was addressed by Gentlemen placed in his position who did not like the House to make any suggestions to them as regarded the disposal of their surplus finance. He quite differed with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that there was anything in this Resolution which could be construed into an embarrassment. The Resolution was nothing more than the expression of an opinion that a further reduction of the fire insurance duty would be very desirable. There could be nothing in such a Resolution which would dictate to the right hon. Gentleman. He had to congratulate the House upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), who had to-night frankly admitted for the first time that this was a tax which could not be defended on any sound principle, and which ought not to be maintained if there could be any mode devised by which it could be reasonably got rid of. The noble Lord (Lord Stanley), in a speech at Kings Lynn made on the 20th of October, said the worst tax beyond exception which we had was that on fire insurance; that it discouraged prudence and encouraged gambling. Fortified by such an opinion as this, and believing that there was nothing whatever in the Resolution which had to do with the position of hon. Members on either side of the House, he should feel it his duty to take the sense of the House upon the Resolution which he had moved.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Sir, I rise to move for leave to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the Law relating to Turnpike Trusts. In attempting to legislate upon this question, I know that I am undertaking a task which is not unattended with difficulty—there are so many conflicting interests to satisfy, so many different opinions to reconcile, that no man could hope to frame a measure which would not necessarily be subject to much criticism and much opposition. Moreover, this is a subject which would more fitly be dealt with by the Government of the day than by a private Member; and it is not until I had ascertained by inquiry from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) that there was but little probability of his dealing with it during the present Session, that I ventured to give that notice for which I now bespeak the kind indulgence of the House. And, perhaps, it will be well to clear the way at the outset by the remark, which will be easily understood by those who are conversant with the subject, that the Bill which I shall have the honour to propose will in no way affect the interests either of Ireland, or of Scotland, or of South Wales. Ireland, indeed, is a step in advance of England in this matter; since the year 1857 her tolls have been abolished, and the repairs of her roads borne by the rates of counties and baronies. Scotland has a system of valuation of her own, differing from that of England; and if any alteration in her road laws is required, it may safely be left to her own representatives, who have always shown themselves so competent to manage Scotch legislation. And as to South Wales having courted legislation by a series of popular protests against turnpike tolls, which are known by the name of the Rebecca riots, South Wales has been since the year 1844 under a Consolidation Act, by which the extinction of her debt was provided for by an advance out of the Consolidated Fund, repayable by Terminable Annuities of thirty years. It is therefore with England and North Wales alone that I have to do. I have to show that the present system is a bad system, and further, that the alterations which I propose may be adopted to the advantage of the public without being attended with such hardship or injustice to localities as would, in any material degree, neutralize or counterbalance such advantage.

Now, Sir, that the present system is a bad system is an opinion which, rightly or wrongly, has been entertained by Parliament for the last thirty years, so far as Parliament has expressed any opinion upon the subject. I can hardly sum up the objections better than in the words of the Select Committee of the House of Commons which sat in 1836. They say—

"The great proportion of the witnesses appear nearly unanimous in their testimony that the system of exacting toll from the public for the use of the roads is vexatious and expensive in the collection, by the number of collectors and toll-gates kept up, and from a combination occasionally found amongst the lessees of such toll-gates in the vicinity of large towns, by which, in some instances, the fair equivalent in rent is not obtained by the trustees." "Where great towns are not found, the chief burden of the toll seems to fall upon the landholder and the inhabitants of the neighbourhood; and whilst they are paying more in tolls than they would probably pay in some other manner if the system were altered, they find their property in houses and land deteriorated in value from the impediments to a free intercourse of commodities arising from tolls."

This Committee was of opinion that

"the abolition of tolls throughout the Kingdom would be beneficial to the community," and this opinion was fully endorsed by the Committee which sat in 1864, under the Chairmanship of the hon. and learned Member for Hereford (whose name is with my own on the back of the present Bill), and which summed up its opinion upon the point in these words—

"Tolls appear to your Committee to be unequal in pressure, costly in collection, inconvenient to the public, and injurious as causing a serious impediment to intercourse and traffic."

Now, Sir, if I took these words for my text it would be easy for me to found upon them a somewhat lengthy argument. But it will probably be more convenient to the House that I should assume, for the moment, that the opinion of these Committees, adverse to the present system, is a correct opinion; that I should endeavour to state, as clearly as I can, the present condition of the question, the alterations which I propose, and the advantages which I believe would be derived from those alterations. The House will, of course, be aware that the great majority of turnpike trusts have their origin in local Acts passed within the last century, limited at first for a term of years, and subsequently renewed by Parliament from time to time. In the year 1850, when the system was in a state of great confusion, an Act was passed which enabled the Home Secretary, on receiving from the trustees of any trust notification of the consent of two-thirds of the mortgagees, to issue a provisional order, reducing the rate of interest and extinguishing arrears. This has been done in the case of upwards of 160 trusts; but there are many cases which, the consent of the mortgagees not having been either asked or obtained, will not come within the power of the Home Secretary until their Acts expire. You may, in fact, divide the turnpike trusts of England and North Wales into two divisions—1, those whose local Acts have not expired, or have been renewed; 2, those whose local Acts, having expired, are continued by the Annual Continuance Act. And, again, there is another important division which may be made—namely, trusts in debt and trusts out of debt.

Now, Sir, the arrangement of the Annual Continuance Act is to my mind not a very satisfactory part of the duties of the Home Office. There is no definite principle clearly laid down to guide the decision as to which Acts shall be continued and which shall be inserted in the schedule of the Act to expire on the 1st November in the then next year. The consequence is that one Home Secretary, taking a different view from another, and acting upon a different principle, the operation of the law is uncertain, and therefore unequal and unfair. When I had the honour of succeeding Mr. Baring, the present Lord Northbrook, as Under Secretary at the Home Office last year, I found that this subject was one which had been intrusted to him by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth, and I succeeded to the charge. To this and to every other question with which he had to deal Mr. Baring brought that acuteness of intellect and careful attention which I venture to say constituted him a valuable public servant. He had sat upon the Select Committee of 1864, and, acting in the spirit of the Report of that Committee, had turned his attention particularly to the cases of those trusts which, being out of debt, were annually continued. Early in February last year a circular was sent from the Home Office to all trusts which were out of debt, asking in each case full particulars of the circumstances of the trust, and whether there were any special reasons for its continuance. It fell to my lot to receive and consider the answers returned to these circulars. Now, Sir, the number of trusts, according to the last statement of turnpike income and expenditure in possession of the House—that for the year ending 31st December, 1864—had been 1,055 at that period. In the schedule prepared by Mr. Baring in 1865, eighteen trusts had been marked for abolition, freeing from tolls 476 miles of road. This left 1,037 trusts, of which 534 were under the operation of the Annual Continuance Act, and 114 of this number were trusts out of debt, to which the Home Office Circulars applied. Having obtained the consent of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Department to the principle upon which I proposed to act, I carefully considered each case, and finally inserted in the schedule for abolition 83 out of the 114. Out of 420 trusts in debt, I found special circumstances which enabled me to place in the schedule upwards of forty more, so that if the right hon. Gentleman opposite had maintained last year's schedule in its integrity, the 1st of next November would have seen the termination of about 130 trusts, freeing from tolls some 3,000 miles of road, and only leaving in existence thirty-one trusts out of debt, which number might shortly have been further reduced. From information reaching me from different parts of the country, I am induced to believe that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has materially diminished this schedule. I do not presume to blame him—he may be right and I may have been wrong—the utmost I should be inclined to say of him is, that I fear that in listening to the representations of trustees and of persons fearing an increase of rates in their parishes, he has evinced a tender-heartedness, admirable in an individual, but sometimes inconvenient in the management of a great public Department. I will not weary the House with individual instances which have come to my knowledge, but I will quote one as a sample of the whole. I take the case of the Devizes trust. This trust is twenty-seven miles in length. In 1865 its debt was reduced from £700 to £500. The property of the trust was carefully valued at £595, sufficient of itself to have extinguished the debt, and responsible people in Devizes were ready to guarantee the trustees indemnity for any loss to be sustained by the removal of the toll-gates. The trust was inserted in the schedule of 1865; but, at the instance of the hon. Member for Devizes, it was re-inserted in the Continuance Act of that year. Having most fully considered the case, I again placed it in last year's schedule, and I believe all parties would have acquiesced in such an arrangement. Now, if the trustees had come to Parliament for a new Bill, those who desired the abolition of the trust would have had an opportunity of being heard against the Bill, and I venture to say the Bill could not have been obtained. But, instead of this being the case, I understand that the Home Secretary, listening to representations from I know not whom, has again inserted this trust in the Continuance Act. Now, Sir, I instance the case of this trust, because I venture to say that there are no arguments to be advanced in favour of its continuance further than those general arguments of persons who are the advocates of the present system and who dread the increase of rates, so that if the right hon. Gentleman has spared this trust, there is no reason why he should not equally spare the great majority of those which were scheduled last year. Again, I say that I do not presume to blame the right hon. Gentleman for acting upon a different principle from those who preceded him. I am only pointing out the uncertain operation of the law; and in justification of my own course, I will merely refer to the concluding words of the Report of the Committee of 1864, where, after referring to the case of trusts out of debt, they proceed to say—

“Your Committee suggest that such trusts should be excluded from the operation of the Continuance Act, and be obliged to come to Parliament for a renewal of their Acts.”

But, Sir, if the Home Secretary had maintained last year's schedule in its integrity, there would have still remained the necessity for legislation. And, no doubt, it would be most desirable, if it were possible, that we should deal simultaneously with all turnpike trusts. But before I state to the House the proposals which I shall venture to make in this direction, it is necessary that I should say a few words upon the state of the income and expenditure of these trusts. I find that the income of turnpike trusts from all sources amounted in the year ending the 31st December, 1864, to £1,037,000. The expenditure in the same year was £1,017,000, of which £147,000 had been employed in paying off debt, and £120,000 in paying the interest of debt.

Now, Sir, I put plainly before the House one of the immense evils of the present system of this expenditure, to meet which the public has to endure this inconvenient tax. The amount which goes in collection and management is variously estimated at from 30 to 50 per cent on the revenue. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but from all the information I have been able to obtain, I believe I may safely estimate this expense at an average throughout the country of 40 per cent. You have the salaries of clerks, treasurers, and surveyors. You have the cost of maintaining, lighting, and repairing toll-gates, and keeping a staff of collectors. You have legal charges and the great periodical expense of renewals, and you have also, in the many cases in which tolls are let, that which it is impossible to estimate accurately, and which is beyond this estimate—namely, the profit of the lessee. He must have a profit, and that profit must come out of the pocket of the public. Then, Sir, I say that on the grounds of public economy alone, if I went no further, the turnpike trust system stands condemned. But apart from the expense of collection and management, the House must not suppose that the remaining expenditure is devoted to, and is sufficient for, the necessary repairs of roads and the payment of debt. The conditions and circumstances of trusts vary greatly. Some trusts, no doubt, are annually paying off some portion—often a very small portion—of their debt. Some, without hope of doing this, have their income absorbed in the payment of establishment charges and interest of debt, whilst the repairs of their roads are even now borne by the parishes. Some trusts, I am afraid, keep up a nominal debt for the sake of obtaining a place in the Continuance Act; and a considerable number, although in debt, actually spend in improvements money which ought to go towards the liquidation of that debt. The House will be surprised to learn that out of 187 trusts, which employed a portion of their income in improvements in the year 1864, no less than 151 were actually in debt at the time of so doing, and of this number eighty trusts, or more than half, paid off not 1*d.* of principal debt during the year. No doubt, the application of a general principle to these trusts is not an easy task. The complications and varieties of the system, whilst they render its alteration desirable, infinitely increase the difficulty of effecting that alteration by any uniform and simultaneous act of legislation. But, Sir, supposing that we agree—as I hope the House will agree—that alteration is necessary, there are two great difficulties which always stare us in the face—first, the alleged hardship of throwing upon individual parishes the repairs of roads which were originally constructed for through traffic, and not for local traffic; and secondly, the debt. With permission of the House, I will deal with the debt first.

I find that the turnpike debt in England and North Wales amounted in the year 1837, in round numbers, to £7,000,000. In 1860, it was £4,688,000, and in 1864, the total amount of debt was about £4,500,000. But for floating debt, balances due to treasurers, and a large sum of unpaid interest which cannot be fairly called debt, and would infallibly be extinguished by the orders of the Secretary of State, as the Acts expired, I strike off at once £500,000, and I take the actual amount of bonded debt in the year 1864 to have been about £4,000,000. As the Returns of income and expenditure for 1865 and 1866 are not, and cannot yet be, in our possession, I am unable to state the precise amount of the debt at the close of last year; but as I find that the average annual amount of debt paid off during the six years ending the 31st December, 1864, was about £135,000, I shall not be far wrong if I estimate the debt on the 31st December, 1866, to have been about £3,700,000; and as the marketable value of the debt, upon an average throughout the country, certainly does not exceed 70 per cent, I take the actual marketable value to be from £2,500,000 to £2,600,000 at the present time.

Now, what is the condition of the mortgagees and bondholders? I speak the more feelingly, but also the more freely, as being myself one of that honourable fraternity. I am sure that this House would always wish to deal tenderly with persons who had invested their money upon anything like the faith of Parliamentary security. But what is our position? Some of us, no doubt, have advanced our money because we thought it a good investment, and had faith in the continuance of the system. Many of us, or our fathers before us, advanced money in order that our own estates and neighbourhoods might be improved by the making of good roads, and from such roads we have received a very considerable benefit. But all, wisely or unwisely, invested their money in that which they knew clearly at the time to be in law a terminable security—all have had fair warning for the last thirty years of the spirit in which Parliament was likely to regard this question, and I say that we should do wrong if by our legislation we attempted to give an increased or fictitious value to a debt which in very many instances is of exceedingly small value. You might almost as well propose to compensate those who have invested their money in coaches and roadside inns, the value of whose property has been so much deteriorated by the introduction of railroads. Besides, Sir, we are bound to consider what would be the position of the bondholders, and what their prospect of payment, if we were not to legislate at all upon the subject. Comparatively few of them could ever hope to receive any considerable portion of their principal; as the Acts expire, their trusts would come under the control of the Secretary of State, their interest would inevitably be reduced, their arrears of interest extinguished, and their fate would be uncertain at best. I am always most unwilling to trouble the House with details and statistics; but, as this is one of the main difficulties of the question, I have taken infinite pains to analyse closely the condition of these trusts, so that the House and the country might have clearly before them the varying, different, and uncertain value of this debt with which we have to deal.

I find that in 2 counties the average rate of interest is 5 per cent. In 10 counties it is 4, but less than 5. In 25 counties 3 per cent up to  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and in 9 counties it is less than 3 per cent. This exhausts the 46 counties of England and North Wales. I find that out of 873 trusts which were in debt in the year 1864, only 431 paid off any portion, and some a very small portion, of the principal of their debt during that year; 442 paid off no principal at all. Of these 873 trusts, representing £4,000,000 of bonded debt, I find that 316 trusts, representing £1,616,000, paid 3 per cent, or less than 3 per cent interest; of which 143 trusts, representing £768,000, paid 2 per cent, and less than 2 per cent; of the remaining trusts, representing something less than £2,400,000, as many as 229, representing upwards of £900,000, paid 5 per cent; and, at first sight, this would, of course, appear to be good property. But when you look closely into their condition, you will find that only 67 of these trusts, representing £260,000 (and this includes a Middlesex trust representing a debt of above £57,000), paid off any principal either in 1863 or 1864; the remaining 162, representing debt of £650,000, paid off, and were likely to pay off, no principal whatever. Their high interest, therefore, affords little criterion of their real marketable value, and when their trusts expire it would at once be reduced by order of the Secretary of State. The question seriously arises whether, if the present system is admitted to be inconvenient and vexatious, Parliament will for ever maintain that system in order to secure the interest of their money to persons who have invested that money in a terminable security, and can never hope to receive their principal. It is very well to deal tenderly with individuals; but, after all, it is justice to the public which should guide our legislation.

And now, Sir, I come to the second difficulty—namely, the hardship to individual parishes if the repairs of the turnpike roads within them were to fall upon them. Sir, it was the opinion of the Committee of 1864 that, to obviate this hardship, there should be an extension of the area of rating. But that Committee, whilst unanimous in this recommendation, failed to agree upon any specific area. For my own part, I do not scruple to say that I think the best and simplest solution of the question would be to make the Highway Act of 1862 compulsory, and to put the repairs of all roads, highway and turnpike, upon the district fund of the highway district to which they belong. The whole district benefits by good roads, and, to my mind, the system of parochial management of roads is the system of a bygone age. Sir, when the Highway Act of 1862 was passed, I was strongly of opinion that the proper course to pursue was to make the new highway districts coterminous with the union districts, with a power of subdivision where necessary. You had a staff of officers already at work—you had a place of meeting ready to your hand—you had a combination to which parishes had become accustomed—and I believe this course would have increased the popularity as well as the efficiency of the measure. But the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) was of a different opinion; Parliament decided otherwise, and we have to deal with things as they are. I know that the proposal to make the Highway Act compulsory under existing circumstances would create much opposition. I scarcely venture to propose it upon my own responsibility; but if the Government should give their sanction, and if I perceived an indication of the opinion of the House in this direction, I should be perfectly ready to engraft it upon the Bill, which I think it would simplify and render more efficacious. I may mention that the Highway Act, according to the Return of 1865, was then in force in 35 counties, or parts of counties, in England, and one in Wales, comprising upwards of 300 districts, and a very large mileage of road. Sir, I do propose that, wherever the Highway Act is in force, the repairs of these roads should be placed upon the common fund of each district. And where the Highway Act is not in force, if it is right that the parishes should any longer escape their common law liability to repair the roads within them, I do not think it ought to be by means of the wasteful and inconvenient system of turnpike tolls. Let us look the matter fairly in the face. The evidence taken before your Select Committee goes to prove that, in the vast majority of cases, the through traffic upon these roads has sunk into comparative insignificance since the introduction and multiplication of railroads. These roads now practically exist for the purposes of local traffic, and those who pay the tolls are the same persons as those who pay the rates—namely, the owners and occupiers of the district. Then, if I have shown you that the expense of turnpike toll collection and management is enormous, is it worth while to continue this expense for the sake of the very small benefit which is derived from through traffic, that is to say, from the payment of tolls by persons who are strangers and not ratepayers in the parishes? Is it worth while to keep up, side by side in the same locality, a double set of officials—a double expense for practically the same object, and an irresponsible instead of a representative management? For bear in mind, that as soon as you shift this burden from the tolls to the rates, you apply the principle of representation following taxation, and you give to the parishes a power and an interest in the control of expenditure which they do not now possess. But, Sir, it is frequently urged, as an argument in favour of the present system, that those who use the roads should pay for them. I respectfully submit that this is a result which is not obtained under the system of toll-gates. I say nothing of the fact that all those who walk equally use the roads and pay nothing; but a very large percentage of the riding and driving public constantly evade tolls by means of lanes and byways, and whilst the expenses of parishes which have to repair such lanes and byways is thereby increased, you cannot, by possibility, place your toll-gates in such a position as to render the incidence of this tax just and equal. Besides, if the argument is worth anything, that those who use the roads should pay for their maintenance, it is equally applicable to the case of highways; and yet every person who rides or drives is using highways, to the repairs of which he contributes nothing, the very moment that he passes the boundary of the parish in which he happens to live and to be rated. It must also be borne in mind that the existence of a good road must, more or less, benefit a parish and improve the value of its property. In many instances, too, these turnpike roads were originally highways, and in all such cases the parishes would only be reverting to that common law liability from which they have for many years been relieved at the expense of the public. But, Sir, it is said that great injustice will arise in the case of roads in the vicinity of large towns—of coal-mines, of ironworks, and of manufacturing establishments, whose heavy traffic will tear up the roads which country parishes will have to repair. It must not, however, be forgotten that the very existence of such places is of enormous advantage to the neighbouring parishes—supplying their local wants, employing their surplus labour, and immensely improving the value of their property. In many instances, too, the increase of railway accommodation has removed or lessened the heavy traffic complained of; and, acknowledging as I do that there may be some cases of hardship, where through traffic from town to town really exists, or from other particular circumstances, I propose to give power to the justices in quarter sessions to grant contributions from the county rate in aid of the rates of any parish or parishes which shall appear to them to be unduly enhanced by the operation of this Act.

Sir, I have prepared a summary of the Bill which I propose to introduce, and perhaps it will be a convenient course that I should now read it to the House. First, I propose that all trusts out of debt, excepting those which are scheduled to expire on the 1st November in the present year, shall expire on the 1st November, 1868. I propose that, where the Highway Act is in force, the repairs of the roads within the district, and the debt, where debt exists, shall be charged upon the district fund, with power given to maintain toll-gates during the continuance of the trust, the proceeds being firstly applicable to the expenses of such gates, and the liquidation of debt as hereinafter provided. Where the Highway Act is not in force, I propose that the repairs shall be borne by the parishes, as is the case under the existing law, according to the mileage of road in each parish, with power to justices in quarter sessions to contribute from the county rate in aid of the rates of any parish which shall appear to them to be unduly enhanced by the operation of this Act. Then, with respect to the termination of trusts now in debt. The trustees of trusts whose Acts have expired, and of other trusts when their Acts expire, shall endeavour at once to make an arrangement with the creditors of the trust, and communicate the result to the Home Secretary on or before the 1st March, 1868, in the first case, and in other cases, on or before the 1st March in the year following the expiration of the trust—notice of the proposed arrangement to be advertised in at least one newspaper circulating in the district, prior to the transmission to the Secretary of State. This is to give the local authorities and the public an opportunity of objecting if they please. If such arrangement is approved by the Secretary of State, he shall forthwith, but not before the 31st March (so as to give time to any objecting party to represent his objections to the Secretary of State), issue an order confirming the same, fixing a date for the termination of the trust, authorizing the continuance of toll-gates upon the conditions stated above, in cases where an annual sum is to be paid to the creditors, and stating such sum, or, otherwise, stating the sum agreed upon to be paid in full discharge of the principal of the debt. In cases where the Highway Act is not in force, the order is to apportion the debt among the parishes of the trust according to the rateable value of each parish, and the income of the tolls in like proportion. Where no arrangement is announced to the Secretary of State on or before the 1st of March, he is to ascertain the marketable value of the debt, and to issue an order as above, naming an annual sum to be paid to the creditors during the existence of the trust. In all cases the basis of any such sum shall be the average surplus revenue which, during the three years ending December 31st, 1866, shall have been annually applicable to the payment of interest and principal of debt. Upon the issue of any such order of the Secretary of State, the duties and powers of the trustees are at once to terminate, and the trusts and trust property to be transferred to the local authorities. "Local authorities" I interpret to mean highway districts, where such exist, Local Improvement Boards, and parish vestries in other places. No order shall extend the duration of any trust beyond the term of ten years from the 1st November, 1868, and those trusts whose Acts extend beyond such term are not to be extended beyond the limit of their present Acts. Then I give power to local authorities to borrow money to pay off debts; or if the debt can be extinguished by voluntary subscriptions or sale of property, prior to the date named for the expiration of the trusts, to obtain a certificate of the fact from the Secretary of State, and to remove toll-bars. The only other clause with which I need trouble the House is that which relates to compensation of officers. Last year I received at the Home Office a large deputation upon this subject, and, after much consideration, I agreed to insert in the Continuance Act a clause giving power to trustees who, upon the termination of their trust, should have balances in their hand, to compensate at their discretion any clerks or surveyors whose offices were about to be abolished, provided that such officers should have served for ten consecutive years before the expiration of the trust, and that the amount of compensation should in no case exceed the amount of three or four (I forget the exact figure) years' salary. When the right hon. Gentleman came to the Home Office, he declined to adopt this clause, which he had not sufficiently considered. But when the Bill was before the House, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) moved my clause in Committee, and, after some discussion, it was carried by the unanimous vote of the House. It was, however, lost in the other House; and I now propose to introduce it in this Bill, giving to the trustees, with consent of the Secretary of State, power to compensate, in the same manner, and under the same conditions.

I hope the House will see clearly the principle upon which I desire to act. I wish at first to court an amicable arrangement of the debt at once between trustees and mortgagees, and I bring in the Secretary of State to see that the public is not wronged in any such arrangement. Failing such arrangement, I bring him in as the arbiter between the two parties. Under the present law he has this power practically at his option when the trusts expire, and I desire to enforce and expedite his action. Of course, the details of the measure, if I am allowed to introduce it, will be better understood when the Bill is printed. The first great advantage which I anticipate is the reduction in all cases, and the abolition in many, of the enormous expense of collection and management. Then, by dispensing with the necessity of an annual Continuance Act, we shall get rid of the element of uncertainty, and persons interested in trusts will know for certain the date at which the trust will positively expire. I have fixed the date beyond which trusts may not be continued at ten years from the 1st of November, 1868, but in most cases I hope a much shorter time will be sufficient. I may state for the information of the House, that, setting aside a few trusts which may have been renewed during the last two or three years, there are 311 trusts, limited as to time, whose Acts have not yet expired, and of these all but twenty-one will have expired before November 1st, 1878. So that any inconvenience to localities from the circumstance of one trust being abolished whilst an adjoining one remains, will decrease year by year, and in a dozen years' time will be almost entirely at an end.

I will not detain the House with allusions to other schemes which have been proposed for dealing with this question. There are great objections made to the proposal to charge these burdens upon the county rates, and I do not think that Parliament would sanction an attack upon the Consolidated Fund. If Parliament should agree to this Bill I believe it would be found to work well. If I have not sufficiently dwelt upon the disadvantages of the present system, it has been from a sincere desire not to weary the House with matter which any Member may collect for himself from the Reports of our Select Committees. The Committee of 1836 condemned the present system. The Committee of 1864 confirmed that condemnation, and dimly shadowed forth some portions of a future arrangement. I venture to go one step further, and to propose a definite plan. If the Government and the House should think it best to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, it will not be for me to raise any objection. I have endeavoured to state my views to the House clearly and intelligibly, and if I have presumed too much in dealing with this subject as a private Member, I can assure the House that my sole motive has been to promote, so far as I might be able, such a settlement of the question as may tend to the public advantage. He moved for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, it was exceedingly difficult to determine fairly how roads should be repaired. It must be either by rate or by tolls, and rates were most popular, because it was always most agreeable to put your hands into the pockets of others. No doubt, the principle of tolls was that every person should pay for that which he had, and in that view tolls were more just than rates. If a system of tolls could be devised for London, it would be more just than throwing the burden of the maintenance of the roads on the inhabitants; but practical reasons prevented it. Where difficulties could be obviated, tolls were in many cases preferable. In the district with which he was connected the system worked with great satisfaction. The tolls could be collected every seven miles, and persons did not feel that they paid more than they ought to pay. The hon. Gentleman had approached this subject much more effectually than the Committee. He objected to a Committee condemning a system while they dimly shadowed forth a remedy. There were some difficulties connected with the plan recommended. For instance, it would be a troublesome office for the quarter sessions to decide the amount of subventions from the county rate to be applied to a particular parish. Again, there would be objections to the continuance of tolls to pay off debts and the yearly gate expenses, and not for the maintenance of the roads which for the time would fall on the parishes. He had some experience of the "Rebecca" riots in Wales, one of the causes of which was the levying of tolls for debts, and not for the repair of the roads; and such an arrangement would be very difficult to manage with satisfaction. The system adopted in Wales, which did not, however, involve the total abolition of tolls, worked extremely well, and he should be glad to see it extended. No doubt all payments were excessively disagreeable. It was a very serious matter to impose a rate of 4d. in the pound in many parishes, as they might know, for if they attempted to impose 1d. or 2d. on the income tax, such a proposition would endanger the Government. The problem was in some way to provide that the persons who used the roads should pay more than those who did not use them. In the Isle of Man there were no gates, and the roads were maintained by a tax on wheels; but such a solution of the problem might not be feasible in this country.

MR. READ said, the hon. Gentleman had earned the gratitude of the House by the way in which he had attempted to grapple with the subject. Nothing could be worse than the present state of the law, under which turnpikes were yearly dying out, and grievous burdens were being inflicted on some parishes, for, although much through traffic had been diverted by railways, there remained a vast amount of traffic between country towns. In the county of Norfolk there was only one highway district, and the ratepayers were endeavouring at the next sessions to extricate their necks from the ropes cast around them. He objected to permissive Bills, believing that what was good ought to be enforced on the country. He would go so far as to say that all the roads in a district should be made chargeable to a common fund, just as the poor were chargeable to the common fund of a union.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he joined in congratulating the hon. Gentleman on bringing forward this measure, which showed that he understood the subject, and had mastered its details, though he was inclined to think that he rather underrated the difficulty of the task which he had undertaken. He believed that when they got into Committee upon the Bill there would be raised many objections which it would be very difficult to meet. He (Mr. Sclater-Booth) was a member of the Committee of 1864, and he found the difficulties of the question to be very much greater than he had anticipated, and that was the reason why, whilst the Committee condemned the present system, they found it impossible to arrive at a decision as to what should be the remedy. Permissive legislation was objectionable as casting odium on those by whom it was carried out. He thought that it would be extremely objectionable to keep up the tolls at the same time that the cost of repairing the roads was cast upon the parish. He also thought that it would be found impracticable for the quarter sessions to grant rates in aid to particular parishes. He looked forward with great interest to know what were the precise provisions of the Bill, and should be sincerely glad if the matter could be successfully dealt with.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he thought that any one who had taken an interest in the subject must have heard with great satisfaction the ability with which it had been handled by the hon. Gentleman, who must be prepared to meet with considerable opposition. This was a mere question between supporting the roads by rates or by tolls. He agreed that in large towns the toll system was unjust, and was only approved of by the man who lived on the lucky side of the gate. Every man who lived on the right side a toll-bar was glad that it should continue; but the man who unhappily lived on the wrong side had to pay not only for himself, but also for his friend on the other side. The inequality of the incidence of the present system could not be defended. It was a very proper desire that those who used the roads should pay for them; but the fact of the case was, those did not pay for the roads who used them. An immense number used roads without paying for them, and those who did pay for them paid for them twice over. He regretted that no measure for the reform of roads in Scotland had been brought in by Government, because the system under which the roads were managed in that country was altogether effete and obsolete, the expenses of management and of collection amounting to between 25 to 30 per cent of the gross receipts. The system adopted in the Isle of Man of levying a rate upon wheels was equally unfair with that now in force in England. It should not be forgotten in discussing this question that pedestrians were interested equally with the owners of vehicles in the proper repair of the roads; and therefore it was not fair to throw the whole burden of the expense incurred in keeping the roads in a good condition upon the latter. It would be found on grappling with the roads debt that it was much less than was generally supposed, since a large portion of it brought no benefit to the creditors. Those who were interested in road reform would wish success to the hon. Member's measure.

MR. GREENE said, that before the hon. Gentleman could expect to obtain the support of the Gentlemen of the different counties, he must suggest some method by which a portion of the expenses of repairing the roads might be borne by some common fund. The occupation roads might be repaired by the different parishes, and the expense of repairing the main roads between large towns and other parts of the country might be thrown upon some general fund.

MR. WALPOLE said, he wished to express his thanks to the hon. Member for Sandwich for the lucid manner in which he had introduced this subject to the notice of the House. The question for decision was whether the expense of repairing the roads was to be met by rates or by tolls. When it was decided that tolls were to be done away with, and that the expense of repairs was to be met by a rate, the question would arise over what area that rate was to be extended. The three modes of raising the rate which had been suggested—namely, by a county rate, by a highway district rate, and by a parochial rate, had been distinctly condemned by the Committee of 1864, who suggested that the trusts might be watched and gradually got rid of from time to time as the debts upon them were extinguished. In his opinion this question could never be properly grappled with until the Permissive Bill for the highway districts was turned into a compulsory Act, and the charge of the turnpike roads, as well as of the highways, was thrown upon the highway districts. If that object could be accomplished, the question might be brought to a speedy and satisfactory termination. As to the trusts which had debts still unpaid, he feared that if his hon. Friend endeavoured to cast upon the parishes the burden of their debts, as well as the maintenance of the roads, he would hardly be able to pass his Bill. He did not quite understand the proposal as to a subvention from the county rate, yet that was a matter which would require great consideration, as it would involve the transfer of a burden from one place to another, which was not a proper mode of dealing with such a question. It was said that these burdens should be thrown upon the parishes; but many rural parishes did not benefit by roads which ran through them nearly so much as the people of adjoining towns. He had no wish to discuss the Bill at the present moment; but he thought that a discussion upon the second reading of the Bill would be useful. He hoped that when the Bill again came on for discussion, those Members who took a great interest in this subject would be able to devise some means by which the trusts might be gradually got rid of. The hon. Member had stated it to be his intention to propose, after the second reading of the Bill, that it should be referred to a Select Committee. On behalf of the Government, he had no hesitation in giving his sanction to such a proposal, as he believed great good would result from its being carried into effect.

MR. AYRTON said, he had been consulted by the hon. Gentleman when the Bill was being prepared, and he desired to say a few words upon the points that had arisen in the course of the discussion. It was, of course, difficult to explain all the details of the measure at this stage of the proceedings; but he believed that when the Bill was in the hands of hon. Members it would be admitted that it grappled successfully with the difficulties of the case. The proposal was not to throw the debt of trusts on parishes which had to maintain the roads, but to provide that if parishes undertook a debt equal to that now distributed among the creditors, they might assume the trust and be repaid out of the produce of the tolls. He justified the county contributions, because there were many roads which formed the communication between remote parts of the county and large towns, but were now of little use to the parishes through which they passed. The right hon. Gentleman had entirely misapprehended the proposal with reference to dealing with any existing debt. Of course it would be idle to throw a debt upon a parish, and at the same time to make that parish bear the expense of maintaining the roads. But it was an injustice to compel those who maintained their own roads to pay turnpike tolls. The struggles that often took place in that House for the maintenance of trusts where a debt of a few hundred pounds existed, were not for the benefit of the public, but were fostered by professional people for their own benefit. In the metropolis all the turnpikes had been got rid of; but it was a great injustice that persons residing in the country were at liberty to drive into the metropolis at the expense of the inhabitants who maintained the roads, whereas Londoners driving into the country were at once beset with turnpikes, and had to pay tolls in order that the roads might be kept up in all the surrounding districts. Indeed, the number of roads maintained by the ratepayers was now so great that the continuance of turnpikes at all was an injustice. The present system had gone on a great deal too long, and ought to be altogether abolished; and he thought the present measure would meet a great variety of circumstances, and would, though not immediately, bring about the total abolition of turnpikes. It was not sought to effect that end at once and violently, but to deal with each particular case as it arose in a quiet and temperate manner.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said: I will not repay the House for the kind indulgence with which they have heard me to-night by detaining them with any lengthy reply. There are only three observations to which I desire to allude. My hon. Friend the Member for Haverfordwest (Mr. Scourfield) has mentioned the difficulty there will be in asking the quarter sessions to adjudicate as to the granting aid to parishes from the county rate. I am quite aware of it. But the whole question is surrounded with difficulties; and, to be quite frank with the House, I hope and expect that one result of calling the attention of the quarter sessions to this matter will be the adoption of the Highway Act in many places where it has not hitherto been adopted, and the demonstration to parishes that by adopting this Act the area of their rating will be extended, will, I hope, render the adoption of the Highway Act more popular than it now is with some of the agricultural rate-payers. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) says that the Select Committee of 1864 negatived the parochial rate. I had forgotten the fact for a moment; but let me remind him that the present law throws the repairs of those roads upon the parochial rates when the trusts expire; so that now, unless they obtain, at great expense, a new Act of Parliament, it is practically only by the arbitrary power of the Secretary of State that the trust is maintained and the roads kept from the parochial rates. This is a great responsibility upon the Secretary of State, from which I wish to relieve him. But I wish the House to note carefully one expression which fell from my right hon. Friend. He said that he feared "we should never deal satisfactorily with the subject until the Highway Act was made compulsory." Well, Sir, I rejoice to hear the opinion of my right hon. Friend, and when we go to our Select Committee I hope that he, or those who are authorized to speak for him on that Committee, will make a proposition in accordance with that opinion. Upon that and every other point I shall be most ready to receive and adopt suggestions for the improvement of the Bill, and I trust out of that Committee we may produce a useful and satisfactory measure.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to alter and amend the Law relating to Turnpike Trusts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Mr. GEORGE CLIVE, Mr. AYRTON, and Mr. GOLDNEY.

NATIONAL GALLERY ENLARGEMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD JOHN MANNERS moved for leave to introduce a Bill to make further provision for the enlargement of the National Gallery. He said, that under the arrangement sanctioned by Parliament last year, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper) hoped he should be able to purchase by private contract the property to which this measure referred—namely, Archbishop Tenison's school and the parochial schools of St. Martin. Difficulties, however, had arisen, and it was necessary to pass the Bill awarding compensation to the owners, which he now moved for leave to introduce.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

Bill to make further provision for the enlargement of the National Gallery, ordered to be brought in by Lord JOHN MANNERS and Mr. HUNT.

PUBLIC-HOUSES, &c., BILL.—LEAVE.

FIRST READING.

MR. GRAVES said, he rose for the purpose of asking for leave to introduce a Bill for the better regulation of public-houses, refreshment-houses, and beer-houses.

MR. SPEAKER: It is necessary that a proposition for a Bill of this nature should be first brought forward in a Committee of the Whole House.

Acts read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Acts relating to Public Houses, &c."

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would move an Amendment that the House go into Committee that day six months.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman could not do so. The Amendment should have been proposed before the Question was put from the Chair.

MR. ROEBUCK: I was listening as attentively as I could, and I was not aware that you put the Question. I should like to have an opportunity of moving my Amendment, and I think I ought to have it.

MR. SPEAKER said, that if there had been any misunderstanding, and if the Motion was to be opposed, the better course would be that the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) should make his statement, and that the Question should be put again.

MR. GRAVES said, that in consequence of the objection which had just been made in so unusual a manner to the granting leave to introduce this Bill, he would meet the case as it stood. On that day week, when he was about to make a Motion similar to that which he had now placed on the paper, he was met by an intimation from the Speaker that it was doubtful whether the subject was one which a private Member was competent to deal with. On the intimation being made he immediately withdrew that Motion, and having since had the benefit of advice from the Speaker he had been encouraged to proceed with the present Motion, which he had learnt was not contrary to the rules or the practice of the House. Looking at the frequent discussions on the subject which had taken place in that House and the great interest which attached to the question out of doors, he thought it might be taken for granted that a very deep conviction existed that the time had arrived when a better system of licensing ought to be established. He knew no question more important than that to which he was about to draw the attention of the House, both as regarded the magnitude of the trades involved and its indirect bearing on the social and moral welfare of the great masses of our population. He was sure that, notwithstanding the objection taken on the very threshold of the inquiry by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), any proposal which would lead to a thorough discussion of this great subject would be received with satisfaction by the House. It was not his intention to enter on the present occasion into any lengthened explanation of the main features of the Bill, because that could be much more conveniently done on the second reading. Its main features would be found to be in harmony with the recommendations of the Committee of 1854, and with the provisions of the Bill which some two years ago was introduced into that House at the request of the licensed victuallers of Liverpool. The present Bill was not a private Bill. It recommended uniformity of licence; that it should be in the power of the justices alone to grant such; that all applicants must be of good character; and that all such applicants should have a right to receive a licence, subject, however, to a veto on the part of the owners or occupiers of the houses in the neighbourhood of the applicant; that there should be a minimum of Excise duty, with a minimum rating qualification, but subject to a reduction in the duty if the house were closed on Sundays; that there should be a limitation with respect to the hours of opening, with power to the local authorities in the different boroughs to make still further restrictions. There were also certain saving clauses in the Bill with regard to existing privileges. He would not say that this Bill was all that could be desired in dealing with an important and a complicated question; but it was an effort as far as it went; and he hoped the House would allow it to go into Committee and be there considered. It had been framed by the magistrates and the corporation, and was supported by the inhabitants of Liverpool. If the House permitted the Bill to be introduced, it was his intention to fix the second reading for a distant day, so as to enable his Colleague (Mr. Horsfall) to resume the conduct of the Bill, and to give the House a full opportunity for its examination. He now moved that the Speaker leave the Chair.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that his object was to learn the intentions and views of the Government on this question. It was a large one, and affected many interests which had grown up and been fostered by Acts of Parliament. It was also a question which largely affected the public morality. There was a class of persons called teetotallers, who supported permissive Bills in order to put down the sale of intoxicating liquors. But the Bill of the hon. Member was advocated by a different class, for it went to establish a free trade in liquors. The wisdom of Parliament had always made a distinction between the sale of commodities that were harmless and those that were not so. A bale of cotton might be passed from hand to hand without danger, and no restrictions were placed on its sale. But it was different with gunpowder. And so with regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors, which affected the public morality. Parliament had interfered for centuries, and under this interference or sanction of Parliament there had grown up large interests which this Bill went directly to affect. No private Member ought to be permitted to do this. The Government ought to take up the question, and tell the House what they intended to do. He wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) whether the Government, who must know what was the object of the Bill, were prepared to support it. If they were not he would withdraw his opposition; if they were, he would go to a division. He believed the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord Stanley) was prepared to support this Bill. ["No!"] He was glad to hear that. He had thought from some part of the noble Lord's remarks, as chairman of quarter sessions, that he was in favour of free trade in intoxicating liquors. For himself, he was entirely opposed to it. He was also opposed to the permissive Bill of the teetotallers; but he was prepared to support a judicious intermediate action between these two extremes. He wished, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would explain to the House what course he intended to take in this matter, and for that purpose he moved that the House go into Committee that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "immediately," and insert the words "upon this day six months," — (Mr. Roebuck,) — instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'immediately' stand part of the Question."

MR. POWELL said, that at any rate he thought the House ought to go into Committee to allow the hon. Member to introduce his Bill. Their present system of licensing consisted of two parts, each inconsistent with the other, and neither satisfactory. He would not say what was the right system to be adopted, but this he knew—that the country was greatly dissatisfied and disgusted with the present system. Our restraints had broken down, and if we intended to diminish drunkenness we must adopt some other means of doing so. Therefore he thought they were bound to go into Committee and consider the present proposal. It deserved so much of support if it were only for the way in which it proposed to deal with the liquor traffic on Sundays. At present every one who took out a licence was bound to keep open all the seven days of the week. He thought it would be a great improvement if the parties had the option of only taking out a licence, with a proportionate reduction for six days. It had been tried with the cabs, and found to work advantageously, and he saw no reason why it should not be equally beneficial in the case of public-houses.

MR. PEASE said, that a short time ago he put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, whether he had the licensing system under his consideration, as he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he had. He was not aware the hon. Member (Mr. Graves) had intended to bring this Bill before the House. A friend of his (Mr. Lawson), the late Member for Carlisle, had also brought the question before the House a few years ago, tending to show the dissatisfaction with the present system. There were great anomalies in the present licensing system. It was a great hardship on licensed victuallers to have to apply year after year for a renewal of their licenses to benches of magistrates differently constituted. It sometimes occurred that a man applied in vain year after year for a license, but ultimately obtained it on the same grounds as those which he had originally urged. The magistrates in one town proceeded on a different system from that acted on by the magistrates in another town. Thus, the Liverpool magistrates thought it their duty to grant licenses to all persons who applied for them, provided that the applicants were fitted to keep a licensed house; but the magistrates of Manchester exercised a discretion as to the number of licenses. The amount of drunkenness in Liverpool, with a population very nearly the same in number, though of a different character, was nearly double that in Manchester. He thought it would be useful to have his hon. Friend's Bill discussed; but he hoped the Government would bring in a general measure.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) having made such a direct appeal to me on this subject, I will give the House the reason why we think we ought to accede to the Motion of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) to go into Committee. It is a matter of courtesy to allow a Member to introduce his Bill. It is the usual, though not the invariable rule of the House that any Member who wishes may introduce a Bill and lay it upon the table of the House. That is a very convenient practice, for it gives a Member an opportunity for explanation at a further stage; it allows him to introduce the question he wishes to bring before the House in the most convenient form for discussion. That being so, my hon. Friend asks us to go into a Committee of the Whole House on a most important subject. The object of going into Committee is that leave may be given him to introduce a Bill for the better regulation of licenses, for the sale of wine, spirits, and beer. I mentioned the other day, as the hon. Member for Durham county (Mr. Pease) has just reminded the House, that proposals relating to this question have come before me from various sources, which it was my duty to consider. It will be for the general advantage if the same questions are brought before the House. I may state that I have formed an opinion on the subject, and when the proper time comes I shall be prepared to give my opinion. I have made up my mind as to the kind of measure that ought to be introduced; but I am not prepared to introduce it till I have consulted with my Colleagues, and till I see that the state of the public business will allow me to make progress with it. Still, as my hon. Friend (Mr. Graves) wishes to go into Committee of the Whole House on an important measure, I think the House is bound to afford him an opportunity.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the House would not refuse to give the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) an opportunity of bringing in his Bill, though he should oppose some of its provisions. The licensing system was in a very unsatisfactory state; and there was no place in which that was felt more than in Liverpool. Last year the persons responsible for the maintenance of the peace and morality of the town felt themselves constrained to attempt to deal with the evils by which they were confronted, by means of a private Bill. The majority of the House of Commons, of whom he had been one, would not allow such a precedent to be established. But now that the measure again made its appearance in an unobjectionable form, and that the Bill no longer embodied the expression merely of the opinions of the people of Liverpool, great cause for complaint would exist if it were hastily rejected. He quite agreed that the question was one which the present or former Governments ought to have taken up. The right hon. Gentleman the present Home Secretary (Mr. Walpole) had proved in time past his desire to meet this question. He believed that the expression of opinion throughout the country necessary to carry a Government measure upon the subject would be much encouraged, by taking a preliminary discussion upon the Bill now proposed.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that having attained his object he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. GRAVES said, that the rate of licences would be higher in Liverpool; but he could not say what would be the effect of the Bill with regard to other places.

MR. WALPOLE said, it would not be competent for the hon. Member for Liverpool to fix by his Bill the rate to be paid for licences without the consent of the Government.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD JOHN MANNERS moved for leave to bring in a Bill to authorize the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings to acquire lands for the purpose of the new Palace at Westminster, and to construct an Embankment on the North shore of the River Thames, in the parish of St. John the Evangelist, Westminster. He said, that for the last few years a continual nuisance and danger had been experienced from the state of the premises near the Victoria Tower. It had been strongly recommended by the Commission of 1863 that the premises should be purchased by the Government, and that the embankment of the Thames should be carried along their site. He might mention that no later than last summer an attempt had been made to blow up that portion of the palace, and that, as lately as the 19th January last, a gas engine had exploded in the straw yard abutting on the Victoria Tower. These buildings would be pulled down, and on the western extremity of the land so acquired it was proposed to erect a handsome range of houses, and the money which would be derived from the sale of that portion of the ground was expected to largely compensate for the cost of purchasing the property. Under these circumstances, he thought the House would not object to the introduction of the Bill.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to inquire what number of houses were included in the Bill; and whether any estimate had been made of the money required for their purchase?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that if the hon. and gallant Colonel would look at the Estimates he would find a full account of the proposed expenditure. The sum total was £175,000, of which £30,000 would be proposed during the present year.

MR. HENDERSON said, that the Bill would provide a protection against what might be a national calamity. Some time ago he had visited the premises, and within twenty yards of the Palace he saw a coal yard, at the foot of which were two barges loading gas tar. In an adjoining yard there were 200 or 300 tons of straw, between which and the gas tar a man was smoking. A spark from his pipe might have caused a conflagration, which if the wind had been in a certain direction would have reached the Palace.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to authorize the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings to acquire lands for the purposes of the New Palace at Westminster, and to construct an Embankment on the North shore of the River Thames, in the parish of St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, ordered to be brought in by Lord JOHN MANNERS, and Mr. HUNT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 81.]

CASE OF MR. CHURCHWARD.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. TAYLOR said, he rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions for the removal of Mr. Churchward from the Commission of the Peace for the Borough of Dover. He had no special connection either with Dover or the county of Kent, nor had he any ill-feeling towards the person whose conduct he impugned, and until a communication was made to him a week ago, he had no knowledge of that gentleman. In the communication which he received from Dover he was told that the people of Dover felt themselves injured and insulted—he used their phrase without endorsing it—by what they termed “an atrocious job,” which had placed on the bench of magistrates at Dover a person whose political misdoings had been recorded again and again in the votes of the House, and were enshrined in the deliberate and solemn Report of a Commission. He felt it his duty to look into these assertions, and to search the records of the House where the facts were to be found. Having done so, he thought it his duty to address a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, but did not place the question on the paper without some misgivings and doubts. He said to himself, “Is it conceivable, if the facts are as stated, that any Government would recommend Her Majesty to nominate any such person to the commission of the peace?” He fancied that he might find some commixture, some confusion of names and dates, and be thrown over at last. He thought that if any Government could not have ventured on such a course of proceeding, the present Government would have been the last to do so—that a Government which occupied so peculiar a position in relation to the majority of the House would have been the last Government to deprive themselves of all the characteristics which were supposed to be inherent in what was vulgarly known as a new broom. Was it conceivable, he thought, that Her Majesty's Government, the head of the great Tory party in this country—that party which within one year had refused even to entertain a Reform Bill unless in its four corners there were stringent and effective clauses against bribery and corruption—that party which at the beginning of the Session had before it the Reports of four Commissions relating to certain boroughs which they now proposed wholly to disfranchise, innocent and guilty together—was it conceivable that such a Government could have made such a recommendation? Under those circumstances, could it be conceived that Her Majesty's Government actually recommended Her Majesty to place on the commission of peace at Dover a gentleman who had been reported by a Committee as guilty of bribery? When he asked the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary the question he put to him on a previous occasion he did so with fear and trembling, for he thought he might find himself, to use a familiar phrase, “thrown on his back.” He believed, and he said it with all sincerity, that there was not a man on either side of the House who would have felt more pain and disgust than the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to be obliged to give the answer he was compelled to give, which amounted to an admission that Mr. Churchward was the man against whom these heavy charges had been substantiated before the tribunal he had mentioned. The only qualification to that admission was an appeal ad misericordiam with regard to the Report of the Committee of 1853. The right hon. Gentleman stated that his noble Friend the Lord Chancellor, until he saw his (Mr. Taylor's) Motion on the paper, was unaware that there was any stain whatever on the political reputation of Mr. Churchward. He (Mr. Taylor) must say that the Colleagues of the noble and learned Lord had behaved with great unkindness, if not unfairness, to him, because it could not be doubted that many of them were but too well aware of the facts of the case. They all knew that—

“Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise;” but this bliss was a stolen pleasure which was not permissible in the case of men who discharged high political functions and duties, and who, in discharging them, were bound to exercise certain responsibilities. Among them was the responsibility of not being unaware of that which was sufficiently well known to all the world besides. It happened, with some singularity, that there was a case absolutely parallel with the one before the House. All the circumstances were the same, the same Lord Chancellor and the same Home Secretary being concerned in it, and the only thing which was not the same was that the right hon. Gentleman opposite on that occasion—in 1858—said his noble Friend would instantly proceed to undo the mischief that had been done. The case was that of two persons who had been appointed to the commission of the peace in Canterbury, and who had previously, as in this case, been reported by the Commissioners as having been guilty of bribery. A complaint was made by the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke), and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) then said—

“His noble Friend (the Lord Chancellor) was not in the least degree aware that the names of either of those persons were in the schedule of the Commissioners' Report to which reference had been made. The moment the case was brought to his attention, he caused inquiry to be made, and finding that the parties were the same, he instantly sent down to Canterbury to say that he should require both those gentlemen to resign.”—[3 Hansard, cl. 264.]

He (Mr. Taylor) asserted as a fact—if he were mistaken he should be open to correction—that in September last there was a proposal to place this Mr. Churchward upon the county bench of magistrates in Kent. When that was known a special meeting of the Wingham division of magistrates was called, and largely attended by gentlemen principally belonging to the Tory party, and they sent up an official protest to the lord-lieutenant of the county against that nomination. The result was that no more was heard of that matter. The next time Mr. Churchward turned up he was in the borough of Dover, and it was said that the noble Lord had received recommendations with regard to him which he was bound to entertain. He (Mr. Taylor) wished to know whether they were the usual recommendations from the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the borough? Having asked his question of the right hon. Gentleman, and received the answer he did, he was bound to take this further step by putting this Motion on the paper. He was also bound to look more closely into the whole transaction to see if there was any defence, palliation, excuse, or diminution of the apparent enormity of the act committed, and he was bound to confess that the more he looked into it the worse it appeared; and it seemed to him that no apology could be offered for it. The Home Secretary, in answering his question with reference to the Report of the Committee of 1853, said it was not quite fair to call what was done simple bribery, because no money was given, but only situations promised. But was that a less evil or crime than the giving of money? In his opinion the offence was multiplied threefold, for it was permanent instead of temporary, and indefinite in extent instead of being defined and limited. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had not read a certain paragraph in the Report, which showed that Mr. Churchward, by his own admission, had not only obtained twenty appointments, but had sent thirty or forty men into the dockyard, of whom twenty-five were accepted. That possibly explained why the dockyards always rose before them in such unfavourable colours; why everything there cost so much, and why so many of the ills and abuses mentioned by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) were occurring. If that was the way the dockyards were managed they were not honest yards, where a fair day's work was done for a fair day's wages. They were sinks for used up infamy and hospitals for decayed scoundrels. In 1859 the Committee of Mail Contracts made a Report, in which the following passage occurred:—

“While most anxious for the fulfilment of all engagements entered into in good faith between the Government and individuals, the Committee submits for the consideration of the House whether Mr. Churchward, in having resorted to corrupt expedients, affecting injuriously the character of the representation of the people in Parliament, has not rendered it impossible for the House of Commons, with due regard to its honour and dignity, to vote the sums of money necessary to fulfil the agreement to extend his contract from the 20th of June, 1863, to the 26th of April, 1870.”

That was something much more than a mere formal record placed in the Report that somebody had been guilty of bribery. It stated, in point of fact, that so atrocious and enormous were the political misdeeds which had been committed, that they justified the Committee in recommending the House to absolutely quash and violate the contract with Mr. Churchward, which was ultimately done. That Committee was composed of an equal number of Gentlemen from each side of the House, and the resolutions condemning Mr. Churchward were passed by large majorities, showing that so patent and so strong was the evil proved, that it utterly overrode all those conventional biases which honestly enough would sometimes lead gentlemen of similar opinions to band themselves together on one side or the other. That decision had been three times arraigned in the House, and three times the claims of Mr. Churchward had been decided against, certainly not by very large majorities, as the majorities had been 45 once, then 8, and then 14. But their debates on those occasions were not got up with any idea of whitewashing the character of Mr. Churchward. The question had been simply whether the arrangement with Mr. Churchward was an economical one for the country. So that even if the majorities had gone the other way, and the House had chosen to resuscitate the contract, it would not by its vote have redeemed the character of Mr. Churchward. He would now read a few words spoken in one of those debates by Mr. Cobden, the Chairman of the Committee, whose judgment he had last quoted, and who summed up the case in that concise and masterly manner which was characteristic of him. Mr. Cobden said—

“Some people argue that we cannot legally refuse to pay the money. Well, then, I would not pay it in any way but a legal way. I quite join with hon. Gentlemen in that view. If they think that Mr. Churchward has a legal claim, let him establish that claim; and for my part I would vote money to enable him to establish his claim—to pay all the legal expenses of a trial—rather than I would agree to grant the money for this contract after the Report of the Committee. What will the public say out of doors? Really, we ought to affect a virtue if we have it not. A Committee of this House reports that a person goes to a public office wanting to bribe a Lord of the Admiralty to assist in bestowing a contract by the most corrupt means. And what is the sort of bribe that is offered? Why, it is the very kind of bribery that ought to be most repugnant to this House. On the one hand, we have before us, as the House of Commons, a case in which an attempt is made upon the virtue of a public functionary, whom we are here especially to superintend and watch; and, on the other hand, the bribe offered us is an attempt to dispose, by corrupt means, of the votes of constituents, in whose purity and independence I should think that we, as the House of Commons, ought to be most deeply interested.”—[3 Hansard, clxx. 1896.]

This was the case, and he (Mr. Taylor) would leave it now without further comment; comment could add nothing to it; and the reckless exaggeration of a partisan, of which, he was sure, he had not been guilty, would not make the case stronger. There were differences of opinion with regard to the moral sin of bribery and corruption; some thinking that illicit political influence had become really a time-hallowed part of our constitution, while others thought that, however devious and unclean might be the paths by which Members for certain constituencies found their way into Parliament, still, when they reached this House they should be recognised and welcomed as honourable and independent gentlemen, really interested equally with themselves in the good of the country. And, as regarded the constituencies, some might think that when once they went through the ordeal of temptation and a certain fall, they were much the same as other constituencies. He would not discuss those points. But there was one point upon which he thought there would have been no difference of opinion on either side of the House, and that was that however little it might matter comparatively how they formed the House wherein their laws were made, no stain should touch, no blot of suspicion should lie upon those who administered those laws. He had thought it was the boast of this country that whatever might be our political peccadilloes, at any rate the purity of the ermine, the independence and honour of the magisterial bench, could never be impeached. We were in the habit of criticising severely, and perhaps not altogether unjustly, the system in America of electing their Judges for a term of years, and of asking how, under such a system, they could hope to have Judges free from political bias, acting without fear or favour, and beyond all suspicion. Now, he should say that the language which they often heard upon that subject received, in the present case, but a very sorry illustration. There they had a person whose political character was not equivocal, whose political misdeeds had been enshrined in the Report of a Committee, while that Report had itself been endorsed again and again by majorities of that House—they had such a person recommended by the Government to Her Majesty for the commission of the peace—for an office in which he would have to judge without fear, favour, or partiality, and even without the suspicion of being subject to any such influences, the various causes which might come before him, and in which the interests of different classes must be involved. It would be a deliberate poisoning of the fountain of justice at its very source.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions for the removal of Mr. Churchward from the Commission of the Peace for the Borough of Dover."—(Mr. Taylor.)

MAJOR DICKSON said, he would not trespass at any length on the time of the House; but he felt sure he should receive its indulgence when he rose, as he then did, to defend the character of a person who had suffered a very grievous persecution, and whom he believed to be an upright and honourable man. He thought he should be neither doing his duty as one of the Members for Dover, nor doing justice to a gentleman whom he had no hesitation in saying in that House he was proud to number among his constituents, if he did not state that he looked upon the attack which had been made upon that gentleman by the hon. Member for Leicester as not only wanton and cowardly, but—

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, I rise to order. The word "cowardly," Sir, is quite unknown in this House.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Member will, no doubt, withdraw that word.

MAJOR DICKSON said, he should be sorry if he had said anything which was contrary to the Rules of the House; but he was about to express his reason for his opinion. He must say that he looked upon that attack as unjustifiable. The House would remember that when he had appealed to the hon. Member in the name of justice to postpone that Motion for a few days only, until certain right hon. Gentlemen could be present who were intimately acquainted with the whole of the facts of the case, and able to bear testimony upon it, the hon. Member refused to accede to so reasonable an appeal. He could not, therefore, compliment the hon. Gentleman on his idea of justice; neither could he share with him the belief that it was right, or proper, or just, to sacrifice the character of an individual to gain a momentary party triumph. The hon. Member had spoken of the decision which was come to by the Committee of 1853; but he had slurred over the second Report of that Committee. He had hardly noticed the fact that the second Report was a complete answer to the first. The hon. Gentleman was as well aware as he was that Mr. Churchward himself had in vain petitioned that House to be heard at its Bar, and examined by counsel. He was also aware that for the last eight years Mr. Churchward had been trying to bring his case before a court of justice, and had always been thwarted by the Government of the day. In 1865 he brought an action in the Court of Queen's Bench, upon the main question, and how was he met? By a demurrer in law, and therefore he was again unable to vindicate his character. The persecution which Mr. Churchward had met with had no precedent in political history. Political spite, he might say, instigated the proceedings of 1859; and political spite, coupled with personal animosity, instigated the proceedings of 1867. The hon. Member for Leicester had told them that he had been asked by the town of Dover to bring that matter forward, and wished them to suppose that Mr. Churchward's appointment had given offence to the whole of that town. [MR. TAYLOR: Not to the whole town, but to individuals in it.] To prove that Mr. Churchward was held in high esteem in Dover he would read to the House an address to that gentleman, which had been signed by all the leading men of the town in the short space of three hours. The address said—

"We, the undersigned inhabitants of Dover, beg to express to you our deep regret at the attack that was made upon you on Friday last in the House of Commons in connection with your recent appointment as a magistrate of the borough. We venture to express our sense of the high estimation in which during your long residence among us you have been so deservedly held by a large majority of the inhabitants, and also of your fitness in every respect to fill the office of a magistrate; and we would desire to express to you our heartfelt wish that you may long be spared to assist in administering justice among us, and promoting all measures tending to the advancement and prosperity of our town."

Well, how did that matter originate? Was it brought forward by a leading Liberal? He could state that a Liberal of distinction and high honour was asked to bring it forward, and he distinctly refused to have anything to do with it. That proceeding had been instigated by a man who was formerly one of Mr. Churchward's servants, who was discharged for some reason into which he need not enter, and who was now actuated by spite towards his old employer. He knew that a gentleman high in station and character, a Member of that House, connected with Dover, and who was known to be an enemy of Mr. Churchward, had declined to make himself the 'dirty tool and cat's-paw' of the hon. Member for Leicester. If the hon. Member was bursting with a desire to expose all political corruption and vice, he need not have gone to Dover to get a case. He need not have gone back fifteen or even eight years, but only about eight weeks, and he would have found sitting on the Benches opposite, almost by his very side, men who had been proved guilty before Committees of that House of conduct ten times as bad as that of Mr. Churchward. Now what, he would ask, were the accusations which were brought against Mr. Churchward? They were two. One of them related to events which had occurred as far back as 1852; the other to some proceedings which had taken place in 1859. In 1853 a Committee of that House had assembled to inquire into the question whether Mr. Mare had been duly elected for Plymouth in the preceding year, and he admitted that when they first met they had arrived at the conclusion that Mr. Churchward had bribed certain individuals at that election by offering them employment. The first Resolution, however, to which that same Committee had come on re-assembling was—

“That a general belief prevailed at Plymouth, both previous to and at the election of burgesses to serve in Parliament for the borough of Plymouth in 1852, that it was not illegal for a candidate, or his agents, to obtain, or promise to obtain, situations or employment for electors who had previously pledged their votes.”

That Resolution entirely removed from Mr. Churchward the odium which the Committee would seem to have cast upon him by their first decision. It should also be remembered that the proceedings connected with the Plymouth election extended over a period of four months, that a Conservative Government was then in power, and he would, under those circumstances, put it to the common sense of the House whether it was not to be expected that the followers of that party were more likely to receive any appointments which were vacant than those who happened to profess Liberal opinions. He would ask the House whether, having taken into account the Resolution which he had just read, Mr. Churchward, after the lapse of fifteen years, was deserving of the special condemnation of his conduct which the hon. Gentleman opposite invited it to pronounce. There was another gentleman, named Mennie, whose name had been brought prominently forward in connection with the election for Plymouth, who had afterwards been made a magistrate. His appointment to that position had been challenged in that House or in the House of Lords; but it was resolved, after the decision arrived at by the Committee, clearing the character of the Conservative agents, that the appointment ought to be allowed to stand. After those transactions, in 1854, a Liberal Government, of which Earl Russell was a member, entered with Mr. Churchward into a contract for the conveyance of the mails between Dover and the Continent, which was renewed by the same Government in 1855. They must, therefore, have supposed that there was no serious reflection on his character. Beyond that, Mr. Churchward had been allowed, unchallenged, to raise a Volunteer Corps in Dover, in which he held a commission. Now, when the House was sitting in judgment upon him, he thought he might without offence ask whether there were any within its walls who, when engaged in the turmoil of a General Election, might not have committed offences as grave as those with which that gentleman was charged. He would say to hon. Members, “let him among us who can put his hand upon his heart and declare that he is without sin cast the first stone.” He came next to the year 1859, in which year two Committees sat—the one to inquire whether Admiral Leake and Mr. Nicol had been duly elected Members for Dover, the other to investigate the circumstances connected with the renewal of the mail contract. As to the Election Committee, its Chairman told Mr. Churchward, at the conclusion of its proceedings, in the open Committee-room, that nothing had transpired in the course of the inquiry which in the slightest degree affected his honour or character. He admitted, however, that the second Committee, which he had just mentioned, had come to the decision that Mr. Churchward had resorted to corrupt expedients. It must at the same time be borne in mind that this was a decision which had been challenged, as being entirely contrary to evidence, and with respect to which many distinguished Members of that and the other House of Parliament as well as of the bar entertained the opinion, that on the evidence before them the Committee should have arrived at a different conclusion. It was a decision that had been arrived at altogether upon the evidence of three individuals, and from a conversation which lasted only five minutes. He had always understood that in dealing with evidence it was customary when two persons said one thing and a third something different, to believe the statement of the two rather than that of the single individual. On the occasion in question, however, the Committee felt themselves justified in ignoring the testimony of two gentlemen, and taking instead that of one. The three gentlemen who were in the room in which the conversation to which he was alluding took place were Captain Carnegie, Mr. Churchward, and Mr. Herbert Murray, and he would, in the first place, read to the House the evidence of Captain Carnegie, who said—

“Mr. Churchward spoke to me on the subject of the pending election for Dover—he made an allusion to his anxiety to obtain the renewal of his contract. Mr. Churchward spoke most freely and openly to me upon the subject of the contract. I thought it the most imprudent and incautious speech that ever came from a man’s mouth, and it made so great an impression upon me that I recollect every word of it. He led me to the belief that this contract was to be renewed. That was the impression left upon my mind.”

The following was Mr. Churchward’s account of the same conversation :—

“In the course of his interview with Captain Carnegie the word contract was never mentioned. The word contract was never used, and my recollection of the circumstance is perfect.”

Mr. Murray said—

“I do not think the contract was ever mentioned. I am quite sure that nothing passed between Mr. Churchward and Captain Carnegie about the contract. I am under the impression that Captain Carnegie is confusing some conversation with him with the one between Mr. Churchward himself and Captain Carnegie. I am quite sure that Mr. Churchward never said those words to Captain Carnegie in my presence.”

Now, it was on that evidence, and that alone, that the words “corrupt expedients” were employed. Mr. Murray further stated, that “the extension of his contract was not the price of Mr. Churchward’s support to the Government at Dover.” Sir John Pakington said that “he had no knowledge of the means by which the Dover election was to be carried.” Sir Stafford Northcote said that “political motives had no effect in the granting of the contract.” Mr. Corry said that “as far as the Admiralty were concerned, the question was determined by their recommendation to the Treasury on the 24th of February,” which was before the alleged statement took place, thus affording a strong presumption that Mr. Churchward could not have used the language attributed to him. Captain Carnegie, moreover, admitted that—

“Mr. Murray could not have forwarded Mr. Churchward’s views at the Admiralty, as before his interviews the question had been disposed of by that Department.”

Captain Carnegie added, that it was no discredit to a Government contractor to vote for a Government candidate; and Sir Stafford Northcote further said that he had sent for Mr. Churchward, that that gentleman did not apply to him, and that with him mainly rested the responsibility of granting the contract, which was practically settled before the elections came on. Under all those circumstances, he confidently appealed to the House to say whether the charge contained in the Report of the Committee was not simply implied rather than proved, as would seem to be shown by the fact that upon a confessedly partisan division their decision was ratified only by a very small majority. To show what were the views which were entertained on the point by those men who had the best means of judging of the merits of the case, he would read to the House the letters of a right hon. Gentleman and a noble Lord, who now occupied seats on the Treasury Bench. The first letter was as follows :—

“42, Harley Street, May 20, 1863.

“My dear Sir,—I must thank you for your note, which has given me much pleasure. It was a great mortification to me to fail of persuading the House of Commons to take a just view of a case which has been so shamefully misrepresented, and I could not but fear that the division was owing to my imperfect statement or ineffective mode of handling the argument. I am truly glad to find that you, at least, give me credit for having done what I could. We shall fight the battle again on the 28th, and I hope with better success, though it is difficult to do away with an impression such as has been produced upon the minds of too many Members. Few will give themselves the trouble to examine and weigh the evidence. If they did, they could hardly resist the conviction that if there was any wrong in the proceedings in 1859 (and I do not think there is clear proof of there having been any at all), it was not wrong done by you, but wrong done to you. This has been my feeling throughout, and I cannot doubt that any impartial person who would take the trouble of carefully studying the facts with no other desire but to get at the truth would come to the same conclusion.—I remain, faithfully yours,

J. G. Churchward, Esq."

The second letter was from the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works, who said—

"Sir,—I avail myself of the opportunity offered by your letter of the 1st to repeat to you personally and privately that which I said publicly in the House of Commons—my entire belief in your honour and good faith, and my conviction that the finding of the Committee, and the action taken by the Government, therefore, are alike opposed to common sense and common justice. Whether it is still possible to reverse the decision of the House of Commons I cannot presume to say; but if, I will not say your friends, but the friends of honesty, think fit to take further steps in the House, I shall most cordially co-operate with them; and I will anyhow express a hope that, for the future, you will feel that if you have lost a contract through political malevolence you have gained friends, among whom desires to be ranked—Yours very faithfully,

JOHN MANNERS.

J. G. Churchward, Esq."

He thought he had now shown the House that there was no good ground for the accusations which had been brought against Mr. Churchward, and that he was, at all events, justified in asking it to withhold its decision. Mr. Churchward, as they all knew, had been endeavouring for a long time, at great cost, to have the case heard in a court of justice; and it would be contrary to every principle of the Constitution if they were to come to a decision that night, and so to prejudice the case in the eyes of those outside the House. By the law, as it at present stood respecting bribery, Members of Parliament who might have been found guilty of the grossest corruption were not prevented from resuming their position as Members of the House. He had no desire to cast a stone at any individual Member; rather than do so he had withdrawn the Motion that stood in his name that evening. One hon. Gentleman whose name had been mentioned (Mr. Watkin) was a personal friend of his. He was happy to see the course he had adopted in writing to the Lord Chancellor; and he had no doubt but that he would be able, when the time arrived, to clear himself on the floor of the House, as Mr. Churchward would be able and glad to do if he had the honour of a seat there. But he would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that they had already ruined Mr. Churchward's property and fortune, and he had never in any way murmured at the decision. He (Major Dickson) did not find fault with hon. Gentlemen opposite on that account. Very likely

if he had himself been sitting at the time on that side of the House he should have done the same. It was done in a moment of political agitation and excitement; but he would appeal to them whether now, in their calmer moments, they were still determined to blacken and destroy Mr. Churchward's character? Were they going to sacrifice an honourable man just for the sake of gaining a fleeting triumph over the Treasury Bench? Would they not have ample opportunities within the next month? was not dual voting to be shortly discussed, when they could exercise their feelings without restraint? Surely that would be a more fitting occasion for triumph, as well as a more liberal and generous one, than that a great party should combine to destroy the reputation of a private gentleman? Would it be wise at this moment, when the bitterest animosities of party were ready to burst forth, for hon. Gentlemen to throw this firebrand into the camp, especially when men of all parties in Dover were joining hand with hand in the endeavour to promote the common welfare of the town? For himself he was actuated by no personal animosities; he cared not whether a man were a Radical or a Tory so that he was an honest man; and he appealed to the hon. Member for Leicester, notwithstanding his extreme opinions, whether it was worthy of his high character to stand up in that House and blacken the character of an honourable gentleman when he had not a tittle of evidence to justify the proceeding. He called upon the House, in the sacred name of justice, to pause before committing a wrong which could never be repaired. He could not, indeed, hope for justice from mere bigoted political partisans; but he was addressing a British House of Commons. He left the case confidently in the hands of hon. Members on both sides of the House, confident that they would be guided by those rules of honour and fairness and justice which regulated the conduct and actions of all honourable men.

MR. BENTINCK said, that at an early period of the evening he addressed a question to the hon. Member for Leicester for the purpose of ascertaining whether the hon. Member would include in his Motion all magistrates in a position similar to Mr. Churchward, and the hon. Member asked whether the question was put seriously. Now, he thought that the discussion, as far as it had gone, showed that there was a great deal of seriousness in the matter. He would not detain the House long, for, after the able address of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Dover (Major Dickson), he did not think that much was required to be said in favour of Mr. Churchward. As he understood the hon. Member for Leicester to say that Mr. Churchward or any person found to have committed bribery was not fit to be a magistrate, he thought that the hon. Member would have done better if he had dealt with the case more generally, and had not selected merely one isolated instance. In cases of this kind, and especially in Mr. Churchward's case, there had been exhibited a great deal of party feeling; and though he did not suppose that the hon. Member for Leicester was actuated by party motives, yet the hon. Member would have done well had he made his Motion more comprehensive. It was well known that there were many magistrates in the position, in this respect, of Mr. Churchward, and as, of course, there was no party feeling or political animosity in the present Motion, as the pure and proper administration of justice was the only object in view, it was clear that the wider the scope of the Motion the more effective it must be. He was of opinion that all personalities should be avoided, and therefore he would mention no case involving the name of any Gentleman in that House; but every one conversant with the political history of this country knew that not only Committees of that House, but tribunals more strictly judicial, such as Royal Commissions, had found that there were many instances of gentlemen who had dealt in election matters in the same manner as Mr. Churchward was charged with acting. He, consequently, proposed to move, by way of Amendment, to omit all the words in the Motion after the word "of," and to add the following words:—

"All persons in the Commission of the Peace in any County, City, or Borough who have been found, either by Committees of this House or by Royal Commissions guilty of, or privy or assenting to, corrupt practices in Parliamentary Elections."

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the words "removal of" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "all persons in the Commission of the Peace of any County, City, or Borough who have been found, either by Committees of this House or by Royal Commissions guilty of, or privy or assenting to, corrupt practices at Parliamentary Elections."
—(Mr. Bentinck.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the purpose of the Amendment is, I suppose, to get additional words tacked to the Motion with the view of enabling hon. Members to vote against the Motion in its original form. I did not gather from the speech of the hon. Mover of the Amendment whether that was his intention, and I shall be glad to know whether the additional words are proposed with that view. If so, I think it is the duty of the Government to state, for the guidance of the House, their opinion on a question of a very grave and important nature, and the importance of which I do not think the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) at all appreciates. I heard his answer to-night to a question put to him from his own side of the House relating to two Members of this House. I did not hear, but I became acquainted in the usual way with the answer he gave on a former occasion to a somewhat similar question. I own I can sympathize with the right hon. Gentleman up to a certain point, inasmuch as I think that class of questions is one of extreme delicacy and difficulty; but I do not sympathize with his practice in attempting to get rid of these subjects as if they were matters that could be treated with great levity. With regard to the Amendment, it appears to me that the subject embraced by it is a very serious and grave one. I am far from saying that much of the matter comprised in it may not deserve the consideration of this House, and I think that, as the circumstances referred to arise out of recent Reports of Commissions, it would have been proper for the Executive Government to state their opinion for the guidance of the House in respect to the course to be taken. The Amendment is not necessarily in propriety or justice entitled to be annexed to the original Motion. This Amendment lays down the principle, if I understand it aright, that whenever a Select Committee of this House or a Royal Commission has found that any person was guilty of corrupt practices such person shall be included within the scope of the Motion, and Her Majesty shall be prayed to remove him from the commission of the peace. That is a very great extension of the original Motion, and an extension not only as to the persons, but as to the principle. I fully admit that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would be perfectly justified in challenging my hon. Friend to accede to an addition to his Motion with regard to all persons who stand in the same position as Mr. Churchward; but that is not the issue which he has raised. Here I may remark that I was totally igignorant of anything that had happened as to the case of Mr. Churchward since the last debate in this House, until I heard of the question put by my hon. Friend, and I am exceedingly sorry that anything should have occurred which should render it necessary to recur to a matter that cannot be associated with agreeable recollections for any of us. Mr. Churchward does not stand simply in the position of a gentleman against whom a Select Committee of this House, or any tribunal extraneous to this House, has formed a certain judgment. The broad and palpable difference is this, that the judgment of the Committee has been adopted in the first instance by the Executive Government, and in the second instance by the House itself. It is not therefore upon the decision of a Select Committee or a Royal Commission, but upon the vote and judgment of the House itself that my hon. Friend, as I apprehend, takes his stand. The distinction is broad and clear between that sort of preliminary finding, which the decision of the Committee of 1859 would have been had nothing followed, and the finding we have now before us, when that decision was challenged, and after full debate was affirmed by a majority in this House. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Dickson) in his very able speech has cited, as though they were independent witnesses, the testimony of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India (Sir Stafford Northcote) who was concerned in these transactions—although, by the direct assertion of the Committee, innocently concerned, and everybody who knows him must be convinced that he could not be otherwise concerned—and of a noble Lord (Lord John Manners) who was one of the minority in the Committee. The hon. and gallant Gentleman also goes back to the evidence, and thinks his account of that evidence is sufficient to induce the House to overlook, and to condemn, as partial and prejudiced, the judgment of that Committee. That judgment, however, is a formidable document. I must call the attention of the House to two paragraphs in it, and as the hon. and gallant Gentleman read a letter written by the noble Lord ascribing the judgment to political malevolence—

LORD JOHN MANNERS: No, I did not.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think I heard the words.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. OSBORNE: It was the gloss which the hon. and gallant Gentleman put upon the noble Lord's letter.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad to hear it is so; but I confess I should have thought that was the natural construction of the words. If, however, that was not the noble Lord's intention, so much the better. Well, in the Committee these questions were asked by Mr. Crawford—I confess I am very sorry to be obliged to read this, but after what has been said with regard to the judgment of the Committee I am compelled to do so—

"Did you vote at the previous election for Dover? Mr. Churchward: Yes.

"For whom did you vote? For the Secretary to the Admiralty, Mr. Bernal Osborne.

"Then you voted for 'the Gentleman with the long tongue?' Yes, I voted for the Gentleman with the long tongue; I voted for Mr. Osborne.

"Did you vote for him from political considerations? No; not at all. I distinctly stated that I did not support him on political considerations, but because I thought that as he was the Secretary to the Admiralty, and as there was a chance of the harbour being turned over to the Admiralty, and that they were likely to buy it, I thought that Mr. Bernal Osborne could serve the interests of Dover and also my interests better than any one else."

That was the view taken with regard to the exercise of the franchise, and he made the announcement with satisfaction. With what face, I ask, are we to set ourselves to take measures for the prevention of bribery if such disposal of a vote, the exercise of a public trust, with a view to private benefit, is allowed to pass without censure? I now come to paragraph No. 6, which contained the words, "having resorted to corrupt expedients." An Amendment was moved by a Gentleman, always to be named with honour for his strict political integrity and his jealous guardianship of public interest, the late Sir Henry Willoughby, for leaving out those words and substituting for them "endeavoured to exercise an undue influence, as appears from his conversation with Captain Carnegie." The Committee divided, and a minority of 6 voted for the Amendment, and a majority of 8 against it, the majority including the late Lord Northbrook, then Sir Francis Baring, a man than whom a more perfect example of purity and impartiality in his public conduct with respect to any question of this class never occupied a place in this House. The paragraph was then put to the vote as it stands, being in the following terms:—

"While most anxious for the fulfilment of all engagements entered into in good faith between the Government and individuals, the Committee submits for the consideration of the House whether Mr. Churchward, in having resorted to corrupt expedients affecting injuriously the character of the representation of the people in Parliament, has not rendered it impossible for the House of Commons, with due regard to its honour and dignity, to vote the sums of money necessary to fulfil the agreement to extend his contract from the 20th of June, 1863, to the 26th of April, 1870."

That paragraph, containing the full breadth of the censure which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has impugned, was carried by a majority of 9 to 4, and in the majority was Sir Henry Willoughby, though that distinguished gentleman was on the same political side as Mr. Churchward. The Committee's Report came under the consideration of Lord Palmerston's Government, and they had to consider whether, with that Report before them, they would take upon themselves the responsibility of proposing this money. They determined that they would not assume any such responsibility. The question, however, was raised in this House by those who represented the views of the four dissenting members of the Committee. In the month of March, 1860, Captain Leicester Vernon challenged the Report of the Committee, and made a Motion to this effect—

"That this House, having considered the Report and the evidence presented by the Select Committee on Packet and Telegraph Contracts, is of opinion that the contract entered into ought to be fulfilled."

It was impossible to raise the issue more distinctly between the Committee and Mr. Churchward than was then done. That Motion was the subject of a long, animated, and searching debate, the result being that when the House divided 117 persons supported it, and 162 adopted the Report of the Committee by giving a negative to the Motion. There was afterwards a series of proceedings year after year with which the House need not be troubled, and never, except on a single occasion, was a vote of this House passed for money for the Dover contract without certainly in the most invidious manner including the name of Mr. Churchward, in order to oust him from any monies stipulated in the contract made by him and condemned by the Committee. Once that mode of proceeding was questioned by a Motion to alter the form of the vote—the question of the Report of the Committee was never directly raised—and upon that occasion the Motion was rejected, I admit by a very small majority. But the Report of the Committee, when directly brought to issue, was, as I have shown, made its own by this House; this House, therefore, is as responsible for that Report as if we had all been members of the Committee, and that is the foundation of the relation between the House of Commons and Mr. Churchward. Now, I think it was most unfortunate, I think it was not consistent with a due respect to this House, that the Lord Chancellor, the head of the legal profession, should, under these circumstances, and at the very time, or immediately after the very period when the House had been renewing its Vote of Censure against Mr. Churchward, have appointed that gentleman to the magistracy. And here I may say that, in one respect, I am glad that a question was put from the opposite side of the House to-night, whatever the motive in putting it might be, because it gave to the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) an opportunity of making a declaration which I cannot but think does him the highest honour. He had called for inquiry, but of course he might know there would be difficulties in the way, and consequently he had voluntarily abjured all assumption of the dignity and power of the magistracy until he should be acquitted of the charge brought against him. I do not dwell on the charge made against Mr. Churchward in 1853, because I am not cognizant of the circumstances of the Report of that year, further than that I find, on referring to it, that the conduct pursued had been of a very extraordinary character, since it seems that something like forty or forty-five Government employments had been procured by Mr. Churchward for the purpose of distributing them among the electors of Plymouth. Now, under these circumstances, what are we to do? My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department told us the other night that the Lord Chancellor made this appointment in ignorance of what had taken place between this House and Mr. Churchward. Sir, I must say, if that be so, the Lord Chancellor has the utmost reason to complain of those gentlemen, however respectable, who recommended him to appoint Mr. Churchward to the magistracy in ignorance of facts grave and serious. But, if the Lord Chancellor acted in ignorance, it was his duty upon the discovery of the facts to undo what he had done before. It is no answer to the House to say that he was ignorant of the circumstances. I must confess when I heard that this debate was actually to take place I did hope that we should have had either from some Member of the Government who had communicated with Mr. Churchward, or from the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Major Dickson), some declaration which would have relieved us from the painful issue raised between the dignity and duty of this House to support its own authoritative judgments and the character of Mr. Churchward. Had Mr. Churchward authorized anybody on his behalf to whisper one syllable of regret for the conduct which drew upon him the censure of the Committee, and after that Report the judgment of this House and the loss of the contract, which, no doubt, must have been attended with more or less loss of commercial profit in itself legitimate, I feel confident—though I have not had any communication with him on that point—my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester would have withdrawn his Motion. I, for one, would not have supported it had any such communication been made. Does Mr. Churchward regret the conduct which brought down upon him the Reports of 1853 and of 1859 and the judgments of this House; or are we to be told, as has been fairly stated or implied in the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, that this judgment of the House and of its Committees were acts performed in the spirit of political partisanship? Well, then, that is to be the reason why Mr. Churchward is to remain a magistrate. Does not the hon. and gallant Gentleman see the fatal error that he commits when he himself raises the issue between the character of this House and the character of Mr. Churchward, because if Mr. Churchward is to remain a magistrate it is because the judgment of the Committee and of this House were governed by the spirit of political partisanship. That, therefore, is the admission we are called upon to make. Well, then, if that be the issue I accept it, but I accept it with regret. The smallest intimation on the part of Mr. Churchward, which, forbearing to accuse this House, would have expressed regret for the conduct in question might, I think, have induced the House to acquiesce, though not without some difficulty. But even in the choice between difficulties the House, I am sure, would have acquiesced; because it is irksome, it is odious, it is invidious, to have to go back upon questions of this kind which one might have hoped had been long closed. But as we are now distinctly told by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who appears here as the advocate and champion of Mr. Churchward that we must retrace our steps and must negative the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicester because our judgments were founded on political partisanship—[Major Dickson: I asked to postpone the Motion.] That is not the question at all; no Motion of that kind has been made, for an Amendment of another description is before the House. All I can say is if a Motion had been made to postpone the decision on the ground that there was some hope of an apology from Mr. Churchward, I, for one, would be prepared to recommend it. Or if some other Gentleman, authorized to speak for Mr. Churchward, will give us that satisfaction which the hon. and gallant Member has declined—has more than declined—to give, because he brings the majority of this House into court and condemns us—if that satisfaction is given, I, for one, shall feel that my duty is performed, and I shall gladly retire from this arena. But if it be not given, whatever pain I may feel, I see no option left me but to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicester, who has undertaken the discharge of a most painful duty.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, there are many points connected with this question upon which it is impossible that I should remain silent. I stand here, however, at some disadvantage, because I have just returned from my election in the country. I was not aware of what was coming before the House, and I am sorry to say that I am not in a position to-night to enter upon the general question; but as my name has been prominently brought forward in more than one of the speeches made to-night, and as I am now addressing a House of Commons, many Members of which are not familiar with what took place in the last House, I feel it my duty to say a few words with respect to the exact circumstances of the transactions of 1859, as well as I can recall them at this moment. I would premise that I know very little of what took place in 1853, and that I am not aware of the circumstances under which Mr. Churchward has now been appointed to the magistracy of Dover. It appears to be the feeling of the House, and a very natural feeling it is, that the circumstances which attended the making and the cancelling of the contract entered into by the Government of 1859 require the grave consideration of this House. As I was one of the parties that led to the appointment of the Committee, I may state the general character of the transaction, and why I feel that Mr. Churchward received an injury on the part of the House of Commons. I believed then, and I have always felt, that he was treated in a manner that gave him legitimate cause of complaint. Laying aside all questions of his general fitness for appointment to the magistracy, it was due to him that those who were in any way connected with the transaction of 1859 should endeavour to mark their sense that he was an injured man. That is the feeling with which I rose, and I feel it the more strongly because it was the pleasure of the Committee of 1859 to pronounce a verdict in which I on one side and Mr. Churchward on the other might be said to have been put on our trial, and the result was that they acquitted me and condemned him. Under these circumstances I was placed in a position which I felt to be most painful, because I always considered that if there had been condemnation of both, or an acquittal of both, little could have been said; but when the Committee chose to single him out for condemnation and pronounce an acquittal on me, they came to a verdict which I have repeatedly said I could not accede to—a verdict which, so long as I am able to stand up, I shall say was an unjust verdict. I am sorry, Sir, that I have not had time to refer carefully to the proceedings of the Committee; but I remember, generally, what the circumstances were. They were these:—Mr. Churchward—I am telling an old story to many Gentlemen, but there are others who were not Members of the last Parliament—Mr. Churchward was a contractor with the Government. His contract had several years to run. Mr. Churchward came to the Government of Lord Derby in 1859, when I was Secretary of the Treasury, and he asked a renewal of that contract some years before it expired. He gave as a reason that he was prepared to enlarge the service and build new vessels or something equivalent. His application was referred in due course to the Admiralty, and the Board of Admiralty reported in favour of his proposal. It was sent to the Postmaster General, who reported against the extension of the contract. The matter then came to the Treasury, and a Report was made by the permanent Under Secretary or some other officer of the Treasury. I forget on which side he reported. It then came to me at a time when an election was just about to take place. The important point, however, was this:—that the Board of Admiralty had reported in its favour before there was any prospect of an election. It came to me just at the moment the election was about to take place. In consequence of Mr. Churchward being likely to take an active part in the Dover election I put aside the papers, not intending to take them up again till the election was over. But I was afterwards induced to take them up by these considerations. I do not think I had any communication with Mr. Churchward; but my attention being brought to the subject, I sent for Mr. Churchward and suggested to him that he should modify his proposal. He said he would not do so. He added something about a contract with the French Government, and that there were special reasons for taking up the subject at that moment. I said there was a difficulty in dealing with it just when an election was about to take place. Mr. Churchward said it was a very hard case that it should be put off; he had made the proposal to the Government several months ago; it had been hung up in a public office, and was now to be put off because of an election which had, in fact, nothing to do with it. I thought he was right, and I thought I should be acting as a coward if I put it off. Accordingly, I considered it on its merits; I thought he had a good case for the renewal of his contract; I agreed to renew it, and it was renewed. These circumstances were brought forward; a Committee of the House was appointed to inquire into the circumstances of the case; and before that Committee there was brought out what I certainly never heard of, that a conversation had taken place between Mr. Churchward and Captain Carnegie, one of the Lords of the Admiralty, who was afterwards a candidate for Dover. It appears that in this conversation he, in the first instance, promised Captain Carnegie his support, and after he had so promised he made allusion to his contract and asked him to do what he could for him. But no communication was ever made by Captain Carnegie on the subject. The Admiralty had reported in its favour, and took no further step in the matter. Well, under these circumstances, when the matter came to be inquired into before the Committee, they came to the conclusion by a majority to the effect reported to the House; but when it is said that the Committee came to their decision by a large majority, and that the Committee was composed of Members taken equally from both sides of the House, I must say that, although the Members were taken equally from both sides of the House, yet there were two taken from this side who were in a very peculiar position. I was one, and Mr. Corry—I mention his name as he is not at present a Member of this House—who was then Secretary to the Admiralty, was the other. We were both placed on the Committee; but, although we took part in the examination of witnesses, we felt that being Members of the Government that made the contract, and Members of the Departments concerned in it, it would not be consistent with decency if we took part in the decision of the Committee, and the Members of this side were in a considerable minority, because two of them felt themselves to be in that critical kind of position. It is perfectly true that Sir Henry Willoughby, who sat on our side, voted on that occasion with the majority; but in the decision before, the majority consisted exclusively of Gentlemen on the other side of the House. I do not say the case was not one in which there might be difference of opinion. I am not endeavouring to charge the Committee of 1859 with having acted with a partisan spirit, but what I am anxious to say is this—that, looking carefully into the matter, and inquiring into what the conduct of Mr. Churchward was, I found it utterly impossible to come to the conclusion that he had recourse to corrupt expedients to obtain the contract on any grounds which did not fix on the Government that renewed it the imputation that they were parties to that corrupt contract. It was absurd to make a charge of corrupt expedients when he made no application, direct or indirect, to the Department which had the whole management of the business in its hands. I therefore say that the verdict was an inconsistent and perfectly futile judgment. If the opinion of the Committee was that there was anything corrupt in that contract, it was the duty of the Committee to report against those who granted it as well as against him who applied for it. Well, when they came to the conclusion that nothing implicated the officers of the Admiralty or Treasury in anything corrupt, I thought it was scarcely consistent that they should have fastened on Mr. Churchward the charge of having recourse to corrupt expedients. Having said this much I come back to the point that we have been in these relations with

Sir Stafford Northcote

Mr. Churchward—that we have felt he has had a grievous stigma inflicted upon him, and been subjected to heavy pecuniary loss, while we have been, I suppose I may say, honourably acquitted. That has been a very painful reflection to me and to others who hold the same opinion; and the more that whenever Mr. Churchward endeavoured to bring forward his case to have it fairly and impartially investigated he has always been refused the opportunity. He applied to be heard before the Dover Election Committee, where he might have been examined on oath; but he was told there was no reason for hearing him. He has more than once brought actions in Courts of Law; but he has been met by demurrer, on the technical ground that it was a matter alleged to affect the prerogative or public policy. He tried to refer the matter to arbitration—to Sir John Coleridge and several other gentlemen of high standing; but he has never been allowed that opportunity. The position, therefore, of Mr. Churchward, in the opinion of those cognizant of the proceedings of 1859, is one extremely painful—and which it is quite unfair that he should be placed in. I always myself said that I could not accept with any satisfaction the decision to which the Committee of 1859 arrived, which acquitted me while Mr. Churchward was found guilty. I am not at all aware as to how far he is fitted to be appointed a magistrate, but I shall certainly, as far as I can by my vote to-night, support the credit and reputation of a man who I think has been very unjustly treated.

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, I feel personally thankful to the right hon. Member who has just concluded his speech for not giving us a history of the events of 1853. I did think his friend, Mr. Churchward, might have applied to him the same epithet that he applied to me—that of being “long-tongued,”—with his digest of a blue book, which he has been pouring like invidious poison into our ears. I should not, upon this occasion, have displayed the length of that peccant member which has given me such unenviable notoriety, had I not been somewhat unnecessarily dragged into the debate. I never voted upon the Committee, as I thought had I done so I should have exposed myself to have my motives impugned, for there is probably no Gentleman in this House who knows more of Mr. Churchward than I do, and probably no Gentleman in this House rejoices less than I do in his acquaintance. But I cannot for that reason sit still upon this occasion. I abstain from giving my opinion upon the subject under discussion. I merely rise for one purpose. I think it has been rather insinuated by the hon. and gallant Officer (Major Dickson), who rejoices in the friendship of Mr. Churchward, that this Motion—and I stand corrected if I am wrong—had been brought to me to bring forward. I ask that hon. and gallant Officer, does he intend to fasten that upon me? I ask him this because, if he does intend to fasten that upon me, I tell him that—he is labouring under a very great mistake. Sir, that Motion was brought to me in the lobby of this House. [Major Dickson: That is all I said.] Yes; but you afterwards said that I had got a tool to hold it. [Major Dickson dissented.] I am glad to hear it. I wish the House to understand my position. Something was brought to me, but I said, “No; you can’t touch pitch without being defiled. I will have nothing to do with Mr. Churchward. You may get somebody else to do the work; I will not take any part in it.” I said, “I will take no part in the debate”—I have been forced to get up now by the insinuations of the hon. and gallant Officer—and what is more, when the subject is brought forward I will give no vote.” I have never voted against Mr. Churchward. I felt that I was not in a position to do so. I hope the House will give me credit for that, and I hope that the hon. and gallant Officer will give me credit for it. As to my having endeavoured to get anybody to bring this Motion forward, had I wanted to bring it forward, I should have brought it forward on my own responsibility. But I go further. I believe that the Lord High Chancellor of England has been most grossly and improperly calumniated in this matter. I believe that he is totally incapable of giving a commission of the peace to a man who he thought was an improper one to hold it. Having gone so far, I will say nothing about the occurrence of the year 1859, or of the “martyred Churchward” of the Treasury Bench; but this I will say, that if the Government have instructed my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Walpole), who we all know is the soul of honour, to get up in his place—as I recommend him to do, and if he does it I will ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his Motion—and say, “Mr. Churchward will retire quietly into the society of those friends who value his acquaintance in private life”—I merely throw this out as a suggestion—I think that it will make everybody comfortable. I shall give no vote in this instance, and I only rose in consequence of the insinuations of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. I hope that the hon. and gallant Officer is satisfied, and I hope Mr. Churchward will be satisfied.

Mr. BARROW said, he had been accused of being too loud on the hustings in his demand that corruption should be brought to punishment; but he held one great maxim of English policy to be that a man should not be punished two or three times for the same offence, and that such punishment should not be inflicted before the offender had been heard in his own defence. The real question before the House was this—would the House of Commons, upon various reports of what had occurred fourteen years ago, stigmatise a man for life, and punish him with the severest punishment that it was within their power to inflict? The House had already punished Mr. Churchward very seriously. He had no acquaintance with Mr. Churchward, and never had any conversation with him, and, except from what he had heard respecting him in that House, he knew nothing about that gentleman. But he thought that, whatever right the House might have to act upon the Report of one of its Committees, appointed to investigate a question affecting one of its own Members, they had no right to pronounce judicially upon the conduct of any man who had not been heard in his own defence. He understood from the speeches of two hon. Members that Mr. Churchward had challenged inquiry into the facts alleged against him, and that his application had been refused on some technical objection. He thought this was a good reason why the Motion of the hon. Gentleman asking the House to stigmatize Mr. Churchward without his being heard in his own defence should be rejected.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: Sir, it is most painful for those who have to discharge such a duty to rise in support of a Motion of this kind; but I cannot at all agree with the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, that this Motion is a proceeding in pœna against Mr. Churchward. What is the occasion of the Motion? It is that Mr. Churchward has been selected recently and for the first time as a fit person to be appointed one of Her Majesty’s Justices of the Peace for the borough of Dover.

Therefore the step which has occasioned this Motion has not been taken by the hon. Gentleman who makes this Motion, but by the Government that made the appointment. I say "by the Government" deliberately; because I feel sure that had the matter rested solely in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, for whom I entertain the utmost personal regard and respect, and had all the facts of the case been brought before him, he would not have thought this a desirable appointment. But we are told by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) that we are to take a much broader view of the matter, and that Her Majesty's Government fully and entirely accept the responsibility of the appointment of Mr. Churchward upon the footing of its being a proper mode of redressing an act of injustice which has been committed by this House. I must say that that view appears to me to be a most extraordinary one, and that this step on the part of Her Majesty's Government opens up still more serious questions for our consideration than that which appeared to be raised by the Motion before the House. Are the judgments of this House never to be authoritative—are they never to be settled? Is every Ministry who succeed another Ministry at all times to be entitled to disregard the repeated judgments of the House—judgments which have even passed into the form of Acts of Parliament—Session after Session? I thought that the divisions of even our Committees, if we believed that they had discharged their duties honestly and fairly, were always entitled to our support. But this is not merely a case where only the judgment of a Committee is involved. The Committee which decided this case was one constituted of as honourable gentlemen as ever sat on such an inquiry. They were Sir Francis Baring (Lord Northbrook), Sir Henry Willoughby, Mr. Scholefield, and others, all of whom concurred in passing this Report. Therefore, I say that it is a very serious thing for the House, which had trusted entirely to this Report, upon the authority of those hon. Members, to be asked to sanction the proceeding of Her Majesty's Government in this matter, and to treat as a nullity the finding of that Committee upon this important subject. The finding of that Committee has been followed up by three consecutive Resolutions of this House, and on those Resolutions no less than four Acts of Parliament have been founded; and yet after that we are told by the present Government that they conceive it to be their duty to mark by some honour to Mr. Churchward their sense of the injustice which the decision of the House has done him. In that case I say that at least the House ought to require very strong and clear proof before they admit that any injustice has been done in this matter. Having more than once considered the evidence laid before the Committee, I differ from those who say that injustice has been done, and I shall be much deceived if that be not the opinion of the majority of those whom I am addressing. In the first place, let me call the attention of the House to this transaction, the evidence upon which, without trenching on the region of oral statement, mainly consists of written documents. I put aside the fact that Mr. Churchward had been subjected to the adverse Report of a Committee, on account of electioneering prosecuted with political zeal. Mr. Churchward obtained the contract, and under Lord Aberdeen's Government he applied for an extension of his contract without success. The correspondence ceases in 1857, a new Government comes in, he renews his application to them in January, 1859, and, of course, everybody who recollects the particulars of that Government acknowledge that even at that time the possibility of a general election was a thing which might be present to men's minds. The Board of Admiralty, not the First Lord, conceived that the investigation of the application on its merits belonged to the Treasury, and forwarded the application to the Treasury, with a "favourable recommendation," which, given by the Board of Admiralty, meant nothing whatever, as the Board did not profess to be judges of the question of renewing the contract, and did not profess to investigate the matter on its merits. The First Lord said he knew nothing about it; and therefore the reference to the Board of Admiralty of the 23rd of February was a matter of trifling importance. What was done? The Treasury, no doubt, discharged its duty in referring the matter to the Post Office; and on the 10th of January the Postmaster General reported strongly against the application for the renewal of the contract. Mr. Stephenson, of the Treasury, confirmed the Postmaster General; Mr. Hamilton, of the Treasury, differed from them. Before anything more was done, came the defeat of the then Government on the then Reform Bill, and it is remarkable that these questions always coincide with Reform Bills. Of course, everybody at that time knew that a dissolution was impending; and it actually took place on the 19th of April. Now the plot thickens. I have said before, and say again, I am ready to acquit the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India (Sir Stafford Northcote) of doing anything unworthy of his position; therefore, I protest against the fallacies into which his excessive generosity leads him, when he says, "If you condemn Mr. Churchward you must condemn me." I say there is no ground for any such conclusion. The right hon. Gentleman might have had, and I dare say had, reasons before him which might satisfy other men as well as himself. He was therefore totally free from the imputation of any improper motive. What he eventually did was right; but the evidence is irresistible, and it convinced the Committee that, as regards Mr. Churchward, electioneering was mixed up with the matter, and that the two things went on together. On the 4th of April Mr. Churchward writes a very urgent letter to Mr. Hamilton, of the Treasury, in which he says—

"No compensation whatever could be offered me equivalent to the extension of my contract that I have prayed for. The extension is the pivot on which every department of my business turns. With the extension I have hopes of the ultimate success of my enterprise."

And so on, urging the case in the strongest possible manner. The next day, as it appears from the evidence of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India (Sir Stafford Northcote), Mr. Murray, Private Secretary to the First Lord of the Admiralty, writes to Captain Carnegie a letter, in which he says—

"My dear Carnegie,—Sir William Jolliffe is very anxious to see you this evening at the Committee-room, at 6, Victoria Street. They say they must get you to stand either for Dover or Devonport, both of which must be fought by Admiralty men. I am inclined to think you would have the best chance at Devonport. I don't like Dover much. The enthusiasts think they can turn out Russell. I told them they might turn out Osborne, but had no chance with Russell; and, in fact, I believe the latter would pull through the former. I will send for Churchward and ask him what the chances are; but I think, as a friend, you will have to stand for one of these two places."

While on the 4th of April Mr. Churchward is writing and pressing his claims for the extension of the contract, on the 5th of April Mr. Murray is communicating with

Mr. Churchward with a view to what is going on at Dover. That is not all. There is a letter written clearly about that time, though the date is not given. It is given on the evidence of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India, and I ask particular attention to its terms. The right hon. Baronet is asked—

"Had you any other pressure put upon you except that which Sir William Jolliffe brought to bear to induce you to expedite this business just at the critical time of the election?"

My right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) said that Sir William Jolliffe, who occupied an important and responsible position in that Government, urged the business to be expedited.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: No! just the contrary. Sir William Jolliffe said—

"This is a matter not to be brought forward during an election. There is an election coming on. You had better, therefore, deal with it before, or put it off until after, the election."

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: I am much obliged to my right hon. Friend, and I accept that statement. To the question I have read my right hon. Friend replied—

"There was another person who mentioned the matter, not to me, but to Mr. Hamilton, about the same time or, as nearly as possible, at the same time Mr. Hamilton received from Mr. Whitmore a letter, which has been already mentioned as having been written by Mr. Herbert Murray to Mr. Whitmore at the Treasury. I do not remember the exact terms, but it was to this effect, 'We are anxious to expedite Mr. Churchward's matter, and we want him to go down to Dover to canvass.'"

The question is whether we are to stigmatize the Committee as having come to an unwarrantable verdict. It is to be recollected that Captain Carnegie, after personal communication with Mr. Churchward as well as with Mr. Murray, believed that there was substantially an understanding or bargain for Mr. Churchward's vote and interest. Mr. Churchward distinctly denies that, but Captain Carnegie says—

"Mr. Churchward spoke to me on the subject of the pending election for Dover, and, having volunteered his support and promised me his assistance in general terms, he made an allusion to his anxiety to obtain the renewal of his contract, and he said that they were anxious to defer signing the renewal of his contract until after the election was over; but he felt that that would be too hard upon him, and that he would rather prefer voting for Mr. Bernal Osborne and for myself, inasmuch as he would then have a friend in power, whoever was in office. He also added that he thought they wanted him to return two Government Members for Dover, and if they did so he should be obliged to comply with it."

Afterwards Mr. Carnegie says he distinctly understood the effect of this communication to be that Mr. Churchward, if his wishes as to the contract were gratified, would help to return two Government Members for Dover; otherwise his feelings and his own interest in possible events would be to divide his vote and interest, and give half of it to Mr. Bernal Osborne. Was that not evidence which the Committee were entitled to believe, concurring, as it does, with the documents and facts I have mentioned? The Treasury Minute approving the contract was signed on the 15th of April. Is it possible, in this state of things, for the House to say it is in a situation to treat Mr. Churchward as an injured man, injured by this House? But the picture would not be complete without Mr. Churchward's portraiture of himself. Mr. Churchward denies he entered into such a bargain; he denies that such a conversation with Captain Carnegie took place. It was for the Committee to judge to whom they could give most credit, and of materials for their judgment there were some by no means of slight importance in the answers given by Mr. Churchward himself to several questions put to him. In answer to the question, "Did you vote for him (Mr. Osborne) from political considerations?" he said—

"No, not at all. I distinctly stated that I did not support him on political considerations, but because I thought that, as he was the Secretary of the Admiralty, and there was a chance of the harbour being turned over to the Admiralty, and that they were likely to buy it, Mr. Bernal Osborne could serve the interest of Dover, and also my interest, better than anyone else."

This is the account of this gentleman himself, giving the grounds on which he disposed of his political influence. But if these were the grounds, according to his own account, why Mr. Churchward gave his vote and used his influence, is it not probable that Captain Carnegie's account of what had previously taken place was the correct one? The question is, which of these accounts is the correct one? Did Mr. Churchward use his political influence in accordance with the interests of Dover and of himself, or upon purely political and independent grounds? Then, to proceed to the Question No. 1,075—

"With regard to the vote you gave at Dover, you gave it entirely on personal grounds, as concerned yourself, and without reference to the contract?—On personal grounds, certainly, but it did enter into my consideration at the time that, inasmuch as I had received at the hands of the Government an extension of my contract, it would be unbecoming in me to oppose the Government."

Therefore it singularly enough happened that this consideration did actuate the vote which he gave. So that although he denied that he had told Captain Carnegie that it was to be so, singularly enough the event occurred, and according to his own showing a sense of gratitude directed the vote which he gave. Gratitude for what? For the extension of this contract. Then what was his answer to Question 1,879?—

"Having heard the evidence (of Captain Carnegie and Mr. Murray), do you adhere to the version you gave to the Committee the other day?—I repeat that at that interview, in the presence of Mr. Murray, not one word was mentioned respecting the contract, or my anxiety to obtain the signing of the contract. I should not have dreamt of doing so imprudent a thing."

The House will judge whether the Committee should have thought that was consistent with the statement of Captain Carnegie. Then came this question—

"What number of votes have you in connection with your establishment?—I think there are about fifty-two belonging to my establishment who have votes."

"Did they all vote right?—I think they did. I do not think I had one traitor."

I have no inclination to detain the House; but I cannot help saying that, after the evidence which was adduced, the Committee were most fully justified in the conclusion at which they arrived as far as Mr. Churchward was concerned. If the House does not wish to give countenance to the mixing up the obtaining of Government contracts with electioneering for the Government, the House will not by its vote to-night depart from the principles on which it has already acted, or express its approbation of the selection of this gentleman to fill the office of a justice of the peace, especially of a justice of the peace for that very borough of Dover.

MR. FRESHFIELD said, he was at all times most unwilling to obtrude himself on the notice of the House; but there were occasions on which silence might be construed as a want of moral courage, and the present was, in his opinion, one of those occasions. As one of the Members for Dover, he thought it was his duty to say a few words respecting the Motion under discussion; because he feared a great act of injustice would be perpetrated on the Government and on Mr. Churchward if that Motion were allowed to pass. It was cruel in the extreme to attack an individual in the way in which Mr. Churchward had been attacked that evening without any adequate cause. The present attack did not emanate from Dover, nor from the county of Kent, nor from any locality connected with Mr. Churchward or his doings. There were hon. Gentlemen round about him, representatives of the county of Kent, who, if there had been any impropriety in this appointment, would have been ready to point it out to the House. But the attack proceeded from that cold and bitter locality the North of England, and was supported by the hon. Gentleman who once represented Dover, but who now hailed from another place, he having owed his displacement in Dover to the influence of Mr. Churchward, his legitimate and proper influence in that borough. What were the charges brought against the Government and against Mr. Churchward? First, that in 1853 a Committee which sat to inquire into the election for Plymouth found that Mr. Churchward had been guilty of bribery, in the sense of having offered a place to an individual who had voted. The Committee sat a second time, to determine whether further proceedings should be taken or not, and the first Resolution they adopted was to the effect that it was the prevailing opinion in Plymouth at that time that after a man had promised his vote the promise of a place was not an infraction of the law. What was the second Resolution of the Committee? It was that the circumstances of the case did not call for further proceedings. Then there were the proceedings of the Committee of 1859. In 1859 a Committee of that House found that Mr. Churchward had been guilty of resorting to corrupt expedients affecting injuriously the character of the representatives of the people in circumstances affecting a contract for the mail packet service. The question in dispute was one involving moral character, and if such a question were put to the House there could be no doubt of the result. Now, what were the numbers on the two divisions? On the first, 162 to 117; and on the second, 176 to 168. Those numbers clearly proved that the House was not voting simply and solely on a question of moral character or conduct. It was plain that it was a party question, and that parties being then nearly equally divided, the divisions were very close ones. Mr. Churchward, however, did not submit quietly to the judgment of the House, but instituted legal proceedings for the purpose of proving the validity of the contract. The then Attorney General, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), opposed those proceedings; but, instead of pleading that the contract was corrupt, and consequently invalid, he raised a demurrer to the effect that on the terms of the contract there was no mutual obligation. Unfortunately for Mr. Churchward it was a unilateral contract. Mr. Churchward was bound to carry the mails if required, but the Government was not bound to employ him. Such, at least, was the decision of the Courts of Law. But it should be borne in mind that Mr. Churchward had to fight the Government, which was so ably represented by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond, and what chance had he under those circumstances? Hon. Members had noticed that evening the spirit displayed by the late Attorney General. The hon. and learned Gentleman put into the Acts of Parliament a clause such as had never before been introduced into any Act, and that clause excluded Mr. Churchward from the benefit of contracts made with the Government. Such a proceeding was, in his judgment, unconstitutional. The evidence of corruption in regard to the contract was simply that Mr. Churchward, being in a room with two gentlemen of unimpeachable character, made use of a particular expression. Mr. Churchward ought to have been entitled to show that his contract was good, notwithstanding that the House of Commons might have been affronted by a conversation that had taken place, in which it was supposed that Mr. Churchward said he could influence votes at Dover. If so, that might be the act of a simple man, but not of a corrupt man. The use of such words tended to show that there was no corruption, for people did not talk corruptly if they thought and acted corruptly. It was idle to contend that light words spoken in casual conversation were to have any relevance as regards the contract being corrupt. Indeed, it was immaterial whether those words were used or not. It was proved at the time that the contract was necessary, that the Government were rightly to extend the period of the contract, and that it was right that Mr. Churchward should come to the Government and ask them to extend it. Mr. Churchward was able to obtain a more rapid transit of the French mails. The contract was entered into properly and righteously enough, and there was nothing even alleged to be wrong, but a supposed statement which was denied. Mr. Churchward had been unjustly used, especially when the hon. and learned Member for Richmond, the then Attorney General, shut him up in a Court of Law, by insisting that the contract did not mean that he was to receive payment, but meant that he was always to have his boats ready for the service of Her Majesty's Government. An attack was unjustly and unfairly made upon Mr. Churchward, so as to put him in a position of not being entitled to receive the grant which the Crown had made for the services which that gentleman had rendered. And that was followed up by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond, the late Attorney General, preventing Mr. Churchward from showing in a Court of Law that his contract was a valid one, by meeting him with a demurrer to that very contract for the rescinding of which the hon. and learned Gentleman was responsible. Mr. Churchward had been most unjustly treated. When he (Mr. Freshfield) heard that night the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman, made as it was in that spirit of advocacy which was so oppressive, when administered by so eminent an advocate, he could not refrain from addressing the House against this attempt to shut out Mr. Churchward under those circumstances from exercising the office of magistrate for the borough of Dover, which his position in that place justly entitled him to occupy. This proceeding would be a great hardship on Mr. Churchward, following, as it would, the hardship of having denied him the benefit of the contract which he made with the Crown.

Bentinck, G. A. C.
 Lowther, J.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope the House will pause before assenting to a general proposition of this nature without any examination into it.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I hope the House and I hope the country will consider well the purport of the short speech that has now been extracted from the right hon. Gentleman. About an hour ago it was my duty to rise upon the Amendment propounded—no doubt, honestly propounded—by my hon. Friend the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck), and I pointed out, or endeavoured to point out, that the subject-matter of the Amendment, at the proper time, deserved the consideration of the House of Commons. In doing so, Sir, I was guided mainly by the fact that this important Amendment had been proposed and the discussion on it raised without previous notice given to the House. On that account it did appear to me that the time for the discussion of the question had not arrived, and that it should not be discussed except on notice, because of its novelty and because of the breadth of the field which it covered. The right hon. Gentleman has now discovered this. "The engineer hoist with his own petard," and smarting under the consequences of the victory which his Friends have gained for him, now falls back on words of wisdom, which he would not speak while it was yet time. I raised that issue. I did not object to the substance of the Amendment. I am convinced that the time is come when this House should take care as to the impression it creates out of doors with regard to the seriousness of its intentions at striking at acts of bribery in high places. But upon the issue of the unfitness of the present time. I objected to the addition of the words of the Amendment. The House has overruled my objection by a majority. The House has decided by a majority that this is the time to entertain the question, and Her Majesty's Government have formed a portion of that majority. If, Sir, this be the time to entertain the question, I feel that my duty to the House, and my respect to the House, bind me to say "Aye" or "No" on it. My choice is made in a moment. I will say "Aye" on it.

MR. NEWDEGATE: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) warned us to think well before we adopted the Amendment that is now before us. I voted against the Motion, because I felt that we were likely to be guilty of a gross injustice in punishing a man a second time for an offence committed in a matter which a Committee had recommended should not be further proceeded with, and I voted in the majority. The right hon. Gentleman now for the sake of attracting popular attention supports an Amendment which he condemned at the beginning of this debate. I have no love of corruption. I supported last year the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley) upon the subject of bribery and corruption, and I did so honestly, in the sense in which Mr. Pitt proposed to punish bribery and corruption—namely, by disfranchising the corrupt constituencies. I am prepared to pursue that course again; and I know that the hon. Baronet will not be wanting when the time comes. But I am not going to vote for an Address to the Crown to issue a fishing inquiry into transactions of years long past. I am not going to vote for a proposition that the right hon. Gentleman condemned at the beginning of this discussion. He may find it convenient to change his opinion during the evening. I shall retain mine. All I hope is that when the time comes for the hon. Baronet the Member for Northamptonshire to cite Mr. Pitt's opinion for the effectual prevention of bribery we shall be supported by the right hon. Gentleman.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions for the removal of all persons in the Commission of the Peace of any County, City, or Borough who have been found, either by Committees of this House or by Royal Commissions guilty of, or privy or assenting to, corrupt practices at Parliamentary Elections.

NAVY—PADDLE-WHEEL STEAMERS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, it would be in the recollection of Members of the House that the right hon. Gentleman now Secretary of State for War, and then at the head of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington), made a statement in answer to a question put to him that on his accession to office he had not found the reserves of ships in the state in which he had a right to expect them. There was no qualification in that statement as to the class of vessels. It was accepted by the public as referring generally to the state of the navy and to all classes of ships, and there resulted a series of attacks in the press upon the administration of the late Board. The statement further alarmed not only those who were prone to panics about the state of the navy, but those who dreaded another re-construction of the navy similar to that inaugurated in 1859 by the right hon. Gentleman. At the commencement of this Session, the Duke of Somerset addressed himself to this subject in "another place," and defended the condition in which he had left the navy. The noble Earl at the head of the Government (the Earl of Derby) answered him, and produced in justification of his Colleague an extract from a memorandum by Sir Frederick Grey, which had been found among papers left at the Admiralty, and on the faith of which he said the right hon. Gentleman had made his answer in this House. Sir Frederick Grey was very much dissatisfied with the use made of his name, and of some casual remarks of his in a memorandum upon the policy of building some paddle-wheel steamers, and had asked him to move for a Return of the memorandum. Finding, however, that it would be contrary to the forms of the House to move for a paper which had been quoted in "another place," he (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) contented himself with making a general denial on behalf of Sir Frederick Grey, in the course of the debate on the state of the dockyards, and there the matter would have rested. But in the course of the very able and clear statement made by the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox), on bringing in the Estimates, the memorandum was again quoted. Sir Frederick Grey now wished that his memorandum and the submission of the Controller, to which it was an answer, should be laid before the House, so that it might be seen how little ground existed for quoting him in justification of what was said by the right hon. Gentleman. The memorandum was written in February of last year, before the Estimates were brought in. It had reference solely to a proposal to build a paddle-wheel steamer, on the merits of which there was some difference of opinion. Sir Frederick Grey contended that in no wise could it be used in support of the general statement made last Session, or in any way as justifying the charges against the late Board. There never was any difference of opinion between himself and the Duke of Somerset as regarded the policy of building ships, or the condition in which the navy was at any time, and he said that any attempt to quote him as an authority for statements of such a nature was entirely unwarranted.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, a Copy of a Submission of the Comptroller of the Navy to the Board of Admiralty, and a Memorandum thereon by Admiral Sir Frederick Grey, on the building of Paddle-wheel Steamers, dated 1866."
—(Mr. Shaw-Lefevre.)

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he felt compelled to resist the application. The memorandum was attached to confidential communications between the Controller and the Board of Admiralty on questions of public policy and referring to other matters. It would be extremely inconvenient for the public service that these papers should be produced. That was his only reason for resisting the Motion. Both in the debates in that House and in "another place" ample justice had been done to the Duke of Somerset and the late Board of Admiralty.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was the universal rule that when a document was quoted by a Minister of the Crown the Government were bound to lay it on the table of the House. He should not press for any document the production of which was declared to be injurious to the public service; but he could not help expressing his surprise that in both Houses of Parliament a document should have been used in debate which it was now declared could not be produced.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he feared he had not made himself understood. The memorandum was only a short one, but it was attached to correspondence of considerable length relating to matters of public policy which it was not desirable to produce, but without which it would be scarcely intelligible.

MR. CHILDERS said, that if that were the case the document should not have been quoted. Towards the end of last Session it was said that the present Board of Admiralty found the reserve in a state in which they did not expect to see it. That statement was challenged in "another place;" and in reply a minute of Sir Frederick Grey was quoted, which should not have been done if the document could not be produced without injury to the public service. Sir Frederick Grey was put in an unfair position by its non-production.

SIR JOHN HAY said, there was no objection to produce Sir Frederick Grey's memorial itself if it were desired. It had already appeared in print. But the confidential communications contained in the Controller's submission it would be extremely undesirable to lay before the House.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he had no wish for the memorial without the submission of the Controller to which it formed an answer. On Sir Frederick Grey's part he entirely repudiated the construction which had been put upon that document.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Mr. Cogan, Sir John Gray.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he objected to proceeding with such an important Bill at that late hour (quarter past twelve.) That measure and the one which immediately followed it (Transubstantiation, &c., Declaration Bill) involved important constitutional questions which must be considered together, and it would be impossible properly to debate them at that hour. There were many Amendments on the paper respecting it, and he thought it impossible that they could make any progress with the measure at that sitting. He should therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

MR. COGAN said, he hoped that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare would be allowed to go into Committee. After the lengthened debate and the exciting scenes which had already taken place, his hon. and learned Friend would be satisfied if the Bill were committed pro forma. As a matter of courtesy he hoped this would be conceded.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had supported this Bill at every stage, and was still prepared to give it his best adhesion.

At the same time, though limited in extent, the Bill certainly did involve serious constitutional questions which the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Newdegate) consistently treated as belonging to a very high range of politics. A debate of somewhat unusual length and animation on a subject of considerable interest had already taken place that evening. He could not but think that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was justified in objecting to going on with the Bill at present, and he should therefore recommend his hon. Friend not to press his Motion.

MR. GREGORY said, he hoped the hon. Member for North Warwickshire in any future discussion of the Bill would meet them in a fair and honourable spirit, and that no vexatious delays would be interposed to the progress of the Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he could assure the hon. Member that his only wish was that the House should fully understand the great and important principle involved in the question.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that as the hon. Member for North Warwickshire objected to going into Committee on the Bill at present, and as the right hon. Member for South Lancashire recommended that he should not press his Motion, he would give notice of the Committee on the Bill for that day week.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. H. LEATHAM.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. LEATHAM: I beg to ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while I make a personal explanation. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bagge) last night asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer—

“Whether Mr. William Henry Leatham is the same Mr. Leatham who was found personally guilty of bribery by an Election Committee of this House after the General Election of 1859, and ordered by this House to be prosecuted by Mr. Attorney General?”

Sir, my answer to that is that I was not found personally guilty of bribery by a Select Committee of this House. A Resolution directly the contrary was come to—

“That it was not proved that such bribery was committed with the knowledge or consent of the sitting Member.”

That paper I placed in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I hoped that my honour was safe in his hands. However, he did not choose to refer to the letter which I had placed in his hands, but in a jocose vein answered the question of the hon. Member for West Norfolk. I had no opportunity, in the hurry of the moment, of stating what I wished to say on the subject, and I hope the House will excuse me if I come before it on this occasion, because the House was excited last night and passed a Resolution which may affect me personally in a different way. All I say is, that the only accusation made against me from the beginning to the end of all the persecutions and proceedings connected with the Wakefield election was, that I wrote a letter to my brother-in-law, in London, asking for money to be sent down to my agent. That was the only act I ever committed. That letter is now in my hand—or rather a copy of it—and I think it only due to myself to read it to the House. This letter, by a great misfortune, was torn in two by my brother-in-law, and it was only on one half of that letter that I was convicted at York. I think that a more unfortunate thing could not possibly have happened to a gentleman who writes a confidential letter to his brother-in-law in London than that such a letter should afterwards be published to the whole world. That brother-in-law, being a man of business, tore the letter in halves, and gave one half to his clerk, putting the other half into his pocket, expecting to find time to acknowledge the letter. He never could afterwards find that half of the letter. That gentleman was examined before the Commission at Wakefield. I was present on the last day of the Commission sitting at Wakefield. I was waiting expecting to be called to supplement that part of the letter which was not in court. I was not, however, called. The Commission was closed, and I knew nothing of the impression which that letter created in the minds of the Commissioners until I saw their Report. I wrote to the Commissioners begging to be examined. They declined to examine me, and the prosecution went forward. The writing of that letter was the only accusation against me. What I did I did under the best of all motives, and I do not regret that I wrote it, but I do regret that it was torn in pieces, and that I did not bring it before the Select Committee of the House. This has placed me under a considerable disadvantage. When the Committee sat I had resigned my seat. I saw what the election agents had done, and did not expect to be examined. The room was cleared, and I was sent for in a great hurry. Three or four questions only were put to me, but none of them referred to this letter. I said to Sir William Hayter in private that if I had been asked if my relative sent down money from London to the Wakefield election I should at once have said that he had. I was not there as a voluntary witness, the question was not put to me, and the matter did not come before the Committee. That is the only point I regret. It has placed me under a great disadvantage. But I cannot think that this House, with this explanation before the whole world, will receive it in any other way than as the explanation of an honest man, placed in circumstances over which he had no control. Taunts having been thrown out on the other side of the House to this side about personal acts of bribery having been committed, I declare that I never was in that position; and some of my nearest friends who are Conservatives have told me that I never was in that position. But because that letter was torn in pieces the Commissioners took an unfavourable view of the matter. One of them said I had made a clean breast of it, and deserved an indemnity; but the other two refused, and kept from me my certificate. The matter was talked about in the House and made public, and the Chief Commissioner, who is now one of the Judges of the land, said that, in his opinion, I had earned my certificate. After seven years of endurance I come before the House to state what I believe to be the truth. It is not for me to throw dirt upon my own party, but under certain circumstances I must say I was victimised. I do not wish to blame the agents. We know what they are when we have had experience of them. I had not before that time had that experience. I have now had better experience of them, and I took precautions at the last election which saved my election, and I will take the same precautions at every future election. My agent told me on the election in question that he was not a monied man, and that he wanted a sum of money to conduct the election. He told me about the number of watchers, clerks, and people about the place who would be required, and I arranged to supply the money. This is the letter I wrote—

“My dear Edmund,—I was glad to see your kind note this morning with good wishes for the election at Wakefield. I am obliged to find some money for ways and means immediately, and rather than draw the money out of the bank, where there are some clerks who might talk”—

There were two clerks who voted for the hon. Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay), who, at his first election, was returned for Wakefield. These clerks were Conservatives, and I did not wish them to know what was going on upon the Liberal side of the question. I respect these men, but I knew their opinions, and how they had recorded their votes for the hon. Member for Stamford when he came forward at Wakefield. The letter goes on to say—

“I have been thinking that you would not mind my asking you (that is O. G. and Co.) to lend me £1,000 for a short time, so as not to be known at Leatham, Tew, and Co's. If you see no objection to meet my wishes I would thank you to send the money in four divisions, in registered covers, waiting the acknowledgment of each packet, in small Bank of England notes (£5, £10, and £20), to Joseph Wainwright, Esq., Solicitor, Wakefield.”

Let me say, having been a banker, that no man in his senses going to commit bribery would have sent for Bank of England notes, for every Bank of England note sent into Yorkshire is endorsed, and can be followed into every part of the country. There was clearly no intention at that moment to commit bribery. The letter goes on—

“This money is wanted for legitimate purposes, as my agent is not a monied man, as well as for”—

There the letter is torn in two, but it went on—

“payments to watchers and runners, of a somewhat doubtful character.”

Mr. Gurney had no recollection of what followed. That is the whole of the matter, and I now leave it with the House. Before I sit down, let me say that the proof of the truthfulness of my examination before the Commissioners came out at the trial at York, and every word I said was proved to be as true as it possibly could be. If a Gentleman can go before Commissioners and be examined to the extent of 260 questions, and when the statements made by him on such examination are proved to be true before a legally authorized tribunal, no Gentleman has a right to taunt him with untruthfulness. There was a prejudice—an immense prejudice—against me. I have no business to defend what went on at Wakefield; I am not here to throw stones at others; but I think that after all this persecution it is rather hard that the House should come to a Resolution that every Gentleman who has been convicted of bribery before a Commission or a Committee of this House shall be removed from the commission of the peace. I thank the House for the kindness with which it has received this explanation. I thought it my duty to make this candid and free statement, and to leave it with the House, and I trust that hon. Gentlemen opposite will look with a little more charity on the acts of those who sit on this side of the House.

CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL.

(Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Baines, Mr. Trevelyan.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HARDCASTLE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he would not trespass long on the attention of the House—the subject had been so fully and so frequently discussed in that House, and the arguments on both sides had been so frequently repeated, that he would only make a few observations on the present position of the question. He had been accused, on the one hand, of omitting to press his measure through all its stages last Session, and on the other hand of showing an excess of zeal in bringing forward the same measure again this Session. After the intimation given last year by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) as to his intention to introduce other Amendments, or a substantive measure of his own, the next stage of the Bill was postponed to enable him to do so; and therefore, after last year's debate on the subject, it was of great importance that he (Mr. Hardcastle) should introduce his Bill again at as early a period as possible this Session. Since the debates of last year the occupants of the opposite Benches had changed places. Last Session some of the right hon. Gentlemen who then sat on the Opposition side of the House—he might mention two of them; the present Secretary of State for War and the Chancellor of the Exchequer—expressed their views that this question was one of such a character as ought to be taken in hand by the Government, and that it was beyond the strength of any private Member to carry. These Gentlemen were now sitting on the Ministerial Benches, and he thought it but right that they should in office have the opportunity of expressing their opinions upon the subject, and of introducing a measure if they liked; a course from which they would not be deterred (if they might be judged from their conduct on other questions) by the fact that some Members of the Cabinet entertained diametrically opposite views to the rest. In most great controversies—and this, which had lasted for more than a generation, and which had occupied so much attention, might fairly be considered a great controversy—in most great controversies there was a certain tendency on the part of the disputants to shift the ground which they at first occupied. In the old days of church rate martyrs—Thorogood and others—what was most heard on one side was the argument based on conscience, and on the other the assertion that common honesty required the payment of church rates so long as they remained the law of the land. By degrees the question assumed greater prominence, while the well-known Brain-tree case was dragging its slow length through the courts. About the time of the close of that case, when the House of Lords had finally declared how the law stood, a Committee sat in another place and took evidence which again tended to alter very much the line of argument pursued by those who defended the church rate. The opponents of the rate were told that they had ulterior objects in view—that they did not care so much to abolish the church rate as to destroy a much more important institution, the Church of England. That was the stock argument up to the debate of last year, when some remarkable speeches were made, and one in particular, by an hon. Gentleman who, he regretted to say, was no longer a Member of that House (Mr. Morley), but who he hoped before long to see again amongst them. They seemed then to have reached the last stage of the argument; and the chief remaining difficulty appeared to be how to provide for the maintenance of the fabric and services of the Church. Since that time it appeared to him that there was a feeling on the other (the Ministerial) side of the House to consult amongst themselves and with those on this side as to the best means of providing for those objects. The question was therefore no longer a mere attack on the church rate on the one side, or of defence on the other. They had had many schemes of compromise suggested, but he believed they had all now been abandoned. They had long passed the time when such proposals would be made as that the expenses of the Church should be paid out of the Land Tax or the Consolidated Fund, or out of the improved value of ecclesiastical property. We had had at all times proposals for exemptions — proposals to exempt Dissenters as such, and persons who had conscientious scruples as such, as well as those who gave notice of their desire or intention not to pay the rate. There had also been a suggestion that no compulsory church rate should be applied to any purpose except that of the repair of the fabric, and the question seemed to have been narrowed almost to that. At present somewhere between £50,000 and £60,000 was expended yearly for the repair of the fabrics of our churches—he believed the exact amount was £59,000—and the proportion of that which was raised by church rates was probably between £35,000 and £40,000. He would simply ask, could not the raising of that small sum, which stopped the way, be left to be raised by that voluntary munificence which had never failed when appealed to? There was one consideration which he thought would weigh strongly with hon. Gentlemen opposite, and that was the argument that if they abolished church rates altogether, a very heavy charge would be thrown upon the working clergy in some small parishes in the kingdom. They were by no means an overpaid body, and their expenses had been greatly increased during the last twenty years by the increased price of consumable articles. He wished to state that objection strongly, because it had some weight, and he did not know that anything was lost by stating objections strongly. But there was something to be said on the other side. The heavy charge falling upon the clergy would be only a temporary one, and would apply only to the present holders, and any man who, after the abolition of church rates, should accept a living would be fully aware at the time of the effect of what he did. Again, the hardship would only exist in a very limited number of parishes, the populations of which were very poor, and where there were few or no resident gentry. He believed that if a clergyman lived in the affections of his people, as he ought to do, he would find no difficulty in raising the comparatively small sum necessary for the repair of his church. The Nonconformist body not only defrayed the expenses of their places of worship, but also maintained their ministers. This was even done by the Primitive Methodists, who consisted almost entirely of the poorest classes; and he did not believe that the Church of England would find any difficulty in doing what had been constantly done, for a series of years, by her poorer neighbours. If this Bill passed the second reading Amendments would have to be considered when it came, as he trusted it would do, before Committee. His (Mr. Hardcastle's) position now was different from his position last year. There was a reason last year for delay; now there was every reason to press the matter forward as quickly as possible. He should therefore, if the Bill was read a second time to-day, endeavour that its future stages should not long be delayed. He would strongly urge upon the House to pass—in this which might probably be the last Session of the last middle-class Parliaments—an Act which would do away with great irritation, and he trusted that they would do so by so large a majority as would not only justify, but almost enforce upon those in "another place" the propriety of agreeing to this measure. The hon. Member concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time.

MR. BAINES, in seconding the Motion, said, he did not intend to enter into the great question of church rates, which had been debated over and over again; but he confessed to a great feeling of disappointment at finding that the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Beresford Hope) had upon the paper an Amendment that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months. He had thought that the hon. Gentleman was a party last year to an arrangement which would have superseded the necessity for any further controversy. The Dissenters were desirous that this question should be settled; but, as a mere party man, he himself should be desirous to keep it alive, for it was really a very convenient question, and it was not without a pang that he should part with it. Nevertheless, he felt at the time that he would be quite willing to accept the compromise which he understood to be assented to by the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent last year. It was a question of the clearest justice. The compromise proposed last year by the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) contained three principles—first, the abolition of compulsory church rates; secondly, power given to members of the Church voluntarily to assess themselves, and to collect the rate through the agency of the churchwardens; and thirdly, that Nonconformists and others who objected to church rates, and refused to contribute towards them, should have no share in the administration of the funds thus raised for the support of the fabric or the celebration of Divine worship in the Church. The Dissenters, who at present had a right, being parishioners, to attend the vestry and vote, were quite willing to make that concession and give up that right. They had no moral right to interfere with the affairs of the Church, and it would be an impertinence upon their part if they, after the unconditional abolition of church rates, attempted to do so. So long as other people respected his rights, he wished to respect theirs. He should be glad to hear how the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent could explain what certainly seemed to be an inconsistency in his conduct—namely, how it was that he could no longer support the compromise into which he was willing to enter last Session. He thought that if the hon. Member objected to the Bill brought in by his hon. Friend (Mr. Hardcastle) the least he could do would be to bring in one himself. The Dissenters were at least half the population of the kingdom; they supported with liberality their own system of religious worship, and they did not feel that the Church was justified in calling upon them to contribute towards its support. The general question of church rates, however, had been so often debated that he would not make another observation upon it; but, seeing the Bill of last year, although read a second time, was not carried, and that to that Bill, which was one for the abolition of compulsory church rates, the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent had given his assent as a fair compromise, he hoped that he would not now stand in the way of the settlement of the question proposed by this Bill;—because he assured him that if compulsory church rates should be abolished Dissenters would not interpose any obstacle to the adoption of arrangements between the Church and its supporters which did not compromise the rights of Nonconformists. The hon. Member concluded by seconding the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Hardcastle.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE acknowledged with gratitude the candour and evident sincerity of the appeal made to him by the hon. Member for Leeds, and his answer to that appeal should be a very simple one. As far as he understood his own position, he stood precisely where he did when he made some remarks last year following the speech of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire on the then second reading of the present measure, and any approval which he gave to that speech he was prepared to give now. The scheme to which he expressed his readiness to assent last year was now embodied in the Bill for the Regulation of Church Rates, brought in by his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham and himself, and which stood for its second reading that day. He was bound to say that the Bill of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, in the formal shape in which it appeared, fell short of what he (Mr. Beresford Hope) had hoped it would have turned out from the speech of its author. Some considerable time elapsed between the delivery of that speech last Session and the introduction of the Bill which was the fruit of it, and in the interim the right hon. Gentleman showed his measure to several Members on that side of the House, including the one now addressing it, who were Churchmen like himself, and they candidly told him where they thought the Bill defective, and indicated the points in which they believed it failed to effect a full and satisfactory settlement of the question. Accordingly, when the measure was introduced last year, those Churchmen in that House who were honestly desirous of a settlement or a compromise which would let off on the easiest terms possible those who had conscientious objections to church rates, and yet preserve church rates, placed their views on the table of the House in the form of a Bill which was brought in by the present Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and on which his name also appeared. Being still in favour of a compromise, but not satisfied with the right hon. Member for South Lancashire's mode of effecting it, he gave his adhesion to the Bill of Sir William Bovill. The present Bill of the hon. Member for Buckingham proceeded on the same principle as Sir William Bovill's, though it was longer and contained more businesslike details than that rather hastily prepared measure. He trusted that explanation exonerated him from any charge of inconsistency. He had for many years past differed from those of his friends who were in favour of a no-surrender policy on that matter, and had frequently been the subject of severe remark from strong advocates of that view; and however necessary he felt it was to maintain church rates as an existing impost, he thought there was an equal necessity for fairly meeting the views of those who had conscientious scruples against paying them. The Bill brought in by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire last year proposed to sweep away church rates, but went on to leave those persons who liked to meet together and voluntarily assess themselves; and for the concession made to the Dissenters the Dissenters were to make the countervailing concession that the money thus raised should be disposed of only by those who paid it. Now, he thanked the hon. Member for Leeds for the candid way in which he had spoken on the latter point; and he trusted that in dealing with that question, whether they were Nonconformists or Churchmen, they would, as religious men and not as partisans, try to find points of agreement rather than of difference between them. But the Bill of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was seriously defective, because, while it enabled Churchmen to meet together and assess themselves—a provision of which it might be said was only the enabling people to do what they had the full power of doing without Act of Parliament—yet if a man once agreed to pay, and afterwards harked back from it, it contained no provision to compel him to pay that which he promised. Yet the assessment all round would have been based on the supposition that he intended to advance his promised quota, without which the church would either go unrepaired or an additional burden would be thrown on the honest portion of the vestry. That was preposterous, for the payment in that case was not a question of conscience, but one of common honour and honesty. He did not wish to compel a man to pay against his conscientious opinion, but he said that if a man made a bargain he ought to be kept to it. He appealed to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether they did not prejudice the cause of civil and religious liberty if, while attempting to relieve those who conscientiously objected to church rates, they prevented honest Churchmen from having a remedy in their own hands against their dishonest brethren. That was one not to promote religious liberty, but to facilitate fraud. Therefore he could not support a measure which would let off shuffling and dishonest Churchmen. He could not help feeling that proposals like the present for the abolition of church rates pure and simple only drove the amicable settlement of that controversy further off, and tended to discourage those who sincerely desired that it might not be fought out to the bitter end. It should not be forgotten that if there were susceptibility, honour, and conscience among Dissenters, so also these feelings existed among Churchmen; and if the latter saw the abolition of an ancient impost mainly resting on and very convenient to them, though it might be inconvenient to Nonconformists, pertinaciously pressed year after year as a necessity antecedent to a compromise, they would look on those who acted in that manner not so much as well-wishers to Nonconformity as evil-wishers to the Church. Any such feeling would tend to make the amicable adjustment of that question impossible. No doubt, in a town like Leeds, through the zeal of that distinguished man the present Dean of Chichester, and his no less worthy successor, Dr. Atlay, the good work of the Church of England might be sustained without the aid of church rates. But every clergyman was not a Dr. Hook or a Dr. Atlay; and in many less populous parts of the country, where all the wealth, the industry, and the intelligence which existed in places like Leeds were absent, that impost was greatly wanted. It was a remarkable circumstance that, while many advanced politicians were becoming the advocates of compulsory education rate (among whom he might by the way state he did not range himself, in regarding as he did the strength of denominational zeal for religion which made general secular education impossible as one of the safeguards of the land) yet they would not admit the necessity of a compulsory church rate upon Churchmen. He did not profess, as some conceived themselves able to do, to trace back the origin of church rates to Saxon days. It was enough for him that the arrangement had existed for centuries, and was part of the Reformation settlement. As an historical fact, the Church was the tenant in possession, and had been in possession for centuries before Nonconformity even existed. At first Nonconformity was prohibited. In later and wiser days, beginning from the Act of Toleration, its privileges were further and further confirmed till at length it was raised to a position of such perfect equality and consideration on the part of the government and law of this country, and in having risen to so much opulence, that it was hardly an exaggeration to say that Nonconformity had become the second Established Church of England. But that was surely no reason why they ought to abolish church rates as far as they concerned Churchmen. The position of the Church of England might, indeed, be considered unique; for where could they see in any other part of the world the spectacle of an Established Church existing with great privileges and position, and alongside of it perfect civil and religious liberty? Anywhere else the establishment relied on the secular arm, or else there was no establishment at all. But he looked on this anomaly as a distinguishing advantage, although possibly indefensible by the strict rules of political logic. It was, however, a marked peculiarity of British institutions that the people generally gave the preference to practical common sense rather than to rigorous logic. The scheme which he had always upheld would relieve from the payment of church rates those who objected to the tax, but promote its continuance in those cases where no feeling of opposition existed; and in such cases there was no reason why, while it afforded protection to Dissenters, the Church should find itself deprived of the protection of the law for the recovery of the rates from those who had agreed to pay them. A good deal had been said with respect to what had been called the "ticketing" of members of non-conforming denominations. In his opinion, the objection offered on that ground to the adoption of a fair and moderate compromise on the church rate question partook much more of the character of a sneer than of an argument. There was no man in this country who was not ticketed in some way or other—every Member of Parliament, every deputy lieutenant, every graduate, was ticketed; every man who made himself prominent in any church, or Dissenting society thereby ticketed himself. No one could apply for the suffrage, or any other right in this country, without "ticketing" himself in some way or other, and it was time that they should cease to employ such a pitiful epithet for the purpose of serious discussion—until they did so the question would never be rightly settled. Then his hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmund's fell back upon what he must take leave to term the argumentum ad invidiam—why should Churchmen refuse to keep up their churches when the Nonconformists could always do so? But they might just as well say why should one man be richer than another when a man who was poorer could pay his way. As to another argument of his hon. Friend—that the alleged hardship on the clergyman of having to find out of his income money to keep up the church which might now be supplied by the rate was only one upon life-tenants, as the next incumbents would take their livings with their eyes open to the loss—all he had to say was that this was the advocacy of mere and absolute confiscation. The question to which he returned was, what grievance there could be if Nonconformists were not asked to contribute to the rate, in making it compulsory upon those who had agreed to pay it. If there were any grievance to Dissenters in that let them point it out; but he must say he thought that they would have a difficulty in doing so. If, however, all fair and reasonable terms of compromise were unhappily rejected by the advocates of the unconditional repeal of church rates, the Church would go forth to the conflict, cruelly indeed despoiled, but conscious of her own integrity, conscious that she had done all that Christian charity required her to do for the sake of peace and conciliation, and confident in the strength of her Divine Founder, to fulfil her sacred mission. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the Bill be read the second time that day six months.

MR. GORST, in seconding the Amendment, said, he was disposed to view the question more particularly in its connection with the rural districts. There were a large number of poor rural parishes where, for a very long time past, church rates had been collected without any opposition or agitation, and in which it was productive of a great amount of direct and indirect benefit. He would take the case of a village with which he was acquainted as an illustration of what would occur in a vast number of those places if church rates were abolished. In that village there was collected annually, in the shape of church rate, about £50, and out of that sum was defrayed the whole expense of the church services. But there was also an offertory collection made on each Sunday, which realized another sum of about £50, and the whole amount was distributed among the rural poor, among the sick, the aged, young orphans, and other destitute persons. That distribution was effected by means of the parochial clergy. From their personal knowledge of the people those gentlemen were peculiarly well qualified for the performance of such a duty, and the sum was, upon the whole, most judiciously expended; it was a source of great advantage to the poor; it relieved a large amount of misery which the Poor Law did not touch—it softened and alleviated many sorrows and afflictions in life which, perhaps, no other means could reach—and it saved many persons from the necessity of entering the work-house during periods of temporary distress. But if the church rate in that parish were abruptly and suddenly abolished, it was clear that the first charge on the offertory collection must be the maintenance of the church services. In that case, if, by means of voluntary contributions and increased exertions on the part of the clergyman, the amount of the offertory collection was largely augmented, it was possible that these destitute people might not suffer. But if, as was far more likely, the amount raised at the offertory was not sufficiently increased, it was obvious that the poor would be the first to suffer from the abolition of church rates. It might be said that it was for churchmen to meet the requirements of the case by additional liberality; but he asked those who had experience on these subjects whether it was not a difficult thing to induce the public to add to the amount of their regular and constant contributions. He should further say that he regarded it as one of the misfortunes of the Church of England that its members were not properly educated in the habit of giving. He believed that in that respect the Dissenters were much in advance of Churchmen, and that fact was peculiarly visible in the operations of the members of the two denominations in the colonies. Now, if the voluntary contributions were not largely increased in such parishes as those to which he had referred, the people which would lose most by the abolition of church rates would be the rural poor, and there was no class whose interests they were bound to consider more attentively than those of the rural poor. That class was not represented in that House, and had no political influence; but for that reason he believed its case always received generous consideration from them. Under that Bill the relief of the rural poor would be the second, instead of the first, charge upon the voluntary collection in such villages as that to which he had referred; and he appealed to the House whether the condition of that class was such that any injury, however slight, ought to be inflicted on their interests. If for that reason alone, he must oppose any Bill for the abolition of church rates which would inflict such injury; and therefore he cordially seconded the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the subject of church rates had been so repeatedly discussed in that House, and the opinion of the House had been so frequently expressed on the principle of their abolition, that it was difficult to find anything new to say on the question; and he should certainly occupy the attention of the House for a very few moments. But before he proceeded any further to deal with the general question, he must make a remark upon the state of the Treasury Bench. That discussion, which was one of great importance, had now been going on for a considerable time in the absence of any single occupant of that Bench, except an hon. and gallant General (General Forester), who held an office in the Royal Household. [At this moment Mr. WALPOLE and Mr. ADDERLEY entered and took their seats.] He was only sorry that the two right hon. Gentlemen who had just entered had not been present to hear the speeches which had already been delivered, and in the course of which some statements were made that might have influenced the decision of the Government. He hoped that this was not one of those subjects on which the House would be left to express an opinion without hearing any opinion from Her Majesty's Government. He should regret to be driven to the conclusion at which he understood the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Beresford Hope), who had moved the Amendment, had arrived—namely, that they were now in a less favourable position than at the close of last Session in regard to the satisfactory settlement of this question. Towards the close of last Session he thought a general hope was entertained that an arrangement might be come to which would be acceptable to all parties concerned. The Bill of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire was not now before the House; but it was read the second time before the close of last Session, and there was a very general expression of opinion that it contained the germ at least of a settlement which might remove that subject from the field of repeated annual discussion. They had not therefore before them the Bill to which the hon. Member for Stoke addressed a considerable part of his speech; but if he correctly understood the speech of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines), his hon. Friend was now prepared, although seconding the Motion for the second reading of the present Bill, to agree to the proposal made last year, which would, in fact, have abolished compulsory church rates, subject to certain provisions for preventing persons who had not paid those rates from taking part in the administration of the funds raised by that impost. The principle of that Bill was one to which he cordially assented; although he thought the details of the Bill, if it were again presented to the House, would require some modification. He was prepared to admit, with the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst), that it might be inexpedient and harsh in many instances to abolish a rate levied with the general assent of the inhabitants of a parish, and applied to the useful purposes which had been mentioned, and he regretted that the present Bill was not limited to the abolition of a compulsory rate. Notice, however, had been given of Amendments in that sense, and the provisions which might be necessary to give effect to the views of the hon. Gentleman in that respect might very well be discussed in Committee. He should cordially support the second reading of the Bill, reserving to himself the right to vote for any Amendment afterwards which might be proposed with the object of bringing about a compromise which might make the measure more generally acceptable. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst), he might add, had expressed his regret that members of the Church of England were not so well educated as Dissenters in the principle of voluntary contributions; but surely, if that opinion were correct, it furnished an argument in favour of the second reading of the Bill, inasmuch as the inference was that the abolition of compulsory rates would supply that defect, and, by stimulating voluntary exertions, recommend itself to the hon. Gentleman's approval.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he should not enter at length into the history of the question, or the arguments as applicable to the continuance of church rates, but rather confine himself to the actual condition in which the question now stood. He thought they had much to congratulate themselves on the tone with which the question of church rates was now dealt with in that House. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) had expressed his readiness to meet the susceptibility, if such it could be said to be, of certain Churchmen with regard to certain concessions which were discussed last year. The friends of the Church had prepared a Bill which they thought would meet the case in the best manner; but the House was asked to anticipate it by affirming the principle of this Bill. He was not then going to assume that his hon. Friends were right; but he had a right to ask that the House might be allowed to consider their propositions before the House was called upon to take a decided step in a contrary direction by the second reading of this Bill, which was in favour of the absolute and unconditional abolition of church rates. If they affirmed the principle of this Bill, it would appear as if they were acting somewhat inconsistently to immediately afterwards consider the provisions of a Bill of an entirely different character. The present state of the law, he might add, already established a sort of compromise, which it might or might not be desirable for the Legislature to put on a clearer and better footing; but it was no answer to anticipate a legal arrangement of this compromise by the direct affirmation that they would first put an end to the whole thing, and then afterwards be willing to listen to a compromise. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Mr. Harcastle) declined to postpone, under the circumstances, the consideration of the Bill for a month, but he had elected to take issue upon whether the rate should or should not be absolutely abolished; and therefore he (Sir William Heathcote) should vote for the Amendment.

MR. READ said, that if this rate could be divested of its national and religious importance, he, as a tenant farmer, should say that it was more of a landlord's than a tenant's question. The tenants took their land subject to the payment of church rates, and although they were glad to get rid of rates and taxes whenever they could, they had no right to shirk this responsibility which they had engaged to pay. He had purchased land subject to the payment of church rates, and he did not think that he was justified in getting rid of that burden unless some substitute was provided. As an independent Member, he heartily wished to see this question settled; and he submitted to the House whether it would not be possible to read a second time the three Bills that had been introduced with reference to church rates, and then refer them to a Select Committee, by which means they might arrive at some legitimate and equitable compromise.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that the national and religious importance of the question no doubt greatly added to their embarrassment in dealing with it; and another great difficulty was that a number of persons would be sorry to see it settled because it would be so much loss to them of political capital. As a member of the Church of England, he could not assent to the total and unconditional abolition of church rates. He could not disguise from himself the fact—and in expressing it he knew he was treading on very tender ground, and was pulling a hornets' nest about his ears—that the declamations of the Free Church party had imported a great difficulty into the settlement of this question. Churches must be repaired, and were it not for church rates the churches in London would collapse. He thought also that the question of pew-rents, introduced by the Free Church party, had greatly embarrassed the subject. He admitted that the direct payment to the church for seats ought to be coupled with the strongest conditions as to the number and character of free sittings to be reserved, so as to avoid invidious distinctions. It was impossible to prescribe the conditions on which the public should subscribe their money. What he most feared for was the actual repairs of the church. The voluntary principle was more or less a sensational one, and the clergymen found it was more easy to rebuild or restore a church than it was to get persons to contribute a small annual sum for its repair, because there was nothing picturesque about the ordinary repairs of a church. He thought that under proper regulations the payment of pew-rents, or an assessment for that purpose, with the preference of occupation in the church, would in a measure meet the difficulty. He was ready to come to some reasonable settlement of the question, but he could not agree to the entire and total abolition of the rate.

MR. REMINGTON MILLS asked why—as the hon. Member for East Norfolk had said the maintenance of the Church was a charge upon land—the landlords did not take the burden of repairing the church on themselves, and let their lands free of church rates? That would satisfactorily settle the question. He had been unable to find that any real or practical grievance would arise from the abolition of the rate. The late Mr. Divett, the Member for Exeter, brought in a Bill thirty-three years ago for the abolition of church rate, and ever since that time there had been a constant agitation against it, and every new church that was built produced fresh opposition to the rate. It was remarkable that during all that time there was not an instance where a church had fallen into decay and had not been repaired. Where churches had been rebuilt or restored by voluntary contributions it had been done in a more elegant and elaborate manner than was the case previously, and the churches generally were in good repair. It was useless to say that the Church would suffer from the abolition of the rate. The landlords should voluntarily pay the rate, and let their lands accordingly. It was a libel on the members of the Church to say that nothing but a compulsory rate would compel them to keep the fabric in repair. Dissenters ought not to be called on to pay the rate, and the Bill of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was as unsatisfactory as other Bills for settling the question had been. The hundreds of thousands subscribed by Churchmen for the rebuilding and restoration of churches in the last thirty years showed that there was no difficulty in the way of their maintenance. He hoped the House would do an act of justice to those who were not Churchmen by passing the second reading of the Bill.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that allusion had been made in the earlier part of the discussion by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) to the absence from the House on the present occasion of all Members of the Government. None were more averse to the total and immediate abolition of church rates than Her Majesty's Government; but it might happen that on Wednesday afternoons the Government had to attend important duties in "another place." The late Government were invariably absent from the House on Wednesdays during part of the day; and if a Cabinet Council were held at two or three o'clock, before Ministers could arrive in the House, the important part of a debate had generally arrived. They had therefore thought it better to hold the Cabinet early, and to come to the House immediately afterwards. He felt a difficulty in discussing this Bill. He could quite understand that, on the question of the total and immediate abolition of church rates, the House should come to a distinct and positive issue; and if that were the only legitimate issue, the Government had a decided objection to a total and immediate abolition. But the mixing up of questions of compromise with that of total abolition confused the subject. If the hon. Member for Bury (Mr. Hardcastle) did not press the second reading of his Bill, this and the other Bills might be referred to a Select Committee, and a settlement thus be attempted; but after a vote in favour of total abolition, it would be absurd to consider the question of compromise. He could not understand how the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth could year after year give his countenance to a mode of proceeding which rendered compromise impossible, and which tended more to confuse and obstruct the settlement of the question than almost any other he could conceive. An hon. Member (Mr. Remington Mills) had said that for thirty-four years the question of the abolition of church rates had been agitated more or less in the country and debated in the House of Commons. There had certainly been no abolition of church rates during that period; and he denied that in that interval the feeling in the country had gained ground in favour of abolition. Every year Returns were published of the parishes in which church rates were levied; and year after year it appeared that church rates were levied and collected in an increasing number of parishes, and the sum total raised by the rates was on the increase. What, then, was the meaning of the statement that church rates were becoming more and more unpopular? He maintained that there was less and less difficulty experienced in the collection of church rates; and that year after year they became a more valuable and more reliable source of Church revenue. District churches had been referred to. Years ago district churches might have felt church rates to be a grievance; but since the Duke of Marlborough's Act and the decisions upon it, in a course of years that difficulty had vanished. When a compromise was talked of, it should be remembered that a compromise was like a quarrel—it required two parties to it. Now, on that (the Ministerial) side of the House Bills and Resolutions had been introduced with a view of settling the question on an equitable basis; but these proposals had been invariably resisted by hon. Gentlemen opposite representing what he might call the Dissenting interest. If the hon. Member for Bury (Mr. Hardcastle), as the accredited organ of that interest, retreated from his position, and the Dissenters would consent to some compromise, then there might be some hope for the various proposals under the consideration of the House. But the hon. Member (Mr. Remington Mills) had told the House that the measure of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire last year, rejected as it was with singular unanimity by Churchmen, was regarded with no favour at all by the Dissenters. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth admitted that that measure of last year would require great alteration. [Sir GEORGE GREY: Modification.] At all events, he (Lord John Manners) objected to the Government being called upon to express an opinion upon a question which put all compromise out of court altogether. So long as this Bill for the total and immediate abolition of church rates remained in the way, the Government had but one course to pursue, and that was to vote for the rejection of a measure from the principle of which they heartily and entirely dissented.

MR. HIBBERT supported the Bill, because he, as a Churchman, thought there was sufficient energy among the members of the Church to keep up its fabric without the aid of church rates. Church rates in large towns might be said to have vanished; only in the small parishes were they retained; and he believed that in the smaller parishes where church rates had been abolished the churches were not out of repair, and that a large amount of voluntary contribution was obtained for their maintenance. He could not admit the statement that Churchmen were not so well educated in the voluntary principle as Dissenters; for a very large amount of money had been subscribed by Churchmen for the erection of new churches, and he believed that a fund for their repair was also provided by voluntary contributions. Only recently the Bishop of Manchester, in laying the foundation-stone of a new church in Lancashire, referred to the work which had been effected by voluntary contributions, stating that in the course of the nineteen years of his episcopal ministration he had consecrated 100 churches, and that probably he would be called on in the present year to consecrate seventeen more. The whole of these churches had been, he believed, provided for by voluntary contributions, and more than £1,000,000 had been raised for the purpose. He had therefore confidence in the earnestness and zeal of Churchmen, who, he was sure, would support their parish church, though the compulsory power of raising a rate were abolished.

MR. HUBBARD said, he was prepared to disclaim and condemn any legislation on this subject which was at variance with the principles of civil and religious liberty. What was the position of the church rate case? The country was now divided into two portions, in this way:—There was the minority of parishes, with a majority of population, collected in the great seats of commerce and industry, and containing a great many Dissenters from the Church, which had negatived the principle of church rates; and there was the majority of parishes with a minority of population, who exercised their privilege of rating for church rates. The principle of rating was an old constitutional principle in this country, and the levying a rate was the act of the majority, in which the minority were bound to acquiesce. He looked on rating as a great evidence of civilization, as a principle by which society raised itself out of the anarchy of savage life, and put upon every man a burden according to his power. Why, the principle of rating had been carried so far that there was actually a library rate, to defray the cost of books for the use of the working classes. It was the majority which ruled the minority with regard to the library rate, and why should that principle be tabooed when applied to church rates? The voluntary principle had been extolled as all-sufficient. But in what cases had it been successful? People were willing to make great sacrifices for the building of churches, because they had a great sympathy with the object, and felt that the successful erection of the structure would be identified with their own efforts. They saw the results. But they would not be so ready to make yearly payments for a purpose which produced no immediately visible results, and excited no especial interest or sympathy on their part. It would be absurd to propose to provide for the Consolidated Fund of the country on the voluntary principle; but if that was absurd he should like to be told where it was that the absurdity stopped in respect of raising funds by voluntary means. The hon. Proposer of the present Bill had said that he brought forward the measure with the view of allaying irritation. Whose irritation did the hon. Member allude to? Was it the irritation of the 8,500 parishes which paid church rates, or of the 1,500 parishes which were emancipated from the payment of the rate? This was a question in respect to which he thought that those who were interested might be left to act for themselves. As had been truly said by the hon. Member for East Norfolk (Mr. Read), this was really a question of burden on property, and the occupier, when he had to pay church rates, paid proportionally less rent than another occupier, who paid no church rates. Property had always borne the burden of church rates, and the question was whether the mode of disposing the burden should be interfered with. He contended that it should not be interfered with. Where a majority in a parish decided against a rate no rate was levied; but where a majority were in favour of a rate as the most equitable and convenient mode of raising the necessary funds from those only who were willing to contribute, was it an unfair or unreasonable request that their right to tax themselves should not be interfered with? The Bill which his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Beresford Hope) and himself had laid on the table—a Bill which, while it respected the rights and liberty of Englishmen, effected the object of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds—the abolition of the compulsory payment of church rates. The measure of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was for the abolition of what he called compulsory church rates. Now, as all church rates, leviable under the law, were compulsory, that measure necessarily implied the abolition of all church rates entirely; whereas the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent and himself intended by their Bill to retain the power of rating for those who were willing to pay church rates, but provided in the simplest way a power of exemption for those who were disinclined to pay them. He should like to ask what it was precisely that was wanted by those who opposed the present mode of levying church rates. Was it simply that they wanted to give relief from a compulsory payment of church rates, or did those who supported the Motion of the hon. Member for Bury (Mr. Hardcastle) do so for the further reason that they desired to strike a blow at the connection between Church and State? Was it their desire to remove the Church from the status she had occupied from time immemorial. If the Bill for the abolition of church rates were carried, a very severe blow would be struck, so far as it went, at the principle of Church and State. The hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) had spoken of the large proportion of the inhabitants of England and Wales who were Dissenters; but any assertion that the Dissenters formed a majority of the population was in entire defiance of all statistics. He was aware that there was a volume called a "Religious Census," which might seem to lend some countenance to this opinion; but its allegations were unauthorized and unofficial, and its statistics were utterly worthless. He had some years since moved for a Copy of the Instructions under the authority of which the so-called "Religious Census of 1851" was compiled, and after waiting some time he was informed by the then Secretary for the Home Department (Sir George Lewis) that no Return of such instructions could be made, for that no such instructions were ever given. On the other hand, there were Returns in existence connected with marriages, burials and workhouses, and there was a religious census of both the army and the navy; and if such documents were taken as authority, a very different conclusion would be deduced from that of the hon. Member for Leeds, and the Church would be seen to have a considerable preponderance of the population. He (Mr. Hubbard) believed that the Churchmen in England and Wales numbered between 75 and 80 per cent of the population. But this was not a question of the proportion of Churchmen and Dissenters; it was a question of simple liberty for those who wished to carry on the system of church rates in their own interest, without affecting those who differed from them, and they claimed that as one of the inherent rights of Englishmen. The noble Lord who spoke on behalf of the Government (Lord John Manners) gave the House to understand that while, on the one hand, Her Majesty's Government were prepared to resist the total and unconditional repeal of church rates, they were willing to consider the measure proposed by the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Beresford Hope) and himself, with a view of coming to a compromise. Thus the House had an advantage which they had never possessed before, for a Government had never said before that they would look at a measure proposed for the adjustment of this question with a favourable eye. This discussion did not merely involve the maintenance of the principle of self-government by the majority, which had always been respected by that House; but it involved the maintenance of the Church of England as a national Church, without the infliction of any oppression upon those who differed from her. He trusted the House would not let this opportunity of settling the question escape, but would pass over the proposition now before them with the view of coming to the consideration of a measure dictated by the most honest desire of meeting every reasonable scruple of those not connected with the Church of England. He should, therefore, offer his opposition to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. NEATE said, he did not agree with the hon. Member for Bury (Mr. Hardcastle) that the present time offered a peculiar opportunity for settling this question, and thought that this was a question on which, of all others, they should have waited for that increased constituency which was impending over them. If there was any institution more than another which must throw itself on the support of the whole people it was the National Church. Unless the Church of England could regain some of the ground she had lost during the last 100 or 200 years she could not lay claim, with any justice, to the position of the dominant ecclesiastical establishment. The House was placed in a position of embarrassment by the way in which the question had come before them. There was the principle put forward by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) that the majority should have the right to tax the minority in these matters; but the principle that the majority had a right to bind the minority, though applicable to cases where the majority and minority assembled for a common purpose, did not apply to such a matter as that under the consideration of the House; and, as the State had recognised the full right of any one to dissent, he maintained that if there were only one Dissenter in a parish, that Dissenter had an absolute right to be exempted from contribution to a Church to which he did not belong. Then there was the principle embodied in the Bill of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard), which asserted the right of the Church of England to tax its own members. He (Mr. Neate) should be prepared to assent to the second reading of that Bill, because beyond that there was no step till total abolition was reached. He would ask the Government why they had not come forward with a proposition for the settlement of the measure?

SIR EDMUND LECHMERE said, that he had never denied that the present system of church rates had great defects; but he denied that those defects were of such a nature as to render indispensable the abolition of church rates. The great defect was that the fund raised by church rates was employed for two purposes—one being the maintenance of the fabric of the Church, and the other the maintenance of the ceremonial of the Church; and the Dissenters felt it a grievance to be compelled to pay for the maintenance of a worship in which they did not share. He believed, however, that the Dissenters would willingly pay for the maintenance of the ancient fabrics of the Church, for which they manifested an interest, and had in some instances contributed largely; but it could not be expected they would contribute with any degree of willingness to the maintenance of a worship of which they did not approve. The present system, by which the rates were levied on the occupier, instead of the owner of the property, was another matter which required correction. He thought the grievance upon the Dissenter and the Roman Catholic might be very much removed if the rate, instead of being levied on the occupier, were placed to the charge of the owner of property. He did not think it would be prudent to accept any Bill which did not contain some clause, distinguishing between the maintenance of the fabric of the Church and the maintenance of the ceremonial, and he did not see any such clause in the different Bills presented to the House. To the Bill of the hon. Member for Bury he should certainly give his unqualified opposition; and he trusted that before the end of this Session some measure which would satisfy the fair and equitable claims of the Church and of Dissenters would be presented to the House.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, that hon. Members should make up their minds whether they would maintain the church by a compulsory rate or on the voluntary principle; any attempt at a compromise between the two principles must necessarily and inevitably fail. It was difficult to understand how the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire last year could be called a compromise. It was as much a measure of abolition as the present Bill—the only conceivable reason for calling it a compromise seemed to be that it contained many elaborate provisions to the effect that people might pay a subscription to the Church if they liked. The Bill of the hon. Members for Stoke and Buckingham did not propose abolition, but only the exemption of such persons as chose to give notice of their desire to be exempted from the payment of church rates on the 1st day of January in each year. Whatever compromise of that kind might be carried would never work for the benefit of the Church. No reason need be assigned by the parties claiming exemption; and Churchmen as well as Dissenters would give notice of objection. In what position would the Church then stand? It now rested on the intelligible ground that it was the Established Church—the law recognised only one church, and imposed on all owners and occupiers a rate in proportion to their holdings. This was a position of great advantage; but this Bill once passed, that position would be entirely altered. The Church would be standing not on an ancient law imposing a rate on all owners and occupiers for the support of the establishment, in which position it is in antagonism only with Dissenters, but its attitude hereafter would be that of opposition, not only as against Dissenters, but as against Churchmen also, by giving them the means and opportunity of claiming exemption from the payment of rates for its support. How would they be able to maintain a compulsory rate in such circumstances? What was intended to break the fall of the Church from a compulsory to a voluntary system would then turn out to be the most disastrous sort of compromise, at once yielding to its foes and alienating many of its friends. Such a compromise would be far worse than simple abolition by the Bill of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds. In parishes where church rates had already been abolished enthusiasm for the Church had revived—church extension had made great progress; many beautiful specimens of church architecture had been built, and there was no difficulty in maintaining them in a most excellent condition. In many of the country parishes where the rate has been continuously imposed, on the other hand, the fabrics were not generally maintained in a very creditable manner. The reason was that two or three farmers set the rate, and having to pay the greater part of it, they set it as low as possible. His belief was that if the Church would have the courage to throw itself on the enthusiastic sympathy of its friends, there would be found a plethora of wealth for maintaining and extending the Church system throughout the country. The existing law was such that its effect was to stop the liberality of Churchmen. For his own part he should prefer, what he had always advocated, a real compromise of this nature—that the maintenance of the fabric should be separated from the expenses of worship, and that the public national buildings should be supported by a rate, and the expenses of worship be defrayed by the worshippers. But he feared such a proposition was now too late.

Mr. BASS said, he was prepared to relieve all who objected to the payment of church rates, not by their absolute abolition, but by abolishing the compulsory payment of them. He did not recommend that proposal to the House without having had some experience of its successful results. In a parish with which he was connected about fifteen years ago, there were incessant disputes yearly on the question of church rates—quarrels between neighbours and friends, between Dissenters and Churchmen. There was no peace in the parish. The incumbent, a very sensible man, was determined to put an end to that state of things. He said there should be no more compulsion, while every year there should be a rate, and it should be collected only from Churchmen who were willing to pay, leaving others alone. What was the result? Since 1855, there had been, without objection or opposition, a rate levied of from £200 to £350 a year, to which great numbers of Dissenters contributed. That parish, too, paid higher rates than any other in the diocese; the churches were kept in admirable repair, and the clergy were on the best terms with their congregation, and with the Dissenters in the parish.

Mr. NEWDEGATE was understood to say that he was prepared to abolish the compulsory charge upon persons, but not to exempt property from the liability which had been so long placed upon it. He could not, however, go beyond this, for he could not consent to put the charge, which was really now upon the land, into the pockets of the landlords; and he felt that to abolish it altogether would be inconsistent with the maintenance of the parochial system.

Mr. AKROYD said, that instead of the Bill being a Bill for the abolition of compulsory church rates, it was rather a Bill for taking away from parishioners the power which they now possessed of taxing themselves for the maintenance of their parish church. The Bill in this sense interfered with self-government and with the principle that the majority should determine whether there should or should not be a church rate; in fact, it would impose upon the majority the will of the minority. It seemed to him that the provisions introduced into the Bill of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) took away all ground of objection on the part of Dissenters; and he apprehended that upon no principle of civil or religious liberty could any one religious body claim to interfere in the government of another religious body. The mode which the Church of England had for centuries adopted of raising funds was church rates; and unless there was some injury shown to Dissenters, he ventured to claim for the Church her own mode of raising funds. He should wish to ask the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Hardcastle) in the event of church rates being repealed, what substitute would be proposed for them? The only other modes of raising money for the repair of the fabrics were pew-rents and the offertory collections. The objections against pew-rents, however, were much stronger than those against church rates. The average annual charge in the shape of pew-rents, whether in church or chapel, was about 10s. for each sitting; and if payment were made general it would exclude all the poor parishioners, or they would be put in some out of the way place where they could neither see nor hear. Pew-rents could be collected by process of law—an operation which would be extremely objectionable. At present the fabrics were the property of the whole of the parishioners, and they being the owners had the power and the duty of keeping them in repair. What would the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Harcastle) do with the ownership of these churches? Was he prepared to confiscate them, or hand them over in perpetuity to that section of the parishioners which was attached to the Church of England? Or, on the other hand, did he expect Churchmen to be at the expense of repairing the common property of the parish? His hon. Friend appeared hardly to have considered on what footing he would leave the ownership of parish churches if church rates were violently and unconditionally abolished. Much of the animosity between Churchmen and Dissenters had died away. There was a disposition on both sides to settle this question. Mr. Morley, who he regretted had no longer a seat in that House, had delivered a speech on this subject which found favour on both sides of the House. For himself he must say they could hardly settle the question, except on the principle embodied in the Bill of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard). In his opinion the persons who were to be exempted from church rates by that Bill were not sufficiently defined; but that defect could easily be remedied. He ventured to claim for the Church her old mode of Church government and of raising funds; and he thought that if this principle were admitted, it would give to Churchmen and to Dissenters free scope to carry out their own views, and promote common Christianity in the modes they each considered best.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not wish to detain the House by going into the arguments which had been used on either side: he rose simply to make an appeal to the Government whether they would not be induced to support the second reading of this Bill. He thought that the Liberal party, and especially the Liberal Church party, had every reason to be satisfied with the progress of this question and of this debate. A very different tone had been taken to-day from that which had characterized church rate debates on previous occasions. If this was at all owing to the fact that hon. Members who used to sit on that side of the House had gone over to the other, he thought that those on his own side had every reason to congratulate themselves on the change. This was the first occasion on which they had any declaration on any question connected with the Church from the Government. He had watched them with great interest in their addresses to their constituents on their election, but hitherto they had been silent on the subject. That day, however, the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners) had addressed them as the organ of the Government on the question of church rates; and, on the whole, they had reason to be satisfied with his statement; because, although he said he should vote against the second reading of this Bill, he spoke of what he called a compromise in the most promising terms. For years and years, he said, they had been expressing a wish that there should be a compromise; and what was the compromise of the noble Lord? Exemption of Dissenters from paying this charge. Well, he trusted that was the view not only of the noble Lord, but of the whole of his Colleagues, including the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House of Commons. A few years ago that certainly was not the view of the right hon. Gentleman. He pronounced himself very clearly and distinctly on this subject. He said this—"Some of our friends would go further—they would exempt the Dissenters from the charge; that is not compromise, it is surrender." He said further—"What the Dissenter wants is, in fact, an oligarchical privilege." Was the right hon. Gentleman prepared now to yield that point—that which the right hon. Gentleman had formerly called a surrender? If the Government were prepared to sanction the compromise that Dissenters should not be obliged to pay the rate, they would have taken a great step in advance and proved that it was not only on the question of Reform that they had very considerable elasticity of convictions. He thought the Government might very well vote for the second reading of the Bill, and adopt the compromise contained in the clauses of which notice had been given by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie). He trusted to see a compromise satisfactory to the majority of the House, and he hoped the Government would in this question repeat the example of the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, who a few Wednesdays ago, on the second reading of a Bill also involving the principle of religious toleration, first declared that he could not support it unless certain alterations were agreed to, but though these alterations were refused, voted for the second reading nevertheless.

MR. WALPOLE: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) having appealed to Her Majesty's Government as to whether they are prepared to support such a compromise as that suggested by my noble Friend the First Commissioner of Works—namely, to exempt Dissenters from the payment of church rates—the best answer I can give to the right hon. Gentleman is one which will not be simply confined to words. Eight years ago, when the Government of Lord Derby was in power, and when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, as he is now, Leader of the House, he proposed a measure in which that identical compromise, as it is called, was included; and that measure was not rejected by those hon. Members who sat on the Ministerial side of the House, but by the combined movement of those who sat on the opposite side. In reference to this question, I have only to say that Her Majesty's Government are perfectly prepared to abide by that compromise, as it is called, by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, which they themselves proposed when they were last in office. But more than that—I think that the proposition of the hon. Member for Stoke, and of the hon. Member for Buckingham, do furnish us with the means of arriving at a very effectual compromise on this question, which the House will do well to examine. But when we are asked now, as we were asked last year, to consider not any such compromise as that, but to consider whether a rate which has existed for many centuries should not be absolutely and totally abolished without any compromise whatever—then, I say, it is utterly impossible that Her Majesty's Ministers, or those who concur with them, can assent to any such proposition. When the Bill, which was nearly identical with the present one, was introduced last year by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, then the Leader of the House, in the course of the discussion upon the second reading he gave an intimation to the House—which intimation was subsequently followed up by a distinct and specific proposition—that if the compulsory abolition of church rates were not insisted upon, he would introduce a measure which would enable those who now desired to contribute to the maintenance of the fabric of the Church to obtain their object. I said then what I say now—I think that such a mode of dealing with the question would hardly give satisfaction. If a compromise of any kind be intended I think it ought to be by a distinct provision inserted in the Bill to be submitted to our consideration; because if we once assent to the second reading of a Bill without such compromise being included in its provisions, we shall be precluded afterwards in fair argument from objecting to the abolition of church rates absolutely, and it would be a mere chance, after absolute abolition, whether any substitute that would be considered satisfactory will be afterwards proposed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) at the beginning of this debate took very nearly the same view on this question as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, only with this difference—the right hon. Baronet thought that certain modifications might be made in the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire last year, and, as I understood, he seemed to think that some such machinery as that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire might be introduced into the present Bill. Now my answer to the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet is this—that it would be useless going into Committee upon this Bill, with that view, inasmuch as the introduction of such machinery into it would make it an entirely new Bill, and would not be an amendment in it. Let there be no mistake about the matter. What we think is this. Here is an old customary rate which has existed for centuries, and which has enabled parishes by self-governing action to contribute towards the repairs of the fabric of the National Church. About 5 per cent of the parishes have exempted themselves by reason of the votes of the majority of their populations from the obligation of contributing to the church rates, leaving 95 per cent of them perfectly willing to contribute to the payment of those rates required for such purposes. On what grounds then—for what reason I ask—are you to do away with that which is found to be the available practical machinery of this country for preserving the fabric of our churches, when it is evident that 95 per cent of the parishes do not object to it? There may be a few parishes, or a few individuals in a parish, who have not exempted themselves from the payment of those rates, but who wish to be exempted because they do not belong to the Church. Now, if any persons really desire to be exempted, Her Majesty's Ministers will agree to any proposition to effect that object; but they cannot consent to do away with that old and legitimate charge upon property in the hands of those belonging to the Church merely because a sentimental feeling as to this payment being a grievance exists in the minds of Dissenters. For these reasons we cannot agree to the absolute abolition of church rates. We are, however, prepared to consider any measure having for its principle the throwing the burden upon the landlords instead of the occupier, or of honestly relieving persons from the obligation of contributing to the support of the fabric of a church to which they do not belong. There is not any reason, we think, why a fund established for the maintenance of the Church should be abruptly destroyed. For these reasons I certainly cannot assent to the second reading.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I wish in a brief compass to offer a few observations upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and then to state the course which I intend to pursue in respect to the present question. The right hon. Gentleman says that church rates ought to be considered a charge upon property and not a tax upon the person who is called upon to pay them; and yet he is willing to exempt the Dissenters from the payment of them. But does not the right hon. Gentleman see that what is really involved in the whole question is this—whether church rates are really a charge upon property? The moment you consent to exempt the Dissenter from a charge inherited with his property that moment it becomes useless to assert that church rates are a charge upon property. The right hon. Gentleman says he objects to go into Committee upon this Bill because it is an inconvenient and objectionable practice to go into Committee, not for the purpose of amending a Bill in the ordinary sense of the word, but in order to make it a new Bill. Well, I confess I very much agree with him in that view. But still there are two points to be considered. The one is the point of form, the other the point of substance. As regards the point of form there is no question; because from the simplicity of the structure of the Bill it is perfectly consistent with its principles to engraft upon it provisions to maintain the present parochial machinery without establishing the compulsory powers. In regard to the point of substance, the question is one of words, because it is this—whether the substance of the Bill does not really reside in its destroying the power of compulsory taxation. And if it resides in that effect of it, then I say it is an alteration in the Bill in respect to substance to introduce provisions into it recognising the voluntary principle. As regards myself, I will only say what my object was in the Bill of last year, and what I felt to be the duty it imposed upon me. I do not think I should have been justified in pressing upon the House a compromise, however well intended, after the House had signified its disinclination to entertain it. Last year I confess I was disappointed in the course taken not only by some Members of the Government, but by several hon. Gentlemen of weight in the House on account of their personal qualities and experience, as well as of their knowledge of this subject. Those hon. Gentlemen not only opposed the Bill which I introduced, but on several occasions they declared the measure to be worse than a Bill for the total abolition of church rates. Although that was the case, yet, on the other hand, my Bill received a considerable support from hon. Gentlemen opposite. It is true we had not the advantage of ascertaining the extent of their support in a division, because no division took place on the second reading; but certainly the circumstances attending the passing of the Bill through a second reading without a division, and the assurances of support which I received, were such as to induce me to refrain from pertinaciously pressing such a compromise upon the House as I should have felt it my duty to do if the facts were otherwise than such as I have described. I have not thought it necessary to introduce the Bill a second time to the House for this reason—that my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie) had placed certain clauses on the paper which, if agreed to, will substantially effect the object which I have in view. I confess I think it desirable to support these clauses in Committee, and I hope that the House will fairly consider them. The point, then, remaining in doubt between the proposition of the hon. Member for Buckingham and the clauses given notice of by my hon. Friend is, whether the compulsory power of enforcing church rates shall be retained not for the purpose of putting it in action against the unwilling parties, but against those who are willing to pay. Now, the whole head and front of our proposition is this—that besides giving up the compulsory power against those who are not willing to contribute to the fund for the maintenance of the fabric of the Church, it is also proposed to give up the compulsory power as against those who are willing to pay the church rates. That, I think, is a question deserving of consideration in Committee; and inasmuch as no disinclination has been expressed by the promoters or supporters of the present Bill to afford a fair opportunity of discussing the question in Committee, I shall certainly have no hesitation in giving my vote for the second reading.

The House divided:—Ayes 263; Noes 187: Majority 76.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

CHURCH RATES COMMUTATION BILL.

(Mr. Newdegate, Colonel Stuart.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said*: Mr. Speaker—I beg to move the second reading of this Bill, and I do so, not in contravention of the decision at which the House has just arrived, so far as it exempts all persons from personal liability to the payment of church rates. This Bill has been prepared in accordance with a Resolution which the House adopted only five years ago ; for in the year 1862 after mature consideration of the whole question involved in the proposal totally to abolish church rates, this House, when 559 Members were present, came to the following Resolution by a majority of 17 :—

“ That it is unjust and inexpedient to abolish the ancient customary right, exercised from time immemorial by the ratepayers of every parish in England, to raise by rate amongst themselves the sums required for the repair of their Church, until some other provision shall have been made by Parliament for the discharge of those obligations, to which, by custom or statute, the churchwardens, on the part of the parish, are liable.”

Now, Sir, there are at this time three Bills before the House, but neither by the Church Rates Abolition Bill, the second reading of which the House has just sanctioned, nor by the Church Rates Regulation Bill, which stands third on the Orders of the Day, in the names of the hon. Member for Stoke and the hon. Member for Buckingham, is any substitute whatever for church rates proposed. The Church Rates Regulation Bill proposes that every person who chooses to say that he objects to pay church rates shall be exempt from liability to pay them, and that every owner of property upon which church rates have hitherto been paid shall, if he objects, exempt that property; it may be, during his life-time. It is with this second clause of the Bill that I quarrel ; for, with the permission of the House, I can show upon indisputable authority that, although church rates are levied on the person, they are imposed only in respect of the occupation of that person; that is to say, the land or house which he holds. A person may live in an hotel until the year of jubilee, or the extreme age of man, and never be liable to the rate ; but if he occupies any tenement then he becomes liable, and I think I can show the House beyond all dispute that this church rate is, in fact, a tax upon property. The measure I propose, thus, provides a substitute for church rate. It abolishes all personal liability; but reserves, as a substitute for the present rate, a charge upon property ; not a new charge, but one to which property has always been subjected. That church rate is a tax upon property I will now proceed to show by reference to authorities upon the subject. Church rate, as we all know, is variable in amount. In some years 4*d.* is levied, and in some years 2*d.* is levied; but the average of church rate, I believe, is about 2*d.* in the pound. Well, in the year 1848 I moved for the appointment of a Committee, which this House was pleased to grant, to inquire into the agricultural custom of tenure prevailing in England and Wales. That Committee went county by county through all the agricultural counties of England and Wales, and took evidence as to the agreements upon which property was let ; and they found that in almost every lease there was a distinct clause, which bound the tenant to pay the rates and taxes, or “ outgoings,” as they were termed in many cases, on account of the landlord. And wherever that clause was not inserted the evidence shows that the clause was implied, though not expressed. I should be sorry to detain the House at any length by reading the evidence on this subject; but I regret, however, that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary now sanctions the proposals contained in the Bill of the hon. Member for Stoke and the hon. Member for Buckingham, to exempt the owner of property at his pleasure from a charge which has attached to that property from time immemorial, since the right hon. Gentleman has declared that he recognises church rate as a charge upon property. Yet, although the right hon. Gentleman recognises church rate as a charge upon property, he is prepared to exempt property from that charge. A tenant calculates that he will have to pay a church rate, say of 2*d.* in the pound ; he offers a rent diminished by that amount to the landlord ; but if at any time a rate of 4*d.* in the pound happens to be imposed, the tenant has then to pay the extra 2*d.* out of his own pocket. Thus the excess above the average gives a personal character to church rate. I am told that by this Bill I propose a new charge upon the land. The evidence to rebut that allegation, however, is most abundant; and, if the House will allow me, I will read a few extracts from high authorities which, I think, will be conclusive upon that point. The first authority that I will quote is that of the late Sir Robert Inglis, who, when a Bill was introduced in 1834 for the purpose of appropriating the sum of £250,000 out of the public revenue as a substitute for church rates, made the following remarks :—

“ It was precisely and strictly as an element of charge upon his property, as he had bought it, that a Dissenter, as well as every other man, was called upon to pay his proportion of church rates. If the amount had been raised by a poll tax then the Dissenters might have complained of being included in its operation ; but he could not understand how any person, upon the principles of honesty, as between man and man, he having purchased a house or land with certain liabilities calculated in its value, could come forward and claim to be relieved from those liabilities upon the ground of holding certain opinions upon points on which he had, perhaps, changed his mind since the period of making his purchase. He thought those remarks disposed of the question of right and justice. He contended that the church rate was a tax upon property, not upon individuals, and that the Dissenters acquired their property liable to the payment."—[3 Hansard, xii. 1026.]

Then, what said the representative of the Dissenters, Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey, in the same debate? He said—

"It was well said by the hon. Member for the University of Oxford that the church rate was not less a charge upon property than tithes. This is no fallacy. The church rate affects property in the same manner as any other charge. The other day I was called upon to pay £14 for my house in Great George Street for the repair and maintenance of a neighbouring church. Now if I were to sell my house, would not the purchaser inquire after the church rates as well as the parish rates, the sewer rates, and all other charges affecting property; and, having taken them into consideration, would not the amount of them influence the price?"—[3 Hansard, xii. 1046.]

And now, with the permission of the House, I will quote the authority of the late Sir Robert Peel. He was supposed and generally admitted to be a person well conversant with the incidence of taxation. In 1837, Sir Robert Peel said—

"If to meet these necessities a sum were taken from the Consolidated Fund, it would relieve the landowners of the country from the duty of supporting the Church. Whether there should be any new apportionment of this charge on the land, making the owner and not the occupier contribute (a plan which he owned would, in his judgment, be justice), thus continuing the connection between the landowner and the Church—whether it would be possible to reconcile such a plan with some means of giving relief to the Dissenters without any invidious test being imposed—whether it would be possible to draw a distinction between the cases of the town parishes and the rural parishes, in the latter of which the House might be assured the people did not wish to see the Church degraded—whether it would be possible to do these things he was not prepared to say, but at least they were deserving the best consideration."—[3 Hansard, xxxvii. 326.]

This, Sir, is precisely what the Bill before the House proposes. It proposes to abolish the personal liability of every Dissenter, and of every other man; but it also proposes to reserve as a substitute for church rates a charge upon property; and that not a new charge, but a charge upon property to which it has been liable from time immemorial. I will now shortly cite the opinion of the Poor Law Commissioners as to the incidence of this tax. In their Report of the year 1843 I find the Poor Law Commissioners saying this—

"These rates are essentially taxes upon the rent of the landlord, not taxes upon the occupier's profits. No legal declarations, no limitations of legal remedies to the person and goods of the occupier, however much they may disguise the aspect of the tax, or make its burden operate unequally on rent, can make it fall permanently on anything but rent. For perhaps the greatest abuses which ever prevailed in the administration of the Poor Laws arose from this fact—that the tax fell, and that it was found out by the occupiers that it did fall, upon the landlord, while the administration, expenditure, and appropriation of the tax were given exclusively to the occupiers, who did not really bear the burden."

Let me now address a few words to the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield). I saw at once that it would be unjust to allow the occupiers assembled in vestry to tax the land and the owners of property, unless the Legislature assigned some limit to their action. Accordingly, in former Bills, I proposed that the amount to which the property of the landlord might become chargeable should not exceed 2*d*. in the pound. Well, the hon. Member for Sheffield very much astonished me on one occasion by stating that I was about to propose a charge of £800,000 or £900,000 a year upon real property by my Bill. Surely, the hon. Member must have forgotten the provisions of the Bill. Under this Bill the charge was not to tax any parish in which no church rate had been levied for seven years, or where the rate had been refused three times on a poll. All such parishes are to be exempt from the charge I propose to substitute for church rate; and if the House will permit me, I will show the effect of the exemptions upon the amount of the charge. In former years I made a calculation somewhat in this manner:—Taking the rateable value of property, subject to the county rate, as the guide—namely, £64,900,000—it would, for the purposes of this calculation, become necessary to deduct the value of the property in the 1,826 parishes and districts in which for seven years no church rates had been levied, which amounted to £21,014,382, which, being deducted from the former sum, left £43,885,618. Deducting, also, 13 per cent for the value of tithes and glebe lands, as not liable to church rate, and therefore not intended to be subject to the charge on 9,463 parishes and districts in which church rate is levied—this amounts to £5,705,123—there remains £38,180,495. The produce of 2*d.* in the pound upon this sum would give £318,162 a year. That was the calculation which I made eight years ago. But I have sought this Session to ascertain what would now be the produce of 1*d.* in the pound. Making the same deductions from the rateable value, by taking a rough estimate of the parishes in which no church rate has been levied, and deducting the value of the tithe and glebe, which comes to about £7,000,000, by this calculation I find that the utmost amount which 1*d.* in the pound would now produce is £201,182, say £200,000 a year in round numbers. Now, under the Bill as it stands before the House the vestry is to decide in each parish, where church rates have been habitually collected, whether the charge shall be 1*d.* or 2*d.*, or an intermediate sum in the pound; and, if throughout the whole of England and Wales the vestries decide on 1*d.* in the pound, that would amount to a charge of £200,000 in round numbers. But the present church rate amounts altogether to from £250,000 to £300,000 a year; therefore, I retain the power in the hands of the vestry to levy 2*d.* in the pound, where they deem it to be necessary, under the new charge to be substituted for church rate by the Bill, and 2*d.* in the pound is adopted, the entire amount would exceed the £200,000 a year, which the 1*d.* in the pound would yield, and would approach £300,000 a year, if 2*d.* in the pound, instead of 1*d.* in the pound were adopted on half the value, liable to church rate in England and Wales, and £300,000 is about the aggregate amount of the present church rate in England and Wales. If the hon. Member for Sheffield, or any other hon. Member, will refer to the local taxation Returns, he will see under the head of church rates that there is a balance in hand each year of about £60,000. That arises from the fact that in many parishes the practice is not to have a church rate every year, but to levy a sum equal to the requirements of two years in one year, and hold the balance over; if this amount is added to the church rate, the total approaches £300,000 a year. Having in the preparation of these calculations had the kind aid of Poor Law officers, of officers connected with Queen Anne's Bounty, and of officers connected with the Ecclesiastical Commission, I beg to assure the hon. Member for Sheffield that he did me an injustice when he imagined that I was submitting to the House a proposition so extravagant as the levying of a tax of £800,000 or £900,000 in substitution for church rates. The utmost amount that would be levied under the Bill, in the first instance, after it came into operation, would be, as I have stated, between £200,000 and £400,000 a year. The object of the Bill is this—not to impose a new charge anywhere; but wherever the charge may not at first attach—that is to say, in parishes a church rate has not been levied for seven years together, to give an option with this reservation—that if the inhabitants shall hereafter determine to resume the exercise of their right to charge the property in that parish for the purpose of maintaining the fabric of the church—if three fourths of the inhabitants shall come to that decision in any parish, which is, at first, exempt under the operation of the Bill, that then the right of the inhabitants to have that which their forefathers intended them, shall be recognised by the court of quarter sessions. With the permission of the House, I will now continue the evidence in support of my assertion that church rate is a charge upon property. I have quoted the statement made by Sir Robert Peel in the debate of 1837. I have also quoted the opinion of the Poor Law Commissioners in the year 1843, and now I proceed to quote the opinion of Mr. Goulburn, who was for several years Chancellor of the Exchequer. What said Mr. Goulburn in the House in the year 1849? Mr. Goulburn said—

“Those who inherited land inherited it subject to church rates, and those who bought it purchased it at a lower price than would have been paid if church rates had not been leviable in respect of it.”—[3 Hansard, ciii. 661.]

Again, in the same debate, Sir Robert Peel said—

“What was the Resolution in effect but a Resolution that the land should be relieved from this burden. . . . The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Page Wood) stated that both by the common law and the statute law the land had always been chargeable with a payment for the maintenance of the parish church. He said there was a distinction between tithes and church rates in several respects, but admitted that a payment from the land for the maintenance of the fabric was sanctioned by the common law; was it fitting, then, that they should exempt the land from this charge by a Resolution hastily passed by the landowners themselves?”—[Ibid. 667.]

Thus you perceive that Sir Robert Peel not only expressed the opinion himself, but cited that of Sir William Page Wood in support of the proposition that church rates is a charge upon property. In the same debate Lord John Russell, now Earl Russell, said—

"In the first place, there was no shame in levying church rates on Dissenters who bought lands, because they had bought them subject to that charge, and it was considered in the price."—[Ibid. 674.]

But the strongest evidence of all, perhaps, on this particular point, is that which was given by Mr. Coode, a gentleman who was long employed on the Poor Law Board, and was more conversant with local taxation and the incidence of taxation upon property than almost any person living. And what did Mr. Coode say before a Committee of the House of Lords in 1861? The Question put to him was—

"Is it the case that the incidence of the church rate, though it primarily falls upon the occupier, invariably rests upon the owner in the long run?"

And Mr. Coode's answer was "invariably." He then goes on to say—

"It is not by a mere consequence—it is by an arrangement that anticipates all payment of rent whatsoever. No rent is ever set but upon the consideration of all the outgoings that the tenant will have to pay or provide for. No tenant yet in his senses ever made an agreement for rent, who did not consider, before the figure at which the rent was fixed, all these outgoings. Amongst those, and some of the most conspicuous and the most easily calculated of all, are the rates and taxes which the tenant will have to pay."

He further says—

"It is not a question whether the incidence of such rates upon the rent is a mere consequence that may attach to it, or may be avoided; it is an inevitable result, anticipated and provided for beforehand, and inextricably involved in the very fixing of the terms of the tenancy. And any merely legal device you may adopt for fixing the rate on the tenant must inevitably fail, for the more stringently you fix the occupier the more certainly will you fix him with that outgoing, which would become a necessary deduction from the rent he would otherwise pay."

And now I beg the attention of the House to what follows. Mr. Coode proceeds to say—

"I have seen in the last discussion which has taken place upon this subject in the House of Commons (referring to the debates of 1859 or 1860) an argument about the legal incidence of the rate, in which it is alleged that such and such an authority has said that the church rate charges the land, and that such another authority has said that it has not charged the land. That is merely a question as to the verbal terms in which the law may be made. You may make a rate upon the occupier or upon the owner, or say that it shall be on land and tenements; but you cannot by any device avoid this certain effect—that if the subject in respect of which the assessment is to be made is the subject of occupation, nobody will come into occupation as a payer of rent without taking that obligation into his calculation as an outgoing, and having the rent reduced accordingly. I feel surprised at this time of day to see a discussion which turns only upon the mere words of legal precedents, and not on the real practical and economical operation of any such imposition as all the local taxes are, church rates amongst the number."

Such evidence as this I could multiply ad infinitum. I might quote, for example, the authority of that learned Judge, Sir John Lubington, who gave evidence before the Committee of the House of Lords, and has repeated the substance of it in his judgment on the Tamworth church rate case. He is asked—

"That being the state of the case, is it the fact that the majority who refused to make the rate are still in law censurable, and liable to a penalty for not making it?"

And he replies—

"By the common law—that is to say, by immemorial usage in this country—the parishioners are bound to repair the church, and to provide everything that is necessary for the decent performance of Divine service; and, of course, if they refuse to do so they are guilty of a breach of duty; but there is no penalty that I am aware of that could possibly attach upon them; and for this reason, in former days, if such a thing occurred, the fear of an interdict would have been quite sufficient to have forced a church rate—I mean in Catholic times. But perhaps your Lordships should know exactly how the matter really stands. There is no doubt as to the extreme antiquity of church rates in this country; it is impossible to say satisfactorily when they began, but in Saxon times beyond all doubt. That, however, is a controversy I shall not trouble your Lordships with; but I could point out to your Lordships where you could find it, in case it was necessary to examine it minutely. The church rate was this—a rate upon the person with respect to his ability, whether it was in land or in personal property; but in those days, there being very little personal property, if any, capable of being taxed, it was, in fact, a tax upon land in possession of the occupier."

I am really ashamed of trespassing upon the attention of the House to such an extent with these quotations; but the evidence is so wonderfully conclusive on the point, and the authority so indisputable, that I am sure the House will forgive my doing so. In January last the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth made a speech, from which I gather that he is inclined to the opinion that church rate is not a tax upon property; and in support of that view he cited the authority of the late Lord Campbell. I can hardly imagine that the right hon.

Baronet could have read the letter of Lord Campbell to Lord Stanley, now Lord Derby, whence I suppose he quoted, and which was written in the year 1837. But permit me to read to the House a passage from that letter. Lord Campbell wrote, and he wrote deliberately, in these terms—

“From the difficulty in getting at the amount of personal property, the general practice has long been to confine the church rate as well as the poor's rate to real property.”

Why, Sir, Lord Campbell was much too sound a lawyer to be found differing from Sir John Lushington and the other high authorities to whom I have referred. Lord Campbell then proceeds—

“But there seems no doubt that originally personal as well as real property was subject to both, and that both were meant to impose a tax upon the parishioners, according to their substance and ability. So late as the year 1823, in the Poole case, it was decided by the High Court of Delegates that by custom a church rate may lawfully be assessed upon shipping and stock-in-trade.”

As he had said, however—

“From the difficulty of getting at the amount of personal property the general practice has long been to confine the church rates, as well as the poor's rate, to real property.”

The fact is that you cannot adduce the opinion of any competent lawyer, of any competent surveyor, or of any practical man in favour of the idea that church rate is not a charge upon property. And, being a charge upon property, as I believe it to be, I entreat the House not to inflict upon the class to which I belong so severe a temptation as would be implied in transferring to them that which belongs to their neighbours. I say that the proposal to give to the landowners the power of robbing their neighbours by putting into their own pockets the amount of the church rate, is placing before them a temptation of which ill-advised persons—persons who dissent from the Church of England, persons of extreme opinions, trustees for minors, and persons not having a due interest in the welfare of their successors—will not be slow to avail themselves. Besides, if you enable the owners of real property to appropriate this charge of £300,000 a year, think you that successive Chancellors of the Exchequer will be so negligent as not to reclaim this public property from them? Why, Sir, it would furnish an excuse for increasing the direct taxation on real property, of which any Chancellor of the Exchequer would be bound to avail himself. As I deprecate the idea of taking any sum from the public revenue and giving it to the Church, so do I deprecate the idea of giving to the landowner that which belongs to his neighbours—the parishioners; because I am quite certain that the justice of the Legislature would soon vindicate itself by exacting from his property for the public service a much larger amount than he could have thus unjustly appropriated. Having disposed of that part of the subject, I will now explain the general provisions of the Bill, which I ask the House to read a second time. And first, instead of proposing 2*d.* in the pound absolutely as the amount of the charge to be substituted for church rate in the sense of the Resolution which was adopted by a full House in the year 1862—instead of placing it at 2*d.* absolutely, I propose by this Bill to give the vestry a discretion to levy, as the circumstances may necessitate, a charge of 1*d.* or 2*d.* in the pound, or any intervening amount. If you refer to the last Return made to this House respecting church rates in two dioceses, you will find that in parishes where the amount of the value of the property is not above £3,000 a year, the yield of 1*d.* in the pound is scarcely sufficient for the purposes of the church rate; whilst in those cases where the property in a parish amounted to £7,000 or £8,000 a year, 2*d.* in the pound was more, perhaps, than would be required; and that 1*d.* in the pound upon the richer parishes would be ample for all the purposes of a church rate; and the House will bear in mind that it is to provide for the purposes of church rate that the Bill imposes the charge. When hon. Members vote for the unconditional abolition of church rates, I think that where they act as representatives of Dissenters, they are hard upon us Churchmen. Except through the vestries, we have over the services of the Church no control whatever. Now, the Dissenters are in this position. They can, if they choose, remove their ministers. They can do what they like as regards the manner in which the services in their places of worship are conducted. But once destroy the action of the vestry, and what is the consequence? Why, that you leave us, the laity of the Church, at the mercy of the clergyman. You virtually take the parish churches from us, the laity of the Church of England, to whom they have always hitherto belonged, and vest them in the clergy who are irremovable by law. This, Sir, is a very serious consideration. For I know that the total abolition of church rates is not demanded by the representatives of Dissenters only. There are extreme ritualistic clergymen who ask for the unconditional abolition of church rates for the sake of destroying the vestry ; for the sake of becoming absolute masters of the Church of England ; and I have by me here a pamphlet written by the Rev. Mr. Bennet of Frome. He is one of those clergymen who are so spiritually proud that he has in plain terms declared that he esteems it unworthy of his position as a clergyman to preside at a vestry meeting. Well, he advocates the abolition of church rates in the sense of the Bill which has just been read a second time. And why does he do so ? Because he wants to have sole possession of the parish church, and to oust the vestry altogether. Sir, I claim on the part of the laity of the Church of England that that which Mr. Bennet himself admits to have been our duty and our right from time immemorial—from Saxon times—I mean the duty to maintain the fabric of the Church, and the right, according to law, to regulate the services of the Church, shall not be taken from us. If any hon. Member will take the trouble to look into Burns' Ecclesiastical Law, he will there find that the law of the Church Catholic, of the Church generally, especially the Roman Catholic portion of the Church, has always been that the fabric of the Church belongs to the clergy, and not to the laity ; and that it is out of the provision made for the clergy that the expense of maintaining the fabric is to be provided. But it is laid down by Blackstone, who quotes “Ayliffe and Lynwood,” that ever since the Saxon times it has been a peculiarity of the Church of England, a peculiarity that extended over the whole period during which the religion of England was connected with the Papacy, that the laity, the parishioners, always asserted their right in the fabrics to the possession of them, and performed the duty of making provision for their maintenance by the imposition of a rate according to property and substance, which, although in Saxon times it was levied jointly with tithe, the provision for the clergy since the reign of Edward III. it has been as church rate has been levied separately for the maintenance of the fabrics of the Church, which, by the ancient laws and customs of the Church of England, are vested in the parishioners. Now if you do not take care—if the House passes the Church Rate Abolition Bill without making some provision for enabling the vestry to maintain the fabric and services of the Church—you will break through this ancient right and this ancient custom, and virtually change the possession of the fabrics of the Church, by taking them from the laity and vesting them in the clergy. As an Englishman, as a Protestant, and as a member of the Church of England, I object to any such transfer as that being indirectly effected by a Bill, which is justifiable only so far as it would relieve Dissenters from personal liability to church rates, relieve Roman Catholics from the payment of church rates, relieve every occupier in this country from personal liability on account of the expenses necessary for maintaining the fabric and conducting the services of the Church. Sir, I have used strong language on the appropriation of the amount of the church rate by the landowners, and perhaps the hon. Member for Sheffield may think that I am reflecting unduly upon the owners of property in large towns ; but I can assure him that I have no intention of the kind. I do not deny that in the case of some large towns resistance to church rates was justifiable. In Birmingham, for instance, there are no church rates. My late friend, Mr. Muntz, who first suggested to me the principle of this Bill, was prosecuted and imprisoned for non-payment of church rate in Birmingham. The rejection of church rates there was quite just. Church rate is a payment, due in consideration of a benefit received ; that benefit is church accommodation ; but if accommodation is not provided for the people in the fabrics, there can be no claim in justice for a church rate. I say, therefore, that the people of Birmingham had a perfect right to resist and to abolish the church rate, because the Church did not provide them with the accommodation, which was the consideration for the payment they were expected to make. It is with that view that I propose to extend the special right to all such places to remain exempt from the charge the Bill would impose, unless three-fourths of the parishioners in any parish should choose to claim the imposition of the charge ; and no one can suppose that three-fourths of the parishioners would claim the charge until the corresponding benefit in church accommodation has been amply and adequately provided for them. I do not know that there is any other point in this Bill on which I need now touch. I can only say that I have sought the best counsel on all sides, and have received it. This Bill, therefore, is no mere crotchet of my own. It is a measure which is approved of by men of the highest authority, though their names I am not at liberty to mention. It is a Bill that in their opinion will furnish a substitute; that will render the abolition of church rates just, expedient, and consistent with sound policy; whilst the abolition of church rates without some such substitute would manifestly strike directly at the parochial system of the country—that system upon which all other institutions, and particularly our representative institutions, are based. I believe that you could inflict no greater injury than some ill-considered measure (such as I think the abolition of church rates without compensation would be) must entail upon the parochial system of England. Suppose that the Abolition of Church Rates Bill passes without the provision of a substitute. Take the case of some poor country parish, the property of which belongs to indifferent absentee landlords. The Churchwardens meet and lament that they have no longer the sanction of the law to levy this ancient payment. It may be that the owners of the property in the parish are not members of the Church of England. They may be Dissenters, or they may be Roman Catholics. The Churchwardens do not like to go about asking for contributions. But some wealthy man comes to them and says, you need not go about begging; I will make a proposal to you that will have the effect of relieving you from all difficulty. Then he says, "If you can get such a curate employed I will give a sum sufficient to relieve you from begging for money to keep up the fabric and the services"—or, perhaps, the first year he makes no condition, but the next says, "Yes, I'll give you the same sum as last year if the services are conducted in the way I think most edifying"—and thus services, alien to the feelings of the parishioners, might be introduced. The adults might refrain from attending the church; but the school children must attend. Need I comment further upon the mischief that might ensue? I say, Sir, that if the House has any respect for the independence of the vestries in many of the country parishes in this country, it will not, by depriving them of the means they have had for centuries of providing for and regulating the services and maintaining the fabric of the Church, render them mere begging institutions. It would be hard upon the clergy to be compelled to collect this amount. I am sorry to say that in many parishes their income is not adequate to maintain them in the position which they ought to hold. I know many cases of poor clergymen with large families. And I say that it would be most unjust to lay upon them the burden of begging for the funds which are requisite to keep up the fabric. In principle, it would be most vicious to transfer either the cost of maintaining or the possession of the fabrics of the Church from the laity to the clergy; to do this in violation of the ancient laws and customs of England. I hope the House will excuse me if I have been somewhat eager on this subject. I have endeavoured to state plainly why I think that church rates, as a personal impost, should be abolished. I have shown, from the evidence that I have adduced, that church rate is a charge upon property. To me it appears that it will be inconsistent with sound policy and dangerous to the parochial system of this country if the House does not act up to its own Resolution of 1862—that Resolution being in substance that it would be unjust and inexpedient to abolish church rates without providing a substitute. Of the three measures before the House this is the only one which contains a substitute for church rate, and is therefore consistent with the decision of a very full House, after ample debate, in 1862.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, that the hon. Gentleman had raised a new cry—instead of raising the old cry about the Church being in danger—he now had represented the interests of the laity as those which were liable to injury. After the decision which the House had arrived at, he could not see how the hon. Gentleman could expect his Bill to be read a second time, and he therefore moved its second reading that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Serjeant Gaselee.)

The House divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 177: Majority 132.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

CHURCH RATES REGULATION BILL.
(Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Beresford Hope.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HUBBARD said, in order to enable hon. Members to make themselves better acquainted with the provision of his Bill, he would postpone the second reading till that day week.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday next.

SALE AND PURCHASE OF SHARES BILL.

(Mr. Leeman, Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie,
Mr. Goldney.)

[BILL 38.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Contracts for Sale, &c., of Shares to be void unless the Numbers by which such Shares are distinguished are set forth in the Contract).

MR. LEE MAN moved the insertion of other words in the same clause, requiring that the numbers of the shares sold should be designated in writing or printing in the token or contract of sale.

Amendment proposed, in line 19, after the word "designate," to insert the words "in writing."—(Mr. Leeman.)

MR. FILDES said, the Amendment would prevent any business being done by telegraph.

MR. LEE MAN answered that a man could make his bargain by telegraph, and the message would be followed by a letter with the token next morning.

MR. TURNER said, the offence which it was proposed to create by the Bill would be completed on the moment the telegraph was acknowledged, and the parties concerned would be liable to punishment.

MR. C. WYKEHAM-MARTIN said, the numbers of the shares could be sent by telegraph.

MR. TURNER replied that the numbers would make the message too expensive, and stop sales in that way.

MR. LEE MAN insisted that agreement by telegraph did not constitute a contract, and that therefore the offence contemplated could not be committed by telegraph.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 109 ;
Noes 20 : Majority 89.

TRADES UNIONS BILL—(No. 44.)

COMMITTEE ON RE-COMMITMENT.

House in Committee on Re-commitment
(according to Order).

Clause 2 (Limits of Inquiry under Act).

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that as the Bill was one of considerable importance, he wished to obtain from the Government such explanation as it was in their power to give as to the exact scope and nature of the inquiry. An alteration had been made in this clause when the Bill was committed pro forma, and as it now stood Assistant Commissioners, independent of the Commission, might be appointed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to conduct the Sheffield inquiry. If he could rely upon the information that had reached him, there was no probability of the inquiry with respect to the outrages at Sheffield being undertaken by the members of the Commission, and in that case it would fall into the hands of the barristers to be appointed under this clause, over whom the Commission would have no control. In that case he thought the Sheffield inquiry should be kept quite distinct from that intrusted to the Commission. He wished to know, also, what was the interpretation placed by Her Majesty's Government on the scope of the inquiry? The noble and learned Lord (Lord St. Leonards) on the side Woolsack, while admitting that the Bill conferred powers of an arbitrary character, justified that circumstance on the ground of the necessity that existed to search into the outrages that had been committed. But the words of this clause seemed of wider scope than was thus intended, and the machinery provided was of an unusual character. The words of this clause were that the Commissioners were to—

"Inquire into any acts of intimidation, outrage, or wrong alleged to have been promoted, encouraged, or connived at by Trades Unions or Associations, whether of workmen or employers."

These words were of a very wide nature, and might cover matters of a very different kind from what was first intended. He should be glad to know whether Her Majesty's Government had any reason to suppose that outrages had been perpetrated in consequence of the association of employers? Their Lordships should bear in mind that this clause applied to the town of Sheffield generally, and the Commissioners might be called upon by those who came before them to go into many questions between employers and employed, of a very delicate character, and which might establish a very bad precedent. He would suggest that the Government were bound to define the scope of the inquiry. He wished to know also how the barristers appointed under this clause, which had been introduced in their Lordships' House, were to be paid? As the Bill came before them at first the inquiry was to be carried on by unpaid Commissioners; but if they substituted for them special Commissioners, it was evident that if men of first-rate ability were not appointed the confidence of those interested in the inquiry would be shaken, while, on the other hand, men of eminent ability would have to be liberally compensated.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that the Commission which had been issued defined the limits of the inquiry, which were described in the preamble of the Bill. These terms were—

"To inquire into and report on the organization and rules of Trades Unions and other Associations, whether of workmen or employers."

And—

"To investigate any recent acts of intimidation, outrage, or wrong, alleged to have been promoted, encouraged, or connived at by such Trades Unions or other Associations."

These words showed the extent and the limit of the inquiry, and the Bill only provided for the mode in which the inquiry should be carried on.

LORD CRANWORTH said, the powers of the Commission must depend upon the wording of the clause, and if the Commissioners exercised any powers which were not authorized by the clause, they would be inoperative, and he thought the scope of the inquiry was not sufficiently definite. The clause gave the Commissioners power to inquire into "any acts of intimidation, outrage, or wrong." These words were so general that they might include the crime of murder; and by a subsequent clause the Commissioners possessed what was in reality the power of giving pardon to those who had been engaged in any act of intimidation, outrage, or wrong, and whom they might feel it necessary to examine. If in the course of the inquiry before the Assistant Commissioners such acts were alleged and inquired into, would that be a valid act?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not understand his noble and learned Friend's objection to the clause.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON asked why the inquiry should extend to associations of employers as well as of workmen?

LORD ST. LEONARDS pointed out that the object of the inquiry was to ascertain the state of the relations between workmen and employers, out of which the outrages arose.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, it was alleged by persons who professed to know that these outrages did not arise out of the working of trades unions, and the object of the Commission was to inquire whether that was true or not. It had been granted on the application not only of the inhabitants of Sheffield, but also on that of members of trades unions, who said they could prove that the allegations made against them were false, and that the trades unions were quite innocent. With reference to outrages having been promoted or committed by employers, an instance had been adduced in which a man was knocked down by a foreman because he admitted having attended a trades union meeting; and it was evident that the inquiry, the scope of which embraced the whole question of the relations of employers and employed, must extend to the means adopted by the masters to promote their own interests as against the men. The barristers, appointed members of the Commission, he supposed, would be paid in the same way as the Commissioners who conducted inquiries into bribery at elections; but that was a matter which exclusively rested with the Treasury.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he perfectly understood the historical part of the question and the pressure put upon the Government; but he had never heard a real defence of the extraordinary measures taken, nor a practical explanation of how that was to be effected by this inquiry which the ordinary processes of the law had failed to accomplish. The other day he suggested that it would be desirable to consult Sir William Erle, the Chairman of the Commission; and if Sir William Erle really approved the proposed arrangements he would bow to such authority.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, his right hon. and learned Friend had consented to act on the Commission, and, of course, he would be guided by the powers conferred on the Commission.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Powers of Commissioners in respect of Evidence).

LORD CRANWORTH said, that this clause conferred extraordinary powers on the barristers, who under it could commit to prison for one calendar month persons guilty of contempt. He should not, however, take the sense of the House on the point, but he wished to move an Amendment—

“Every Inquiry under this Act shall be conducted in public, and due Notice shall be given of the Time and Place of holding the same, but with Power to the Person or Persons conducting the same to adjourn any Meeting as Occasion may require.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not object to the proposed Amendment.

Clause 4 (Indemnity to Witnesses).

LORD HOUGHTON said, the effect of this clause was to prejudge the whole question of the connection of the trades unions with the outrages at Sheffield. It appeared to him that when a matter was to be inquired into nothing should be done which might prejudge the case on one side or the other. By this clause they permitted the man who had committed the outrage to come forward and explain how he did it, and they gave him full indemnity. This implied that they would treat the principal as an accomplice, and the trades unions as the real perpetrators of the outrage. He would move the omission of the clause.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE said, the clause, he believed, represented a simple desire to arrive at the truth of a much-vexed question. The noble Lord seemed to think that the trades unions were in no way connected with outrages at Sheffield. But it certainly was remarkable that these outrages should take place in a town known to be more under the control of trades unions than any other in England, and that there had never been a case of outrage upon a workman in Sheffield unless he were in some way obnoxious to the trades unions. He did not charge these outrages upon the general body of workmen; but he believed that some small and secret executive was mainly responsible for them. He thought it would be as well to put the Bill in the fire as to strike out this clause.

LORD CRANWORTH thought there was danger of a great wrong being done to parties falsely accused by witnesses before the Commission of having instigated them to commit an outrage. Such a person could not be convicted of perjury, because the clause enacted that no evidence taken under this Act shall be “admissible against any person in any civil or criminal proceeding whatever.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the indemnity only extended so far as to the acts confessed to by the witness as having been committed by himself. It did not secure him against an action for giving false evidence or against an indictment for perjury.

EARL GREY thought the clause might be made clear by the insertion of a few words. He would suggest the addition of the following words at the end of the clause:—

“Except in the case of a witness who may be accused of having given false evidence before any person conducting an inquiry under this Act.”

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the discussion which had taken place only proved the inconvenience of confounding the general inquiry into the working of trades unions with an inquiry into the particular outrages at Sheffield. The former question was one which ought to be entered upon in the most impartial and philosophical spirit, and it was unwise to appear to prejudge it by connecting it with the Sheffield outrages. He regarded those associations as perfectly legitimate; for workmen had a perfect right to combine with a view to raise the price of their labour, and he believed the result of a fair inquiry would be to show that their operation had been beneficial both to the labouring classes and to the interests of the country at large. The mixing up the Sheffield outrages with the general inquiry would create an impression in the minds of the working classes that the case was prejudiced; and, as the Commissioners were allowed to delegate the local investigation to others, he did not see why that investigation should not be an altogether distinct one.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE, in supporting the clause, observed, that the object was not in any way to prevent working men from entering into associations for the purpose of bargaining with the employers of labour. There was a fear that there were in the unions those who oppressed the working men, compelling them by force to join these associations; and he supported this clause because it tended to protect the free and independent working man.

LORD CRANWORTH moved at the end of clause to add—

"Provided also, that this Section shall not extend to indemnify from criminal Proceedings the actual Perpetrator of any Act of Outrage or other Crime; and that no Person shall be compelled to answer any Question the Answer to which might tend to criminate him as the actual Perpetrator of any such Act of Outrage or Crime."

This proviso was inserted in the original Bill, but had been struck out in the other House; and he would point out that unless it were restored a man who might avow himself to have been the perpetrator of a crime would be indemnified, while others whom he might accuse as instigators of it would be liable to prosecution.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, the object of the inquiry was not to bring persons to justice, but to ascertain the origin of the outrages which had been committed. The proviso having been struck out in the Commons, he was not disposed to accede to its re-introduction; and there was a precedent for giving an indemnity even in the case of murder, for in the prosecution against Charlotte Winsor, the mother of the murdered child, although there was reason to believe that she was a participator in the crime, was allowed to give evidence.

LORD ST. LEONARDS expressed surprise at the warmth displayed by noble Lords opposite in discussing a Bill which had no party bearing. There was no ground for imputing that the Bill unfairly prejudged the question. There was no assertion that any class had committed the Sheffield outrage; but public opinion having charged it upon trades unions, those bodies had manfully come forward, and challenged the strictest inquiry. The inquiry was one of the greatest delicacy, and to stigmatize the Bill as unfair, and that it took things for granted which ought not to be assumed, was, in his opinion, most prejudicial. Nothing could be more important to masters and workmen, and not only to them, but to the whole country, than that the truth should be ascertained, and that could be done in no other way than that which was proposed by the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he could not but consider the Bill unfair. The fact was it was attempted to make use of the Sheffield outrages for the purpose of inquiring into trades unions under unfavourable circumstances, and he regarded it as extremely unfortunate that the most important question affecting the working classes should be approached in a manner eminently unfair.

On Question, That the said Clause (as amended) stand Part of the Bill? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 52; Not-Contents 19: Majority 33.

ALLEGED EXCESSES IN JAMAICA.

QUESTION.

MR. BUXTON said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What steps the Government have taken in fulfilment of the pledges given by them on July 31, 1866—namely, 1. That any grave excesses of severity on the part of any officers, civil, naval, or military, after the suppression of the disturbances in Jamaica in October 1865 should be inquired into, with a view to the punishment of the offenders. 2. That the question of compensating those whose property, according to the Report of the Royal Commission, was "wantonly destroyed," should be referred to the consideration of the Governor of Jamaica. 3. That there should be a revision of the sentences of imprisonment and penal servitude passed upon certain persons on the charge of complicity in the disturbances?

MR. ADDERLEY said, he could assure the hon. Member that the Government had strictly fulfilled all the pledges which they gave to the House in July last. A great deal had been done in anticipation of those pledges, if with an inadequate result, still to the utmost of the power of Her Majesty's Government, in following out the measures taken by their predecessors, during whose tenure of office those lamentable events occurred.

The inadequacy of the result of their measures was, just as much as the insurrection itself, and the excessive severities which accompanied it, attributable to the state of society in Jamaica, and the mutual feelings of hatred engendered there between the black population and the whites. Yet, not only had Her Majesty's Government done all in its power under the three heads referred to by the hon. Gentleman, and tried to redress the deplorable evils which had actually happened, but they had issued regulations which were intended, if possible, to prevent their recurrence, and they were still more intent upon introducing measures for the amelioration of the state of society in Jamaica, to which these sad events were mainly to be ascribed. With respect to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question—namely, what steps had been taken by the Government to institute inquiries into any grave excesses of severity on the part of any officers, civil, naval, or military, after the suppression of the disturbances in Jamaica, in October, 1865—what had occurred on that point was as follows. But, first let him state that, in pursuance of the promise he had made, Papers would be presented by command in the course of a few days hence, giving the House every information on that subject. But with regard to what had been done—on the 30th of July, before these pledges were given, the Earl of Carnarvon issued instructions to Sir John Grant, the Governor of Jamaica, telling him that the Government deemed it a matter of primary importance that a thorough investigation should be made into any such cases as ought to be brought to trial, and requesting him to report immediately on what he had done, and also giving him general instructions that he was to take such measures as he might think best for restoring confidence to the inhabitants of the colony by the assurance that strict and impartial justice would be dealt out to all classes by Her Majesty's Government. On receiving those instructions, Sir John Grant consulted his Attorney General, and they investigated all the evidence taken before the Royal Commissioners. The result was that Provost Marshal Ramsay was brought to trial for murder at the end of October, when the Bill against him was ignored. Then Woodrow was placed on his trial, being held to be the man most clearly guilty of very flagrant misconduct in the flogging of women. He was tried at the same time, by the same court, and with the same result. There were four other cases in which depositions were taken for the purpose of indictment; but when these two bills against Ramsay and Woodrow were ignored, it was not deemed advisable on the part of both the Colonial and Home Governments to proceed further with those other cases then. The Earl of Carnarvon, however, wrote to Sir John Grant that if circumstances should afterwards arise showing that feelings in the colony had calmed down, and there was any chance whatever of getting a fair trial, he was to resume those proceedings. A correspondence also took place between the Earl of Carnarvon and Sir John Grant as to whether those persons might not be brought home to be tried in England, and it was decided between them that it was not wise after the prosecution had been hanging over these men for more than a year, to keep up those deferred and protracted proceedings. It was thought that it would be against the spirit of British criminal jurisprudence to do so; and that, moreover—what was of even more importance—the keeping alive of agitation in the island would probably be fatal to those important measures which Sir John Grant was carrying out for the social improvement and amelioration of the State of the colony. Those persons were therefore dismissed, and nothing further was done in their cases. So much for the civil officers. As to the naval officers, the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) referred to the Admiralty as early as the 18th of June the Report of the Royal Commissioners, and the Admiralty replied on the 5th of July that in their opinion the conduct of the naval officers at Jamaica was in every way approved as far as their service afloat was concerned, but that their service ashore on courts martial was deserving of disapprobation; but, at the same time, considering that in every case they were young and inexperienced officers, and brought suddenly to the discharge of a most difficult duty, and that in the majority of cases the proceedings of the courts martial on which they served were confirmed by their superior officers, it was not considered necessary by the Admiralty to proceed against them. The Admiralty, therefore, sent a despatch to Vice Admiral Sir James Hope, who was in command of the fleet at Jamaica, approving generally the conduct of the officers afloat, but reflecting severely on the conduct of those on shore, and also issuing instructions to guide naval officers in all similar cases which might occur again. With regard next to the military officers, in answer to a letter from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cardwell), dated May 31, the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington), on June 10, informed the Colonial Office that the Commander-in-Chief had sent instructions to General O'Connor directing him to institute immediate inquiry into the two cases of Ensign Cullen and Surgeon Morris. On July 24 the Earl of Carnarvon asked the War Office to state the result, and suggested that these men should be tried by court martial and that officers should be sent out from England to constitute those courts martial, in order to secure perfect fairness and impartiality. General O'Connor approved that suggestion, and officers were sent out by the War Office, with the Deputy Judge Advocate to assist them, and the result was that the two men were tried and both of them acquitted. With regard to the second portion of the hon. Gentleman's question which related to granting compensation for property "wantonly destroyed" during the insurrection, the hon. Gentleman seemed to have misquoted what he (Mr. Adderley) said last year. What he said was not that the Government would take the matter into consideration as to whether compensation should be paid, but that the question was one that should be left to the Government of the colony. It was at first suggested that compensation should be paid out of the Imperial treasury; but that Her Majesty's Government at once declined to do, and the matter was left, as he said it should be, in the hands of the Government of the colony. As to the general question of compensation, all he could inform the House was that no application from either side had yet been made for it. In answer to the last question, he had to state that his noble Friend the Earl of Carnarvon had instructed the Governor, Sir John Grant, to consult the Judge who presided at the trials, to have the notes of trials referred to, and to ascertain whether there were any grounds on which any remission of the sentences passed should take place. The result was that it appeared there were cases tried by Special Commission. Three prisoners had been discharged; two of them who had been found guilty had been executed, and the others had been sentenced to penal servitude and imprisonment for various periods. The sentence upon one of those prisoners, who was convicted of a minor offence, had been remitted to the extent of one-half his term, and that upon Bogle, who had been sentenced to penal servitude for life, had been remitted to ten years' penal servitude. In the other cases there were no grounds for interference.

AGRICULTURAL GANGS — CHILDREN'S EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. POWELL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether instructions have been given or will be given to the Children's Employment Commissioners with a view to the extension of the inquiry beyond "organized agricultural gangs commonly called public gangs" to "private gangs and other branches of agricultural employment," which the Commissioners describe in their Sixth Report (p. xxiv.) as "beyond the scope of their instructions," and whereon they consequently received evidence admitted to be "very limited and only incidental to the main object of their inquiry;" and, whether the Government intend to introduce during this Session a measure dealing with the grave evils disclosed in the recent Report?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that he could not give to the first Question of the hon. Member a decided answer at the present moment, as the matter to which it referred was under consideration. In reply to the second Question, he would observe that he thought it would be better to allow the Report to lie on the table for a little time before he announced what course the Government might be prepared to take with respect to any legislation founded upon it.

MEXICAN BONDHOLDERS.—QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether information has reached him from the British Representative at Mexico that the French authorities, who have assumed the administration of the Custom House at Vera Cruz, have refused to allow the agent to receive the 25 per cent hypothecated to the Mexican Bondholders, and have remitted the funds set apart for them to the Mexican Financial Commission; and, whether he will apply to the French Government for the remittance to London of the 25 per cent now in the hands of the Mexican Financial Commission due to the Bondholders?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that no information of the nature mentioned in the Question of the hon. Gentleman had been received by the Government. The only allusion which he could find to the subject was contained in a letter from an unofficial person, which he had received six weeks ago, in which the writer stated that from what he had heard the French authorities were not inclined to retain possession of the administration of the Custom House at Vera Cruz. As soon as he had received any positive information on the matter he should be ready to communicate it to the hon. Gentleman.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS—REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Second Report of the Commissioners to inquire into the best means of preventing the Pollution of Rivers, which has been received from the Commissioners, will be presented to Parliament?

MR. WALPOLE, in reply, said, the Report relative to the river Calder, in Yorkshire, and the Lea, a tributary of the Thames, was printed and under the consideration of the Commissioners. He understood it would be presented to Parliament in the course of a few weeks.

CASE OF MR. CHURCHWARD.

QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Lord Chancellor has revoked the appointment of Mr. Churchward as a Magistrate at Dover?

MR. WALPOLE: I think, Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman will see the propriety of my forbearing to give a specific answer to his Question, until Her Majesty's pleasure has been made known in reply to the Address which was agreed to a few evenings ago.

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—NEW APPOINTMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to the Statement of the Under Secretary of State for India, that the earliest period at which the India Office could ascertain the course which the Colonial Secretary was likely to pursue with reference to the new appointment in the Straits Settlement was the 18th January, he is aware that those appointments were authoritatively announced in the public papers long antecedent to that date; and, if so, whether he can explain to the House how this occurred? He must beg to explain that it was announced in November last in the newspapers that the new Governor of the Straits Settlements and other officers had been appointed; but in consequence of a Question which he put on the 11th March to the Secretary of State for India, he found that the first time the India Office ascertained the course which the Colonial Secretary would pursue in making the appointments was the 18th January, and he wished to know how it was that the newspapers were enabled to publish the appointments so long before?

MR. ADDERLEY replied, that it assuredly was on the 18th of January that the Colonial Office made the communication in question to the Indian Department. Whether previous information on the subject reached Colonel Ord through the newspapers he was not aware. All he could say was that he could have got no authoritative statement before that date.

ARMY—MEDICAL OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. SYNAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, From what date it is proposed to give the increase of pay to Army Medical Officers; and if, in the new Army Medical Warrant, it is contemplated to change the denomination of, or to give any "brevet rank" to, Assistant Surgeons on completing their tenth year of service?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, the increase of pay of medical officers in the army would commence from the 1st of next month—the beginning of the financial year. As to the second part of the Question, there was no intention to make any change.

CASE OF THE "TORNADO."—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has received Copies of the Depositions of the Crew of the Tornado, sworn before the British Consul at Cadiz on the 23rd February last; and, if so, whether he will lay them upon the table of the House?

LORD STANLEY replied, that he had not received the papers named by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He had, however, telegraphed for them, and when he got them he would lay them on the table.

ARMY—SANITARY COMMITTEE.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE STUCLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, What is the name and date of the appointment of the Civilian Member of the Army Sanitary Committee referred to in Vote 17, Army Estimates; why, with his travelling expenses he is to receive £1,200 per annum; and, why a Medical Officer of the Army cannot perform the duties required from such Civilian Practitioner?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied, that the name of the civilian member of the Army Sanitary Committee was Dr. Sutherland—a name well-known as that of a very eminent man. He was first appointed to serve under the War Department in 1855 by Lord Panmure, who sent him out to make inquiry into the sanitary condition of our soldiers in the Crimea. In 1857 he was again appointed by the same noble Lord a member of the Commission to inquire into the sanitary state of the army, and his appointment to the discharge of the particular duties which he now performed was made by Sir George Cornewall Lewis in 1862. In answer to the second Question, he must observe that his hon. Friend seemed to labour under a mistake at which he could not wonder, because of the somewhat careless mode in which such entries were made in the Estimates. The salary which Dr. Sutherland received for the duties which he now performed was £1,000 a year, but he was a member of a Committee of which the other members were unpaid, but to whom an allowance of £200 a year was given for travelling expenses. The charge, therefore, was one which was not peculiar to Dr. Sutherland. In reply to the last Question, he would simply observe that there might, no doubt, be many medical officers in the army who were quite competent to discharge the duties in question; but Dr. Sutherland was a man of the highest possible reputation, and he doubted whether there was in England a higher authority on sanitary subjects, with which he had years ago been appointed to deal because of his very great eminence, and he thought his hon. Friend would be most unwilling to deprive that gentleman of his position.

ARMY—REWARDS TO MILITARY INVENTORS.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE STUCLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, How he proposes to divide the sum of £22,800 as a reward to Inventors; and, who are the Inventors to be rewarded?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that one of the most important portions of the Vote was the reward which was to be given to Major Palliser for his very valuable services in the application of chilled iron to military purposes. It had not yet, however, been decided what was to be the amount of the award; and he hoped, therefore, that his hon. Friend would excuse him if he did not, for the present, attempt to give a final answer to his Question.

TURKEY—CHOLERA AT CONSTANTINOPLE.—QUESTION.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Report of the Cholera Commissioners at Constantinople will be distributed?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that the Report had not yet been received; but it would be presented as soon as it should have reached the Foreign Office.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—FORTY SHILLING FREEHOLDERS: QUESTION.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether a forty shilling freeholder, residing on his own freehold within a Borough, and paying rates, would not become a Borough Voter, and thereby lose his County qualification under the proposed Reform Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, he would become a borough voter if he dwelt in his own house, and he would then be subject to the regulations of the existing law. But, perhaps, I may remark that such a provision would have only a very inconsiderable operation, because five-sixths of the county voters in boroughs are non-resident.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN: Then he would, of course, lose his county qualification on becoming a borough voter.

TURKEY—CHRISTIAN SUBJECTS OF THE PORTE—CRETE.—QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to lay before the House a Copy of the Despatch dated March 6th, from Lord Lyons to the Foreign Office, giving an account of promises made by the Grand Vizier of reforms in the treatment of Christians in Turkey; and, if he has received any intimation that Russia, France, and Austria have given advice to the Porte to cede Crete to Greece?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply to the first Question of the hon. Member, that on seeing his notice, he had brought down that despatch and it was now upon the table of the House. In answer to the second Question of the hon. Gentleman he had to state that he had been informed that advice of that nature had been given by the French Government, and he understood, although he did not know with absolute certainty, that it would be supported by the Government of Russia, while he was not aware that a similar course would be taken by the Government of Austria.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—QUESTIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the conditions of voting in Boroughs, so far as they are affected by the Bill of the Government, are to be the same for occupiers of the value of £10 and upwards as for occupiers under £10; or, if not, in what respects they differ; whether it is intended by the Bill that the occupying franchise in Boroughs, which now depends upon the occupation of "any house, warehouse, counting house, shop, or other building," is henceforward to depend upon the occupation of dwelling houses exclusively; whether the total number of male occupiers stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech on Monday consisted exclusively of the occupiers of dwelling houses; whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the table their estimates of the numbers of Voters to be enfranchised under the several Clauses of the Bill, together with the data, so far as they think fit, upon which such estimates are framed; and, whether an occupier claiming to be registered under Clause 34, when a composition or other reduced rate on the premises has been duly paid by his landlord, must, in order to be registered, pay the difference between such reduced rate and the rate which would have been chargeable upon him if directly rated?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it will be for the convenience of the House and to the right hon. Gentleman if I group the various inquiries made by him. The first two are, of course, fresh in the recollection of the House. The right hon. Gentleman asks whether the conditions of voting in Boroughs, so far as they are affected by the Bill of the Government, are to be the same for occupiers of the value of £10 and upwards as for occupiers under £10; or, if not, in what respects they differ; and whether it is intended by the Bill that the occupying franchise in Boroughs, which now depends upon the occupation of "any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building," is henceforward to depend upon the occupation of dwelling-houses exclusively. It appears to me that these two Questions, which really refer to the same point almost, are framed rather under some misapprehension of the character of the measure we have introduced. That measure is entirely a supplementary measure; and it does not at all interfere with any privileges or conditions under the Act of 1832. Therefore, the conditions for voters in boroughs are not the same for voters of the value of £10 and upwards as for occupiers under £10. We follow precedent in that respect. The qualification of residence under the existing law is in round numbers a residence of one year; and the qualification for the new householders proposed to be enfranchised is to be a residence of two years. There is that difference at once. We follow in that precisely the precedent set in the Bill of 1854, brought in by Lord John Russell under Lord Aberdeen's Administration, of which Government the right hon. Gentleman was a distinguished Member. That Bill proposed a considerable reduction in the amount of the borough qualification. It was proposed to reduce to a £6 rental. In consequence of that reduction the Government of Lord Aberdeen proposed a residence of two years as requisite to the qualification. That is the same period of residence as we propose, without connecting it with a £6 rental. There was a proviso introduced into that measure that the rights and privileges under the Act of 1832 should not be impugned or affected by that arrangement; and there was a saving clause which I hope in more effective language is contained in the present measure—I think it is Clause 40—which entirely preserves all the privileges under the Act of 1832. So far as the present measure of the Government is concerned, that Act of 1832 is preserved in its operation without the slightest interference. I think that is an answer to the first Question. Then the right hon. Gentleman has asked whether it is intended that the occupying franchise in boroughs which now depends upon the occupation of "any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building" is henceforward to depend upon the occupation of dwelling-houses exclusively. My previous answer to a certain degree applies to this Question; because, of course, the qualification of a householder under the new franchise is limited to the possession of a house. Any person who occupies a warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building, and being qualified under the present law, would enjoy his franchise in that respect. The reason why we have limited franchise in the Bill to the occupation of dwelling-houses is because there are no warehouses, counting-houses, and scarcely shops at a rating which the Bill particularly deals with. As for other buildings, the including them as elements of qualification would probably lead to considerable fraud. Therefore, we have resolved that it should be a bond fide household qualification. The third inquiry of the right hon. Gentleman is, whether the total number of male occupiers stated by me in my speech last Monday consists exclusively of the occupiers of dwelling-houses. No. That is the number of occupations, including, of course, all the enfranchised qualified by the possession of warehouses, counting-houses, and other buildings under the existing law. The right hon. Gentleman inquires whether the Government will lay on the table their estimates of the number of Voters to be enfranchised under the several Clauses of the Bill. On Saturday morning, I have no doubt that every hon. Gentleman will have in his hands the most complete information of the amount of the inhabited houses in every Borough, and every possible detail connected with that most important branch of the subject. I believe that tomorrow, if not already distributed, there will be Returns relating to the amounts in respect to the less important franchises, the savings banks, and education franchises. I am not clear whether there are any official Returns as to the amount of franchises arising from property in the funds. It would hardly be convenient to lay on the table an official Return in reference thereto, and it is no great matter if such a Return is not laid on the table. The House, I will assume, will accept the figures on the authority of my statement; but, with regard to the number of voters which may be produced by direct taxation, it is quite impossible for us to give any formal statement to the House. It would take a considerable time to make it out; and even if we had the time, the expense would be so great, that we should hesitate before authorizing the preparation of the Return. There is before the House a variety of documents of considerable importance, which, though they do not form materials from which an estimate could be framed, are of great value and amplitude, and upon which hon. Gentlemen will find it not difficult to arrive at sufficiently satisfactory conclusions. With respect to the question whether an occupier claiming to be registered under Clause 34, when a composition or other reduced rate on the premises has been duly paid by his landlord, must, in order to be registered, pay the difference between such reduced rate and the rate which would have been chargeable upon him if directly rated, I have to state that he certainly would be called on, if he claimed the right to be registered, to pay the same rates as his neighbour. It appears to me that it would be a great injustice to confer upon him a privilege while he was exempted from an accompanying condition to which all other claimants were subjected.

MR. GLADSTONE: There is one point on which, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman might make his answer more complete, if he will reply to the question I am about to put. I think, under the present law which relates to £10 householders exclusively, there has been a certain ruling that part of a house will be construed as a whole house; will that law apply to householders under £10, or in that case must the entire house be occupied?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Nothing in the Bill applies to houses under £10 which is not definitely and distinctly stated; but, of course, everything relating to £10 and upwards remains as before.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a satisfactory settlement has taken place of the question of the evacuation of the fortresses in Servia by the Turkish troops; and whether, in the course of the negotiations, any guarantee has been entered into by any of the great Powers for securing the suzerainty of the Porte over Servia, farther than may be at present existing under the Treaty of Paris of 1856, or by any other diplomatic or treaty obligations.

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I have received information within the last few days to the effect that the Prince of Servia had proceeded to Constantinople for the purpose of ratifying the arrangement come to between him and the Porte. Of course, difficulties of detail may arise; but I have no reason to suppose that the arrangement will not be satisfactorily completed. With regard to the second part of the Question of the hon. Member, as to whether any guarantee has been entered into by any of the great Powers for securing the suzerainty of the Porte over Servia, I am not aware that any such guarantee has been given, or is about to be entered into by any of the great Powers. I am quite sure that under the circumstances none has been or will be undertaken by this country.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE, SCOTLAND.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill for the Reform of the Representation in Scotland in the present Session; and, if so, when the Bill will be laid upon the table; and whether the Bill will include any additions to the representatives of that part of the kingdom?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir, it is our intention after the holidays to introduce a Bill for the Reform of the Representation of the People in Scotland, and we do contemplate an increase of its representatives.

(IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, after the Answer of the right hon. Gentleman to the Question put in relation to Scotland, perhaps I may be allowed to ask, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to Reform the Representation of the People in Ireland; and, if so, when?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, it is also our intention to bring in a Bill to amend the representation of the people in Ireland.

RAILWAY DEBENTURES.—QUESTION.

MR. EDWARDS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been called to the serious financial embarrassments in which many of the Railway Companies of this Country are at present involved in consequence of the recent decision as to the validity of Debentures as a security; whether any applications have been made to the Government for relief, and with what result; and, whether he will state to the House the nature of any such application, the extent of the relief sought, and the terms proposed by the Company or Companies who have applied for such relief?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am quite sure, Sir, it is impossible for any person who fills the place I now occupy not to have given long and most anxious consideration to the circumstances to which the Question of the hon. Gentleman refers. He inquires whether any application has been made to the Government for relief to railways, and especially with reference to debentures. Well, Sir, no doubt applications have been made to the Government for the consideration of the very perplexed circumstances which exist as regards that class of property; but when the hon. Gentleman asks what has been the result of those applications, and whether I will state to the House their nature, the extent of the relief sought, and the terms proposed by the company or companies who have applied for such relief, certainly I am bound to say, that at the present moment Her Majesty's Government have entered into no engagements whatever with any company. I am sure he will feel that communications of this kind are essentially confidential, and it would not become me to announce the names of those companies who have applied, especially as the applications have not been conceded, or to refer at all to the terms proposed to the Government by those companies that sought for relief.

BRITISH COLUMBIA AND VANCOUVER'S ISLANDS.—CHURCH IN THE COLONIES.

QUESTIONS.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies Whether he can lay upon the table Papers relating to the Union of British Columbia and Vancouver Island, and the subsequent condition of the united Colonies; and, any Correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Governor of Natal, or the Governors of other Colonies, upon the subject of the position of the Church of England in Natal, and in other Colonies?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that two Papers relating to British Columbia had been laid upon the table the other day, and the Government would be prepared to communicate to the House without delay any further information they might receive with respect to that colony and Vancouver Island. In answer to the second Question of the right hon. Gentleman, he had to state that certain Papers which had been recently moved for in the House of Lords would be laid before the House of Commons; and when the further communications on the subject were completed they would also be presented.

TENANTS IMPROVEMENTS (IRELAND)
BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. BRYAN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When he really intends to proceed with the Second Reading of the Tenants Improvements (Ireland) Bill?

LORD NAAS: I am exceedingly sorry, Sir, that it is not in my power to proceed with that Bill immediately. I will fix Monday week, when I really hope to be able to bring it on.

THE MUTINY BILL—FLOGGING IN THE ARMY.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. OTWAY,

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I stated the other evening that I would give the most ample notice of the course I intend to take on this subject. I wish, with the utmost fairness, to give the hon. Gentleman and those who agreed with him in opinion public notice when, after the second reading, I would take the Committee. I thought I had given due notice of the Committee by placing it on the Orders; but since coming into the House I have learned that it is considered by some that I have not fully redeemed my pledge; but I desire to do so, and therefore will postpone the Committee until to-morrow night.

MR. HORSMAN: Will Supply not be taken to-morrow night? Perhaps the right hon. Baronet will not bring on the Committee on the Mutiny Bill after a tolerably early hour.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: There is no intention whatever to interfere with the usual arrangement with regard to Supply. Perhaps the best course will be not to take the Mutiny Bill till after eleven o'clock.

MR. AYRTON: Will the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for War be good enough to state the intention of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief to give effect to the Resolution of the House relative to flogging, before moving the House into Committee on the Mutiny Bill?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I can only say that neither now nor at any future time can I make any communication on the part of His Royal Highness which I am not authorized by His Royal Highness to make.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he thought the Secretary of State for War had not quite understood the meaning of the Question put on the other side—whether, on account of the division which took place the other evening, it was his intention to make any communication to the House, or on his own part to the Commander-in-Chief?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: The only answer I can give to the Question of the hon. Member is that any communication I think it right to make to the House on this subject I will make at the proper time.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, whether he will consent to put off the Mutiny Bill until some night next week, instead of taking it to-morrow night at eleven o'clock? The Bill would give rise to a long discussion, and the Question could scarcely be fully argued at so late an hour.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I wish to act in this matter with the most perfect fairness. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are aware that the Mutiny Bill must be passed by the 27th of next month, and that therefore, looking at the state of public business, no time is to be lost in introducing it. However, I will proceed with the Bill on any day which may be agreeable to hon. Members; but I think that the best course to take will be to allow the arrangement I have made for to-morrow night to stand, when, if it is found to be inconvenient to take it that night, some evening may be named that will suit the wishes of hon. Gentlemen.

MR. OTWAY said, he would beg to remark that the right hon. Baronet had come down to the House on the night following the division of the House on the question of Corporal Punishment in the Army, and had announced that he intended to disregard the Resolution, inasmuch as it had only been carried by a majority of 1. The right hon. Gentleman had challenged the supporters of the Resolution to raise the issue again when the Mutiny Bill was discussed; and therefore every opportunity should be given to hon. Members for discussing the question when it was again brought before them. Now, as it was impossible that such an important question could be properly argued at the late hour proposed for to-morrow, he thought it would be better if the right hon. Gentleman would at once name some night in the next week for bringing on the subject.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I need scarcely remind the hon. Member that the attention of the House on Monday night is likely to be fully occupied, and that it is impossible to say how long the debate on the Reform Bill is likely to last. I can only repeat that, in my opinion, it will be better to allow the arrangement I have made with regard to to-morrow to stand.

MR. HORSMAN said, he must bear testimony to the fairness with which the right hon. Gentleman had acted in regard to this matter. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, the right hon. Gentleman must confine himself to the Question he proposed to put.

MR. HORSMAN said, he merely wished to say as much as would render his question intelligible. The question he wished to put to the right hon. Baronet was, whether, as the question which was to be raised to-morrow night was likely to give rise to a discussion which would last three or four hours, it would not be better if hon. Members were saved the trouble of attending, by one day next week being named for bringing the subject before the House?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he must decline to accede to the proposal.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—PARTS OF LINDSEY.

QUESTION.

MR. BANKS STANHOPE said, he wished to put a Question to Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer relating to the omission of Parts of Lindsey from the Schedule of the Reform Bill owing to a typographical error, and would beg to ask, Whether it would be supplied in Committee?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had received a communication from his hon. Friend on this subject, pointing out the inaccuracy, with which he had not been previously acquainted. Perhaps the best explanation he could give would be to produce the original passage as sent to the printer on the authority of a gentleman known by the House, and whose word would be at once taken as a voucher for the truth of the statement—he meant Mr. Grieve, who draughted the Bill. There would be no objection to make the correction when an opportunity offered.

NAVY PROMOTION.—RESOLUTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY, who had given notice to call the attention of the House to one of the recent promotions made by the present Board of Admiralty; and to move—

"That the promotion by the First Lord of the Admiralty of a junior Lieutenant in the Navy, without any special or distinguished service, over the heads of hundreds of meritorious Lieutenants senior to him in the Service, is prejudicial to the public interest," said: I must claim the kind indulgence of the House, feeling that I am touching on rather delicate ground, and that this subject bears somewhat of an invidious and personal character. I can only say that nobody regrets more than I do the necessity which compels me to bring it forward; and nothing would have induced me to do it had I not felt that it is a matter which affects so vitally the best interests of the service, and is one which strikes at the root of all discipline, that having been myself a naval officer I thought that I should not be doing my duty were I to allow a promotion of so unusual and unprecedented a character, which has justly caused so much discontent throughout the service, to pass by unnoticed and unchallenged. It will be, Sir, in the recollection of the House, that about two weeks ago I asked the late First Lord of the Admiralty a Question relating to this matter. I asked him if it was true that a lieutenant, whose commission as lieutenant dated from May 22, 1861, had been promoted over the heads of 370 of his seniors; and, if so, what special grounds could be assigned for so unusual a proceeding? It is, Sir, because the answer I then received was far from satisfactory, and tended rather to increase the glaring anomalies of this promotion, and showed on what a dangerous and slippery basis Admiralty promotions rest, that I have founded this Motion. The right hon. Baronet then informed me that it was quite true this promotion had taken place; but that the officer referred to was of unimpeachable character and professional reputation, and had served from five to six years at sea. Now, Sir, I have no wish either to impeach this officer's professional character or reputation, more especially so as I believe him from personal knowledge to be a very good officer, nor do I wish to blame him in the slightest degree; but what I want to point out to the House is this, that he had no special qualification whatever to justify his promotion over so many of his seniors, nor had he ever been placed in any position in which he could have shown any. How the First Lord could have stated that he had served from five to six years at sea, I am totally at a loss to conceive; as by the fairest calculation, giving him the benefit of a few doubtful days, I find that at the outside he could only have served at sea for the brief space of four years and one month. I am sure that the right hon. Baronet had no wish to mislead or give a wrong impression to the House, and that what he then stated he firmly believed, and that it must have been based on some erroneous information he had received. I sincerely trust that if he replies to this Motion he will also be able to state that he was labouring under a wrong impression when he made this promotion, and had at that time no idea of what a glaring injustice he was perpetrating. Perhaps, Sir, before I go further, I had better state to the House on what grounds I consider this promotion most unfair and unjust. I find, Sir, that this officer, having no special qualification whatever, has been promoted over the heads of 350 lieutenants who had served at sea for a longer period than he had, and all of whom had every right to expect to be made commanders before him; that he has been promoted over 128 first lieutenants of ships in commission; over sixty gunnery lieutenants; over forty lieutenants in command of vessels; over two lieutenants who had received the Beaufort testimonial for their special qualifications on passing at the naval college; over the senior lieutenants of the ten different stations; and lastly, over a very large number of officers who have been specially recommended for their promotion by their admirals and captains. I hope that this statement, showing so clearly what a monstrous and glaring injustice has been done, is of itself a sufficient excuse for my having brought it forward. The figures which I have given I believe to be strictly accurate; and in order to render them so, I have gone most carefully over each name on the Navy List, and deducted all those who, from age and other causes, could not reasonably expect their promotion, and could not be termed effective officers. The Duke of Somerset, in his evidence before the Select Committee on Naval Promotion and Retirement in 1863, stated that he considered the dead-weight of the lieutenants' list to be about 100, and as I have deducted no less than 106, I hope the right hon. Baronet will not think that I have taken any unfair advantage of him. In the answer to my question the right hon. Baronet went on to say that it was for the benefit of the service to promote a certain number of young officers, and that promotions in the navy always are, and always must be, by selection. Now, Sir, I entirely agree with him that it is most beneficial to the service that young officers should be promoted, and young blood be occasionally infused into the service; but I apprehend that nobody can deny that if young officers are selected and promoted over the heads of so many of their seniors, it should be only for recognised ability and merit, and not for personal feeling and political influence. Promotion by selection has been so well described in the Report of the Select Committee on Navy, Army, and Ordnance Estimates in 1848, that I will, with the permission of the House, read a short extract from it—

“This power of selection is, indeed, a trust which must be exercised with justice and discrimination. The duty is invidious; but the faithful performance of it will ensure the constant promotion of officers in the prime of life to the highest rank in their profession. The public will be the gainers; great advantage will still be given to seniority; no injustice will be done if good service and approved merit be the rules which shall guide the selection, and the greatest reward will be held out to signal gallantry and to exemplary conduct.”

I take it, Sir, that there can be no doubt that promotion by selection ought and must be based on seniority, except in cases of special merit and recognised ability. If you merely say that promotion is by selection, the floodgates are at once open to all manner of interest and jobbery. Admiral Elliot, in his evidence before the Select Committee, showed very clearly that the service never complains of selection provided it is for conspicuous ability and merit.

“I think that the service would admit at once the great advantage of having some young officers coming forward; and if only a portion of the promotions was left to selection, I do not think that any branch of the service would complain, provided that the selections were for recognised ability and merit.”

I hope it will not be thought that I am in favour of a pure seniority system; for, on the contrary, so strong am I in favour of promotion by selection based on seniority that, instead of wishing it done away with, I am inclined to go rather to the other extreme; and I do not think sufficient officers are promoted by selection for their special abilities and zealous conduct. The great advantages of such a system none who have seen the working of it can deny; and, Sir, it is one of the happiest contrasts that I know of to witness the difference displayed by our first and gunnery lieutenant in zeal and energy and that shown by officers of foreign navies, in which the service is based on the pure seniority system. On the one hand officers feel, or rather hope, that the eye of the Admiralty is upon them, and that their promotion is, to a great extent, dependant on their own individual exertion and energy; whilst, on the other hand, on the pure seniority system they know that they are certain of their promotion without any special exertion on their part, and have therefore no inducement to work, and, to make use of a naval phrase, "they have only to sit down and allow the wind to blow them along," and their reward is certain. I hope, Sir, that the day is far distant when we shall have recourse to this system; but, undoubtedly, unless the selections are ruled with fairness and impartiality, we shall be obliged to adopt it. The right hon. Baronet, in his answer to me the other night, implied that, having been a naval officer, I should not have asked such a question; but, Sir, I apprehend that this is the very reason why I should have done so. I naturally know the feelings and the sentiments of the rank to which I lately belonged, and I know only too well that this promotion has given rise to an amount of ill-feeling, discontent, irritation, and grumbling which it will take many years to obliterate. Can anything more heartrending or distressing be pictured than the sight of a zealous, arduous, and energetic lieutenant—one who has striven for a long number of years to earn his promotion, perhaps as first lieutenant, perhaps as gunnery lieutenant, or perhaps in command of vessels, on hearing of such an event. He naturally says to himself, What is the use of my continuing to devote my life to the Service in the manner in which I have been working, when an officer who is so much my junior, who has never been a first or gunnery lieutenant, is promoted before me? Is not such an event sufficient of itself to dishearten him for ever, and to make him long to leave a Service in which his claims for promotion, founded as they are on professional study, perseverance, and ability, pursued in a path of honour and integrity, are put on one side, and the prize of the profession is handed over to social and political interest? Many years ago it was notorious that such a state of things existed in the most glaring shape; but I am happy to say that wise administrators, aided by public opinion and the press, have, to a great extent, put an end to these unjust promotions. I have no hesitation, however, in saying that the right hon. Baronet has, with one stroke of his pen, succeeded in upsetting the whole of this policy, especially that pursued by the Duke of Somerset. He has succeeded, in the short space of six months, in resuscitating that feeling of grumbling which used to exist and be so rife in the Service; but which the Duke of Somerset, by distributing his patronage and promotions with a fair and impartial hand, succeeded in putting a stop to. Whatever may be said as to the Duke's policy in regard to the material of the navy, I am certain that no First Lord of the Admiralty ever bestowed his patronage with so fair and impartial a hand, or succeeded in giving so much content and satisfaction amongst all classes and branches of the Service. It is self-evident, from the Report of the Select Committee on Navy Promotion, that they abstained from making any recommendations or suggestions as to the manner in which officers should be promoted, solely on the ground that the system, as carried out by the Duke of Somerset, was fair and impartial, for in the Report they express themselves in the following manner:—

"XII. Your Committee have already stated that the Naval Officers are generally in favour of the principle of selection as applicable to the promotion of Lieutenants to be Commanders, and Commanders to be Captains. The Committee think that the system as worked by the Admiralty is fair. It was thus described by the Duke of Somerset: 'With regard to promotions made at the Admiralty, I go over the lists with the services of the officers; and I see also what the recommendations of the officers in command of the different stations have been; I very often receive a private letter from the Admirals in command, pointing out such and such officers as being very efficient and zealous, and who are deserving of promotion, and whose promotion would be for the good of the service. We then take an opportunity to put them, if we can, into the next batch; but, at the same time, we take them, to a certain extent, from each station, so that the officers who are serving at a distance (serving, perhaps, in the Pacific) may not see the promotion going to some other station, and not getting themselves a little share of it. We try to divide the promotions between the different stations.' The Duke of Somerset has further described in his evidence, the precautions now taken to prevent officers from being unduly passed over. While this practice continues, it may reasonably be expected that deserving officers will not be neglected, and distinguished merit will meet with its reward. Your Committee can see no reason, therefore, for recommending an alteration in the system of selection as now applied to the lower ranks; and, when well administered, your Committee entirely agree with the Report of the Commissioners on Naval and Military Inquiry, that 'it offers the best security which could be desired for reinforcing and reanimating the Navy to any extent which the circumstances of the country might, on an emergency, render necessary.'"

I have endeavoured to show to the House that this system of fairness and impartiality on which the Committee relied has broken down, and I would now ask, Sir, if in the opinion of the House some alteration should not be made, or, at any rate, some protest be entered against such an unhappy state of things. In the French navy there is a Conseil d'Avancement, whose duty it is, under certain rules, which are well established, to recommend officers for promotion; but I fear until a radical change is made in the constitution of the Admiralty, and permanent Heads of Departments are appointed, it would be useless to adopt this plan. The right hon. Baronet said the other night, that this promotion was one of a batch of five, and that he was unwilling to give an explanation about a single one without giving his reasons for the whole of these promotions. Sir, I believe that four of these promotions were very fair and good promotions; but is it any reason that because a judge had made four just decisions, that he should make one unjust one? The right hon. Baronet would have us believe that four blacks make one white. I hope the House will not be deceived by a doctrine so new and unprecedented, and that they will remember that it is only about one of these promotions that I take. I am informed that it is intended to justify this promotion on the ground that a similar one was made by the Duke of Somerset. Sir, I will now say that the case they refer to was under totally different circumstances, and was an act of justice to an officer who was suffering from an Admiralty order which unintentionally had a retrospective action. But, Sir, in no case can it be shown that, even if this had been bad, that it was any excuse for its being renewed. I will not, Sir, any more take up the time of the House; but will only say that I trust the House, and the right hon. Baronet, will not think that I have brought this forward in any party or factious spirit, or with any ill will to the right hon. Baronet. I cannot believe that so good an administrator could have been guilty of so flagrant an act of injustice if he had known at the time the real state of the case. I sincerely trust that the right hon. Baronet will be able to show that this was really the state of the case, and that he had no intention of bringing back the melancholy reminiscences of former days, when personal and political influence held such a withering sway over true ability and zeal. I have only to thank the House for the kindness with which they have heard me.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the promotion by the First Lord of the Admiralty of a junior Lieutenant in the Navy without any special or distinguished service, over the heads of hundreds of meritorious Lieutenants senior to him in the Service, is prejudicial to the public interest,"—(Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.)

—instead thereof.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, the hon. Gentleman having thought it his duty to follow up the Question he asked on a former evening by a proceeding of a more formal character, I have to say that I am perfectly willing to meet it. I am bound to accept, and I do accept, the statement just made by the hon. Gentleman—that he has not brought this Question forward in a party spirit, or with a factious motive. I am further bound to believe that the hon. Gentleman is influenced solely and entirely by patriotic zeal for the interest of the naval service. Assuming that to be the case, I am only sorry the patriotic zeal of the hon. Gentleman did not equally influence him a very short time ago. The charge involved in this case is that I have promoted a lieutenant of five years and eight months' service to the rank of commander, that lieutenant being—I do not know whether this is a part of the charge—a son of the Earl of Hardwicke. [Mr. HANBURY-TRACY: I did not mention names.] Well, that is an omission which I think I ought to supply. I have to call the attention of the House and the hon. Gentleman to these facts:—The service of Lieutenant Yorke, as the hon. Gentleman has told us, was five years and eight months. The Duke of Somerset, when First Lord of the Admiralty, promoted a son of Sir James Graham from the rank of lieutenant to that of commander on five years and two months' service. He promoted a son of Sir Charles Wood, now Lord Halifax, from the rank of lieutenant to that of commander, on five years and two months' service. He promoted Lieutenant Fitzclarence, son of the Earl of Munster, from the rank of lieutenant to that of commander, on four years and eleven months' service. Therefore, whatever may have been the iniquity of my promotion of Lieutenant Yorke, in every possible respect those three promotions of the Duke of Somerset are worse. The services of the gentlemen promoted were shorter; and those lieutenants had no peculiar distinction beyond that which is a common one. I believe in the cases of Lieutenant Wood and Lieutenant Graham—I know nothing of Lieutenant Fitzclarence—the officers were gentlemen of unexceptionable character and good service. But, if the promotion of Lieutenant Yorke be—as the hon. Gentleman says—entirely unjust and unwarrantable, I wish to know why the promotions of those three officers, who had not seen such long service, was not also entirely unjust and unwarrantable? Sir, do not let me be mistaken. I do not complain that no Member of this side of the House should have risen to object to the promotions of the son of Sir James Graham and the son of Sir Charles Wood. Provided that their characters were good and their services honourable, as I believe to have been the case, I think it was desirable that young blood should have been introduced into the higher ranks of the navy, and, accordingly, that young officers should have been promoted. I am not the man to say that the long public services of Sir Charles Wood and Sir James Graham should have been disregarded; neither do I wish to make the least attack on those promotions. The hon. Gentleman has paid a tribute to the spirit in which the Duke of Somerset conducted his promotions. I believe, notwithstanding the cases which I have mentioned to the House, the noble Duke was guided by what he considered to be the right principle. I never heard the Duke of Somerset's promotions complained of but on one ground—namely, that he did not make a sufficient number of promotions of this kind. The fault I have found with his promotions was that in promoting lieutenants he was guided more by the principle of seniority in the service than the interest of the navy demanded. I will not appeal to gallant Gentlemen behind me, because, from the turn this case has taken, I feel that what they might say might be attributed to party feeling; but I see a gallant Admiral on the other side (Admiral Erskine), and I ask him whether it is not perfectly true that young blood should be introduced into the higher ranks of the navy. Gentlemen are treading on dangerous ground when they are undertaking to draw a distinction between one young officer of good character and another; and I think I have reason to complain of the manner in which this promotion of Lieutenant Yorke has been brought forward for animadversion. The hon. Gentleman alluded to other promotions which I had made on the same day when I promoted Lieutenant Yorke; and he said that four honest promotions could not counterbalance this one. Will the House allow me to mention the circumstances. I was called on to promote four lieutenants? As a young officer of good character I promoted Lieutenant Yorke, but my next promotion was Lieutenant Fitzmaurice, with whom I had no acquaintance. I am not aware that I ever saw him in my life; but he had been selected for promotion by the Duke of Somerset. I believe he was deserving of it; but owing to the change of Government, his promotion did not take place, and I thought it would be a great hardship if he were deprived of it by that circumstance. As to the other three gentlemen, I do not know that I can recollect their names or where they came from; but I dived into the records of the Admiralty, and found men of the highest standing and reputation. All of them had at least ten or eleven years' service, and I do not believe that any officer in the navy will say that there could have been better or fairer promotions. Since then I have had the honour of making three or four more promotions, and I think the hon. Gentleman will exert himself in vain to find fault with them. In the terms of his notice, the hon. Gentleman states that the promotion of Lieutenant Yorke was made over the heads of hundreds of meritorious officers seniors to him in the service. So was the promotion of Lieutenant Graham; so was the promotion of Lieutenant Wood; so was the promotion of Lieutenant Fitzclarence. But that statement of itself is not what I complain of. What I complain of is that the hon. Gentleman, who was a naval officer, and knows how these things are regulated [A laugh], should use language calculated to lead to an erroneous impression. I think hon. Gentlemen will do better if they restrain their mirth till they hear what I am about to say. The public are not aware of the fact, but the hon. Gentleman is aware of the fact, that in every one of those cases of promotion numbers of meritorious lieutenants must be passed over. In the case of those three officers whom I selected for their service and their merits, and to whose selection the hon. Gentleman makes no objection, a number of meritorious officers were passed over. The state of the navy is such—the stag-nation in promotion is such—that it is impossible for all the lieutenants to look forward to obtaining the position of commander. It was in consequence of that, that the Duke of Somerset, only a year ago, introduced a new regulation making provision for the retirement of lieutenants after a certain age, and under certain circumstances. The language of the hon. Gentleman would really imply that every one of those meritorious lieutenants, of whom he states there are hundreds, might have been promoted to the rank of commander; but he knows they never could have been, however carefully the seniority system might have been carried out by the Duke of Somerset or any other First Lord. I have no further answer to make to the hon. Member, and can only add, as the case has been brought forward, that I am not in the least ashamed of any one of the promotions that I have made.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, it had not been his intention to take any part in that discussion; but as the Secretary of State for War had appealed to him, he must express his concurrence in the opinion stated by the right hon. Gentleman that promotion should not always be by seniority in the navy. Such a system would produce a stagnation in the service; it would not give them the best men, and, moreover, it would remove all responsibility from the heads of those who ought to bear it. One of the advantages of selection was that it admitted of the most searching inquiry into those promotions, and also imposed the heaviest responsibility on the person intrusted with them. He feared, however, that he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman as to the power by which that patronage ought to be exercised. Several years ago the right hon. Gentleman expressed an opinion that promotions given by flag officers to officers serving under them, which were called “haul down promotions,” ought to be placed in the hands of the First Lord of the Admiralty. The right hon. Gentleman had also expressed the opinion that “Board promotions,” which were given for special acts of good conduct by the representation of the Board, should likewise cease and be vested in the First Lord. He could not think that the possessor of political power must necessarily be the best judge of professional merits; and of all the functions of the Board of Admiralty, that of recommending officers for promotion on account of special services was one which it was best fitted to exercise. As to the promotions made by flag officers he was very much of the opinion of the late Duke of Wellington, who, writing from Portugal in 1810, complained that he had not the power of making even a corporal, and declared that it was impossible the system then pursued could last; that it was absolutely necessary for the discipline of the army, and to stimulate men when under danger, that he should be intrusted with the power of promotion, and expressed a wish to see adopted in that service a practice that would be in accordance with the usage of the British navy. There never was a wiser sentence written than that. The right hon. Baronet opposite, it was only fair to say, had shown no indisposition while at the Admiralty to recognise the services of officers who had received their promotion in the precise way that he had deprecated. During his term of office he had employed three flag officers—namely, first, Sir James Hope, one of the most distinguished officers in the navy; secondly, an officer whose appointment to the command of the Channel squadron everybody approved, Sir Charles Fremantle; and a third, whose selection might not command such general satisfaction, was himself. For the last he had always felt grateful to the right hon. Baronet. All those three officers had been promoted as flag lieutenants by the admiral under whom they had acted. If these promotions by commanders were more frequently allowed, they would hear very little of discontent in the navy.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that if the right hon. Gentleman opposite had intended to justify what he had done in these cases by reference to the acts of his predecessors, he ought to have given them some notice that he meant to do so. In the case of Lieutenant Wood he was then able to offer a satisfactory answer to the right hon. Gentleman. That officer was a flag lieutenant to Admiral Sir Baldwin Walker; and it was an old rule that on striking his flag an admiral was entitled to a promotion for his flag lieutenant. That rule was felt to be open to objection. It was therefore laid down in 1864 by the Duke of Somerset, that no flag lieutenant should be promoted unless he had previously served three years. Within a few weeks of this order, Admiral Walker struck his flag, and applied for promotion for Lieutenant Wood. It turned out that the latter officer had only served two years which reckoned as sea service, and two years as flag lieutenant, and did not come quite within the rule thus laid down by the Board. It was thought rather hard that the rule should act retrospectively in his case, and accordingly he was appointed to serve in the Excellent for one year, in that way making up the prescribed time for obtaining his promotion. He had no doubt that some similar explanation might be made in the two other cases to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred as having occurred during his predecessor's tenure of office, had notice been given that they would be mentioned. He hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Motion, but rest satisfied with the discussion that had taken place.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, that Captain Fitzclarence had been flag lieutenant to Admiral Smart, who had been commander of the fleet. He had no desire to claim a monopoly of virtue for a Whig Board of Admiralty; but thought that, however satisfactory to the House might have been the reply of the right hon. Baronet in a party point of view, alleging as he did that he had made these promotions in the same way his predecessors had done, it would scarcely be equally satisfactory to the naval profession.

MR. AYRTON said, that having served on the Committee upon Naval Promotion and Retirement for a Session, he found that the greatest difficulties stood in the way of a class of officers on whom the wellbeing of the service much depended obtaining employment — namely, those who were promoted from the rank of lieutenant to that of commander. He had never heard anything more distressing than the statements made by officers in the navy as to the course they had been compelled to take for the purpose of obtaining their promotion, which justice had denied them on their merits. One officer said he matriculated at one of the Universities to obtain a degree, in order that he might bring himself to the notice of the Admiralty; and another officer owed his promotion to the simple fact that he could speak French. He (Mr. Ayrton) put the following question to the Duke of Somerset:—

“Has the practice been entirely given up of promoting officers from the rank of lieutenant to commander for the gratification of Lords of the Admiralty and other persons of influence?”

The Duke of Somerset's answer was—

“I think so. We have now a printed form, which we send back, telling the people that they are not to interfere, and they are enabled to explain that the Admiralty do not intend to attend to their explanation.”

The principle, in short, which had been laid down by the Duke of Somerset was that of seniority, qualified by the passing over of those at the head of the list, who, for one reason or another, were not considered proper objects of promotion, at the same time supplementing the list by choosing officers who had special recommendations in their favour which could be quoted as sufficient reasons for their selection. That was a principle which the Committee had accepted, and it had been clearly shown that whatever might have been the abuses in the navy in former times they had been abandoned by the Duke of Somerset, and that he had put the administration of its affairs on a better footing. If the present question had been brought forward as a mere party question, he for one should have abstained from entering into the discussion. Such, however, was not the case, and when he found the right hon. Gentleman, the late First Lord of the Admiralty, arrogating to himself the right of making every fifth promotion in the navy according to his own will and pleasure, and irrespective of any of those special qualifications on which the Duke of Somerset had insisted, he could not refrain from protesting against such a system. The right hon. Gentleman had, indeed, informed the House that Lieutenant Yorke was the son of a noble Lord, and that he had behaved very properly in the navy. Well, nobody supposed that the right hon. Gentleman would have put a person who had been a disgrace to the service over everybody else; but he should like to know what were the special recommendations from the Admiral on the station, or otherwise, which justified Lieutenant Yorke being placed over other officers on the ground of superior merit? If any such grounds were adduced he was sure his hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy) would be delighted to accept the statement as satisfactory, and to withdraw his Motion. The only grounds advanced by the right hon. Gentleman, however, for the appointment was that Lieutenant Yorke was the son of a noble Lord, and a political friend of his own, while he laid down, as he had said before, the doctrine that having made four ordinary promotions he was entitled to make every fifth promotion without regard to seniority. [SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I laid down no such doctrine.] The right hon.

Gentleman had done worse; he had carried that doctrine out in practice. He must know that it was of the utmost importance that the First Lord of the Admiralty should set in that respect a good example. There could be no doubt that the tone of the promotions throughout the whole service—and the admirals had considerable patronage—must be greatly affected by any course which the head of it might think proper to pursue. He protested against the doctrine that promotion in the navy was to be regulated by personal friendship or political considerations. The instance in question was one he could not help thinking of a most pernicious character. It showed a tendency to return, notwithstanding the efforts of the Duke of Somerset, to the worst times of the navy; and it was, he thought, the duty of his hon. Friend to press his Motion to a division, and thus afford every hon. Member on both sides of the House who had a regard for the welfare of his country and of that great service in which they all felt so deep an interest, an opportunity of voting in its favour.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the great argument used by the hon. Member in support of the Motion seemed to him to be that Lieutenant Yorke was the son of the Earl of Hardwicke.

MR. AYRTON: I argued entirely without reference to his being the son of anybody.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that the appointment would never have been commented on in that House had not Lieutenant Yorke happened to be the son of the Earl of Hardwicke. Was it any objection to a young and deserving officer that he was the son of one who himself had been distinguished in the service? He must protest against the course which had been taken by the hon. Gentleman by whom the subject had been brought forward. None of the appointments which had been made by the Duke of Somerset had been so questioned. When the age of many of our senior naval officers was taken into account, it was best that the younger men should obtain promotion to the higher posts in the service.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the question at issue did not stand in altogether a satisfactory position. In meeting the charge with a mere tu quoque retort, Gentlemen opposite did not seem to attach to it the importance which it deserved. But when he made up his mind to adopt that line of defence, it was incumbent on the right hon. Baronet to give notice to the Duke of Somerset, as to those who in this House would be likely to defend his acts, that he intended to impugn particular promotions made by him. On the other hand, he thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy) was asking the House to pronounce a decision on the question before it without those papers and that information which it was desirable it should possess. He would therefore suggest to him that he should move for Returns of the services of Lieutenants Wood, Graham, Fitzclarence and Yorke, of the recommendations in favour of these officers to the Admiralty, and of the regulations under which they were promoted. He did not think it would be possible for the House to pass the Resolution to which it was invited to assent on the bare statement—he dared say correct—of his hon. Friend, even supplemented by the reply of the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington). If therefore the right hon. Gentleman who at present filled that office (Mr. Corry) would give a promise that the papers to which he referred should be laid on the table, he hoped his hon. Friend would agree to the withdrawal of his Resolution.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to detain the House for a few moments, because he had taken great interest in the question of promotion in the navy, and he thought the House was in danger of being misled by the facts which had been brought out in the discussion. He was assured that the First Lord of the Admiralty would have no objection to give the papers just asked for, and when hon. Members had those in their hands they might come to a calm decision as to the merits of the appointment which was impugned. He wished, however, to allude to the advantage of promoting younger officers at certain times, so that it might not be rendered impossible that our fleets might be properly commanded. A naval officer was not promoted to be a lieutenant under the age of twenty, and it was not until after ten or fifteen years' service, or when he was about thirty-five, that he could become a commander; and if anything like the same proportion in promotion were observed, he would be fifty before he was a captain, and seventy before he could be an admiral, so that promotion simply by seniority was not desirable in the naval profession. If, however, a lieutenant at twenty-one were sometimes made five or six years after a commander, and five or six years after that a captain, he might perhaps hope to be in a position before he reached fifty to hoist his flag. How were the Admiralty, then, to select, when there was no opportunity for distinguished service? The only course to follow was to do what had been done by his right hon. Friend in this instance, and previously by the Duke of Somerset in several instances. Captain Yorke was an officer of good service, with everything in his favour. His hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire did not assert that any other officer of Captain Yorke's standing had higher claims; but what he objected to was that the gallant officer was promoted over the heads of senior officers.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY said, there were several officers of the same standing who had stronger claims than Captain Yorke.

SIR JOHN HAY said, they were not those distinguished claims which would call for the attention of the authorities. He believed, if the papers which the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had asked for were laid upon the table, the House would agree that if young officers were to be selected for promotion, the Duke of Somerset and the right hon. Gentleman were justified by usage in the choice they had made. There was no feeling of jealousy in the profession with regard to the promotion of men like Lieutenants Graham and Wood when no other officers of their rank and standing had any higher claims. The son of an old and distinguished Admiral like Lord Hardwicke, who had also been a former colleague of the right hon. Gentleman, had a similar claim. As regarded the case of Lieutenant Wood, he (Sir John Hay) found in an official paper a statement that the sea time in the Excellent was not allowed to count, as Lieutenant Wood did not pass in the time allowed, which was eighteen months, though no blame was to be attached to Lieutenant Wood, who received his promotion with perfect fairness on account of the merits of the nobleman whose son he was.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he wished to ask if the hon. Baronet meant to say that Lieutenant Wood had not served his time as flag lieutenant, and was promoted contrary to the regulations on account of the merits of the distinguished man whose son he was.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that the gallant officer had not served his time when flag lieutenant, and was promoted according to the ordinary regulations on account of the distinguished man whose son he was. He was happy to bear the highest testimony to the characters of both Commander Wood and Commander Yorke, who had both been midshipmen of his. Commander Wood was promoted a year before Commander Yorke, but no exception was taken to it; and when the papers were laid upon the table, it would be seen that his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) had made a promotion which, under existing circumstances, was exceedingly fair.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the question assumed a character of very considerable gravity. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) defended his conduct by saying that the course he had pursued was parallel to that followed by former First Lords of the Admiralty; and the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) expressed an opinion that this question would never have been heard of if the gentleman whose name was brought forward to-night had not been the son of the Earl of Hardwicke. That was as much as to say that the hon. Member for Montgomery had taken up the question solely as a political partizan. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who last spoke laid down a principle as to promotion in the navy which merited the most serious consideration of the House. The hon. and gallant Member stated—and if the House passed over the statement in silence it might be thought that the House accepted it—that the sons of gentlemen of distinction on one side of politics or the other might on that ground be carried, without offence, over the heads of their seniors in service and of equal merits. That was an announcement of an exceedingly grave character. He confessed, with all deference to feelings audibly expressed in some quarters of the House, and after hearing the able statement of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, the suggestion of the hon. Member for Pontefract appeared to him a wise one. He did not mean to say that the statements of the hon. Member (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy), and of the right hon. Baronet, were not perfect, good, and valid as far as they went; but the effect of producing papers would be that, not only the attention of the Members now present, but also of the whole House, would be drawn to the subject, and to the broad declaration of a Gentleman holding office in connection with the Admiralty with respect to the principle on which those promotions should be made. It was most desirable that all the facts of the case should be laid before the House, and then, however reluctant to enter into questions of this kind, he should not decline to give a judgment. It would be well to defer pronouncing a formal opinion until the subject was fully in possession of the House.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to say one word in explanation in consequence of the misapprehension of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), who seemed to be under the impression that he (Sir John Pakington) defended Lieutenant Yorke's promotion, on the ground that the Duke of Somerset made three similar promotions. What he (Sir John Pakington) had said was, that Lieutenant Yorke's promotion was consistent with the interests of the naval service; but that that appointment had been made the subject of attack, while the appointments of the Duke of Somerset of a similar kind had been left unnoticed.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he must enter his protest against the doctrines laid down for regulating naval promotion which they had heard that night. While they were endeavouring to clear the navy from political appointments, and to do that justice to it which it had never yet received, it had been broadly stated that because an officer was the son of an admiral, and the son of a Lord, therefore he was to be promoted. He hoped the hon. Member would take the sense of the House upon this question.

MR. HANBURY - TRACY said, he would ask for leave to withdraw the Motion, on the ground that the papers to be produced might strengthen his case, and on a future day he would call attention to the question.

NAVY—NAVAL ENGINEERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR EDWARD DERING said, he rose to call attention to the position of the Naval Engineers. Last year he took occasion to make some suggestions on their behalf, and since that time the Admiralty had allowed pensions to be given to the widows of naval engineers, and a certain increase of pay was granted to the inspectors of machinery afloat. At the same time, no provision was made for giving the inspectors half pay on retirement. There was a considerable difference in rank between inspectors of machinery and chief engineers, the former ranking as post captains, and the chief engineers as lieutenants in the navy. The case of the chief engineers was deserving of attention. No engineer was allowed to enter Her Majesty's naval service until he was declared competent to enter on the discharge of his duties. He then had to serve for a period which averaged between thirteen or fourteen years before he became a chief engineer; and before he could attain the highest rank and the highest rate of pay he must show twenty-five years of service. He did not complain of this; but what he did complain of on the part of engineers was this, that having served for fourteen years in the lower rank, instead of being allowed to count that period, by the regulations of the Admiralty they were only allowed to count four years. Consequently, instead of having eleven more years to serve, they had twenty-one years more to serve after promotion before attaining the highest rate of pay. Thus, an engineer entering the navy at twenty-one or twenty-two, would be thirty-five by the time he was made chief engineer. When he got to the top of the tree as chief engineer, he would have arrived at the ripe age of fifty-six, and, as according to the rules of the service, officers must retire at sixty, he would have only the intervening period between fifty-six and sixty for the full enjoyment of the rewards and rank he had a right to expect in return for his long and meritorious service of thirty-five years. It was very difficult to see on what principle these regulations were based. Considering the very strict examination he had to undergo before entering the service, the engineer was placed in a very inferior position to the assistant-surgeon and other officers holding corresponding rank. The assistant-surgeon was made a surgeon after ten years, and was allowed to count every year of that period of service instead of being cut down to four years, as was the case with naval engineers. Last year, when he brought forward this matter, he was told that the case of the assistant-surgeons was exceptional owing to their long and expensive education. But the examination which must be passed by engineer students before entering the navy, which, in addition to perfect competency and skill in engineering, and a knowledge of the properties of steam, embraced plane trigonometry, hydrostatics, mechanics, dynamics, and elementary chemistry, was quite equal to what was required of assistant-surgeons. He was encouraged to think that the Board of Admiralty were of opinion that the principle he advocated was a sound one; because by the Admiralty regulations, commanders and captains were allowed to count their time as sub-lieutenants, in order to qualify them to receive Greenwich Hospital pensions. He asked the same principle to be applied to the engineers which was applied to captains and commanders. There was another point on which concession would not increase the Estimates, while it would do away with a great deal of individual hardship. An increase of pay now took place at intervals of five years. What he ventured to suggest was that the increase, instead of taking place every five years, should be spread proportionably over that period. At present, if a man were compelled to retire shortly before he had completed twenty years of service, he would have a retiring allowance upon only fifteen years service, and the difference between retirement at twenty years' service and fifteen years was no less than £45 per annum. There was therefore in this matter a case of considerable hardship. The increase of pay to assistant-surgeons, which had formerly been every five years, now took place every four years; while to paymasters the period was also reduced. All he asked was that in these matters engineers should be placed in the same position with naval officers of corresponding rank. He would ask also why the names of naval engineers were not inserted in the Navy List? Even the engineers coming from the Mercantile Navy, and entering the Royal Naval Reserve, had their names inserted in the Navy List; but naval engineers were the only officers in the service whose names were not to be found in the Navy List. This was a very invidious distinction, which had given rise to a great deal of heart-burning and unpleasantness. Naval engineers messed in the ward-room with officers, and they were fully entitled to have what he asked for them. He trusted the courteous disposition of the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) would take their case into favourable consideration.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that in considering the questions of the hon. Baronet, he must in the first place state that, having received from him no notice as to what were the peculiar grievances he was about to bring forward, he feared he should not be able to reply in full to all his questions, the more so as no memorial from this class of officers is before the Admiralty. But by reference to the debate of last year he had been enabled to gather what he presumed was the purport of the complaints. He would take the questions seriatim, as they had been put to him. First of all, the hon. Baronet wished that inspectors of machinery should be allowed to have increased half-pay. That question had been under the consideration of the Board, and no decision had been come to yet on the point. Secondly, the hon. Baronet asked that these gentlemen should be allowed to count the whole of their time. He could not well compare engineers with assistant-surgeons, chaplains, and naval instructors, who did enjoy that privilege, because assistant-surgeons paid for their own education, which was an expensive one, and the same remark applied to chaplains and naval instructors. The hon. Baronet might probably say that some of these engineers were taken from private yards, and thus had paid for their own education; but all connection with the private trade had now ceased, and all engineers in the Royal Navy were called upon to pass through the factories and dockyards, and paid nothing for their education. This being so, he thought that no aid could be granted them upon this point. As to the third matter, the hon. Baronet asked that the engineers should have an increase in their pay every three, instead of every five years. He could hold out no hopes of such an alteration in the rate of pay being made. It was not granted to any other class of officers. Then the hon. Baronet said that the engineers felt most keenly the implied slight offered to them by their names not appearing in the Navy List, and he requested to be informed of the reason for their being omitted. The hon. Baronet not having given notice of his intention to put a question upon this subject he could give him no distinct answer as to why the names of the lower grade of engineers did not appear there. The hon. Baronet, however, must be aware that the names of those in the upper grades of the engineers did appear in the Navy List. Having answered all the questions of the hon. Baronet, he must be permitted to point out to him that last year the pay of five inspectors of engineers was raised by £100 a year; and that the pay of others in the same branch of the service had been raised by £50. The present Board of Admiralty had also given to the engineers that which they had been so long anxious for—namely, the rank of commanders after fifteen years' service. If the hon. Baronet required further explanations upon the subject, he would be happy to communicate with him by letter or otherwise, and to afford him every information in his power.

NAVY—ROMAN CATHOLICS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'REILLY said, he rose to call attention to the provision for the spiritual wants of Roman Catholics in the Royal Navy; and asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, how far the recommendations approved of by Sir John Pakington in his Letter to Lord Derby, dated 1859 (see Parliamentary Paper, 10th February 1860, Navy) have been carried out? By the principle acted on of late years all denominations of Christians in the Royal Navy were to be treated as on an equal footing. The proportion of Roman Catholics in the navy had been 16 per cent, and was now 12½ per cent. But while the total expenditure for religious instruction in the navy was £39,500, the allowance in respect of Roman Catholic clergymen was only £940, or less than 3 per cent of the whole. In 1859 a memorial in reference to Roman Catholics in the navy was laid before the Admiralty, and it was concerning the recommendations of Sir John Pakington upon this memorial that he wished to inquire. The first recommendation was, that when the Protestants were assembled for worship the Roman Catholics should be assembled separately, and prayers read by a Roman Catholic priest or officer. Secondly, that Roman Catholics should be assembled separately two or three times a week for instruction in their religion. Many of these recommendations could, of course, only be carried out when the ship was in harbour. Thirdly, that when a Roman Catholic was ill, he should, where it was practicable, be attended by a clergyman of his own persuasion. Fourthly, that Roman Catholics should, when in harbour, be assembled and marched to Divine service. Fifthly, that where a hospital ship was attached to the fleet, a Roman Catholic chaplain should form part of the staff.

Lord Henry Lennox

Sixthly, that the small steamers which took the liberty men ashore should be employed to take men to the chapel ships. Seventhly, that when a man presented himself for entry to the navy, no question should be asked as to his faith until he should be pronounced fit for service, and that the religion should be added to the description of each seaman. Eighthly, that this description should accompany the man when he went into hospital, so that the chaplain might more easily know whom to visit. Ninthly, that when practicable, a Roman Catholic priest should perform the funeral service over members of that religion. Tenthly, that the authorities of naval hospitals should request the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical authority at the spot to name a chaplain to attend the sick Roman Catholics, and that this person should have free access to the hospital. Lastly, that arrangements should be made for performing Divine service and reading prayers in hospitals. Further, he wished to inquire into the position and pay of the Roman Catholic clergy in the navy. There were Roman Catholic chaplains at Sheerness, Portsmouth, and Devonport; their duties were such that they occupied their whole time, and yet their whole remuneration was £120 a year. Practically, these were permanent appointments, and the amount of pay certainly was not enough to permit these gentlemen to make any provision for old age. He thought that they were well entitled to a retiring allowance. In other ports very small payments were made to Roman Catholic clergymen. Last year there was an entry in the Estimates of £60 for Malta, but this year there was none. At Gibraltar and Hong Kong there were no allowances. At Bermuda, Jamaica, and the Cape of Good Hope the allowance was £20; and at Trincomalee only £10. At Haslar the Protestant clergyman received £620 and the Roman Catholic £30; and at Yarmouth £15. He would suggest that the naval authorities should take into consideration whether the system adopted in the army of payments per capita might not be extended to the navy.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he—

MR. SPEAKER said, the noble Lord was not at liberty to speak again, as he had already spoken in the course of this discussion.

MR. OTWAY said, he knew that the engineer officers of the navy were most grateful for the benefits which had been conferred upon them. They would regard it as a further boon to have their names inserted in the Navy List. He wished to put a question with respect to the pay of dockyard labourers, which he had no doubt the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox), whose able statement the other night he had heard with satisfaction, would be able to answer. He had always understood that the late Board had increased the pay of the dockyard labourers; and he wished to know whether the increase was to be confined to the class of labourers who received only 13s. a week, or whether the augmentation applied to the higher classes of labourers?

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished Roman Catholic priests to receive such a liberal remuneration for their services to sailors in the navy as would render them more amenable to the rules and to discipline than their brother priests had been in regard to services in prisons. But he desired to know whether the services of Roman Catholic priests were to be appreciated by the importunity of their applications to the Government, and by the influence they exercised in that House, or were they to be regulated according to the exigencies of the service? He hoped the Admiralty would consider how far the services of Roman Catholic priests would conduce to the interests of the navy and to the safety of the country. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. O'Reilly) that the remuneration of Roman Catholic naval chaplains should be at least on as liberal a scale as the pay of clergymen of other denominations. He might remind the House, however, that many clergymen of the Church of England had to live and maintain a respectable appearance on £80 or £100 a year; while, among the Dissenters, £100 or £150 was considered amply sufficient. In regard to Roman Catholic inmates of prisons, the attendance of the chaplains upon them was not compulsory under the Act of Parliament.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that it was from no feeling of disrespect to the House that he had been deputed by his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry) to reply to the questions which had been asked; but his right hon. Friend had only been in office a short time, and had been obliged to turn nearly the whole of his attention as yet to the mastery of details. He could assure the hon. Gentleman the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) that the pay and appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains would be regulated, not by the importunities of hon. Gentlemen who professed the Roman Catholic religion, but solely by the exigencies of the service, in the hope that the men would be taught their duty to God and their Queen. He would now answer the points raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Mr. O'Reilly): The recommendations issued in 1859 had been carried out as far as was practicable. The first question was whether the Roman Catholic seamen who entertained religious scruples about attending the service of the Church of England might absent themselves from its performance. That permission was already granted; but as it was indispensable that perfect order and silence should be observed in the ship during the performance of Divine service, the men so absenting themselves were obliged to remain in the mess room. As to the boys assembling on board the ships for religious instruction, he had to call the attention of the hon. and gallant Gentleman to the fact that as the Protestant clergyman was always on board the ship he could summon the boys and administer instruction to them at times which would not only be convenient to himself but which would not interfere with the discipline of the service, while a Roman Catholic chaplain could not fix certain hours or certain days in the week without interfering somehow with that discipline which it was necessary to preserve. The hon. Gentleman asked whether Roman Catholic priests were sent for when Roman Catholic seamen were dangerously ill. That, he might say, was already the invariable practice where it was possible. No orders, however, had been issued on the subject, and the matter was, as a rule, left to the humanity and good feeling of the captain. With regard to the next question, whether Catholic sailors were allowed in harbour to attend their chapel and mass, the hon. and gallant Gentleman had nothing to do but to turn to the printed instructions and see that those sailors, when there was a Catholic officer, were marched under his orders to the chapel where their religious service was performed. Thus far all the recommendations had been carried out. In answer to the next question, whether chaplains should be appointed to the hospital ships of the fleet, he might observe that there were no hospital ships, as a rule, attached to the fleet. On the next point the hon. and gallant Gentleman laid considerable stress, labouring apparently under the impression that the recommendation had not in this respect been carried out. But in the case of ships at Plymouth Sound, Spithead, and Portsmouth, a small steamer was employed on Sundays to collect the Roman Catholic sailors, to carry them on shore, and after service to take them back to their respective ships. [Mr. O'REILLY: Will the noble Lord state when the practice was introduced?] He thought about eight or nine months since, but had taken no trouble to ascertain the date, regarding the fact as the all-important matter. The hon. and gallant Gentleman next asked whether persons on presenting themselves for entry into the navy were asked any questions about their religion, and whether Roman Catholic seamen taken to the hospital ship might not be placed in a separate ward, so that their minister might be able to attend better than he now could do to their spiritual wants. As to the first part of the question; the recommendation had been carried out in full, for no man was asked on entering the Royal Navy to what religion he belonged. The second suggestion it would be impossible to carry out, because the inmates of the naval hospitals were classified according to their diseases, and not according to their religion, and it was highly improbable that the whole of the Roman Catholics in a hospital would be afflicted with the same complaint. In answer to the next point, he would say that the funerals of Roman Catholic seamen were accompanied with the usual rites of their religion when vessels were in harbour, but with ships at sea, and no priests on board, such a thing was, of course, impossible. The Roman Catholic chaplain was permitted to read prayers to the sick on board, but he did not believe that there was any convenience for celebrating mass. Almost all the recommendations made in 1859 had been carried out by those who had succeeded his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) at the Board of Admiralty. He confessed that the position of the chaplains at Plymouth, Devonport, and Sheerness was, to a certain extent, anomalous, and that they ought to have a pension on which they could eventually retire. These gentlemen devoted a great portion of their lives to ministering to the spiritual need of the sailors, and they were, he thought, entitled, if possible, to a favourable consideration of their claims. The next point touched on by the hon. Gentleman had relation to the salaries given to Roman Catholic chaplains on foreign stations. He instanced two places, Hong Kong and Malta, as stations at which the Roman Catholic priests received no pay. He was happy to undeceive his hon. and gallant Friend, for at Malta £110 were taken this year for the payment of the Roman Catholic priest; and at Hong Kong a sum of £33. Then the hon. and gallant Gentleman expressed his opinion that the Roman Catholic chaplains in the navy should be placed in the same position as those of the army. He was happy to inform him that the Rev. Mr. Connor, at Haulbowline, was receiving salary under the capitation grant. Originally, when his congregation was very small he refused payment on this scale, and Lord Clarence Paget, then representing the Board of Admiralty, granted him an annual salary. Since then the numbers had increased, representations had been made which were felt to be perfectly reasonable, and the Board of Admiralty now in office had complied with Mr. Connor's request that he should be paid according to the capitation grant. The hon. Gentleman complained of the position of three chaplains sent to perform duties in various ports; but he must remember that they were on exactly the same footing as clergymen of the Established Church called on to officiate for small bodies of troops, and receiving exactly the same allowances. He had now answered seriatim the points put to him. He would only add that the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), recently Secretary of State for War, had been first to take practical action in the direction of endowing Roman Catholic chaplains in the army, and to give practical proof of the respect in which their services were held. He should feel glad if it fell to the lot of the Board of Admiralty, of which he was a Member, to complete this act of justice to Roman Catholic chaplains in the navy by the grant of retiring pensions. In reply to the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) he begged to say that the Establishment labourers, 885 in number, received 2s. 4d. per diem. There were 567 hired labourers of the first class entitled to pensions who received 2s. 3d. a day. It was proposed to increase their pay 1d. daily, so as to bring them on an equality with the Establishment labourers. The hired labourers in the second class received only 2s. 2d. a day, and it was proposed that in the case of 2,142 men employed in the various dockyards 2d. daily should also be added to their pay, so as to bring them all up to 2s. 4d. a day. The whole cost of the increase to the country would be £7,750. He quite concurred in the belief that this money was well expended. He believed no class in Her Majesty's service was better deserving of recognition.

MUTINY BILL.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, it would be for the convenience of the House that he should state, after what had passed that evening with regard to the Mutiny Bill, that it was proposed to postpone the Committee on the Bill until Thursday next.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Question again proposed,

"That 67,300 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services, for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1868, including 16,200 Royal Marines."

MR. CHILDERS: Mr. Dodson—No one, I am sure, could have examined the present Estimates, and considered them by the light of the very interesting statement of my noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox), without being impressed with their importance, especially with reference to their amount. I will subject them, in the first place, to the same test of comparison which was applied by the gallant General the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) to the Army Estimates—that is, I will compare them with the audited account of naval expenditure for the last completed year—namely, 1865-6. The total sum now asked is £10,926,523. The audited account for last year amounts to £10,209,840. The increase from this point of view is therefore £716,683. Or I may compare these Estimates with the original Navy Estimates of 1865-6 and 1866-7. The former amounted to £10,432,610; the latter to £10,392,224. We may say, then, in general terms, that the present Estimates are about £500,000 in excess of those proposed on the last two occasions by the late Admiralty, and £700,000 more than the amount actually spent. But, as a matter of finance, this is not the only consideration which should weigh with the House on the present occasion. We have now on the table all the Estimates of expenditure for the approaching year; and it may be well to compare them with those of the current year. The House will be asked to vote £15,252,200 for the Army, £10,926,253 for the Navy, £8,202,953 for the Civil Services, and £5,852,428 for the Revenue Departments; in all £40,233,834. Last year the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was founded on the following amounts of the original Estimates:—£14,095,000 for the Army, £10,388,153 for the Navy; £7,856,836 for the Civil Services; and £5,842,866 for the Revenue Departments; or a total of £38,182,855. The difference, therefore, between the original Estimates of last year and this year is no less than £2,050,979. Nor is this all. Last year we had, in aid of the Budget, two considerable items of receipt—£500,000, a windfall in the shape of bonds from New Zealand, which have been converted into cash; and nearly as much on account of the China indemnity. Neither of these amounts will come into the approaching Budget; and the result must be, that if the expenditure proposed by the Government should be adopted by Parliament, improvements in revenue or in some other respects must be looked forward to, to the extent of above £3,000,000. Now the normal increase of the revenue cannot, at the very best, be taken at above £1,500,000, and the partial falling in of the Dead Weights annuity is sure to be balanced by inevitable Supplementary Estimates of expenditure. The Supplementary Estimates for the current year, proposed by the present Government, amounted to some £800,000. We shall therefore be, beyond a doubt, with reference to the finance of 1867-8, by £1,500,000 in a worse position than in 1866-7, and unless the revenue should be exceptionally buoyant, I fear that the country may be called upon to bear increased taxation. It is, on these grounds, of the greatest importance that the items of the several Estimates for the Army, Navy, and Civil Services should be jealously scrutinized; and that any increases not essentially necessary should be refused.

I now come to the Estimates themselves. They may be, I think, divided into those for the personnel of the navy, in the shape of pay, wages, and pensions; and for the materiel, in the shape of naval, victualling, and medical stores, ships, engines, and works. The first class is included in Votes 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, which are for Establishments, and also in the later Votes for Half-Pay and Pension. Now, having looked through these Estimates carefully, I am bound to say that, in dealing with the establishments, I can see no traces of that economical hand which is so much required in all the great spending Departments. There never was a truer remark than that made recently in the debate on the Army Estimates, to the effect that, while in particular branches or divisions of any service increases of expenditure will here and there be necessary, it is the special duty of a good administrator to discover, by constant watchfulness, where simultaneous reductions may be made. The Departments will be always pulling at the Executive Government for more expenditure in every quarter; and if I notice no signs of reductions in some establishments, I am entitled to conclude that the watchfulness of which I have spoken has been dormant. Now, in these Establishment Votes, there is an increase over last year of about £35,000. There is also an increase upon a certain class of retirements to the extent of £3,200. I shall, however, allude more particularly to the details of these increases at a subsequent time. The great changes effected in these Estimates are in Votes 10 and 14. The first of these is commonly called the Store Vote, and contains in its two parts provision for the supplies required by the Controller of the Navy and the Storekeeper General. The increase on the cost of ships, building and to be built by contract, including engines built by contract, is £502,000. There is also an increase of £20,000 in the cost of building dockyard tugs; and in the Miscellaneous Vote there is a special item of £50,000 towards the construction of an armour-plated ship for the colony of Victoria. These items of increase amount to £572,000. On the other hand there are certain items for which less is asked this year, but none of them are establishments, all stores. There is a diminution of £46,000 for timber, of £15,000 for metal articles and iron, of £27,000 for hemp, canvas, paint, tar, &c. There is also a diminution in the Vote for coal, but I think that my noble Friend has made a mistake in saying that it was £100,000. His mistake arose, probably, from an alteration that seems to have been made in the arrangement of Votes 10 and 17. Last year the whole Estimate for coal was stated in Vote 10, but this year the Vote for the fleet and the dockyards is kept entirely distinct from that for transport ships. The real decrease is not £100,000 but £26,000; and when it is considered that for many years past the coal Estimate has always been exceeded, I fear that even this small sum will not really be saved. Taking, however, the items according to the Estimates, there will be a decrease under the four heads I have named of £114,000; and deducting this from the £572,000 increase for shipbuilding, the net increase will be £458,000, or, with £33,000 increases on minor items, in all £491,000. My noble Friend has claimed several small economies, and has alluded to some minor changes adopted by the present Board of Admiralty, and to some of these I should like to refer. He said that they had reduced the number of cadets, observing that for some years past the first-class cadets have been entered in excess for the ranks into which they were to go. If so, I heartily approve of the reduction; but I should be glad to know whether, in speaking of this reduction, my noble Friend has taken into account the second-class cadets. The late Board of Admiralty discontinued the entry of second-class cadets, when they determined to let the Masters' line die out. The number of first-class cadets was therefore settled with reference to the increased number of lieutenants who would in future be required for navigating purposes. If, however, the present Board of Admiralty have reversed the decision of their predecessors, and have recommenced the entry of second-class cadets, I should like to know whether the economy claimed by my noble Friend has any real foundation. I entirely approve of the decision to enter and keep an additional number of boys, and, indeed, I think the number 418 might be carried much further. My impression is that, on an actuary's calculation, far more than the present number of boys are required to fill up vacancies in the number of men, and I am satisfied that you get more efficiency as well as economy by this means, than by entering men from the shore. I also am glad to hear of the increase in the number of trained gunners; but I should like to know how it is that no increase is proposed in the number of artificers of the fleet. No class is more required, and my belief is, that the Board of Admiralty might safely reduce the number of Red Marines (the Light Infantry Marines), who are now comparatively useless afloat, and, out of the saving thus made, increase the number of artificers. Indeed, I would inquire why the policy of the late Board of Admiralty, gradually to reduce the number of Red Marines, has been abruptly reversed this year. My noble Friend has referred to the heavy charge for the freight of stores, and I am glad to hear that his Board has appointed a Committee to look into the Returns which he himself did not understand. I should be glad if this Committee would also inquire into the whole question of dockyard and victualling yard small craft, which, to my mind, is in a very unsatisfactory state. But while on the question of freight and transport, I would refer to an anomaly connected with the movement of troops from one part of the kingdom to another. When troops are moved by land, the cost falls on the War Office Estimates: when by sea on Naval Estimates. Each Department is thus interested in throwing the expense on the other when a regiment has to be moved between two seaport towns; and I think the time has come for looking into this question simply with a view to economy irrespective of the two Departments. I cordially agree with the policy of the Admiralty in increasing the provision required by the Contagious Diseases Act, which I am confident will conduce to economy in the end. But I am sorry I cannot say as much for the next item to which my noble Friend alluded. He spoke of a slight increase in the number of men placed on the dockyard establishments. I find in the Estimates that provision is made for fifty-two additional artificers at Woolwich, and for forty-three at the other dockyards; in all, ninety-five. The number is small; but the increase involves two principles to which I entertain the strongest objection. One is that, as what are called the established labourers die out, their places are to be taken by additional established artificers. On the contrary, I believe that our establishment of artificers is ample, if not in excess; and all that is necessary is to increase the number of hired labourers, instead of established labourers. My other objection is to the special increase at Woolwich. Upon a Report by a Committee of this House, the late Board of Admiralty had provided for the future abandonment of the dockyard at Woolwich, and no fresh building work was to be taken in hand there; but I fear that this policy has been reversed, and I cannot approve a step which will only result in additional expense when the day for abandoning the dockyard arrives, as it most certainly will. My noble Friend has given the House some very satisfactory statistics in reference to the adoption of piece-work, and I entirely concur in the wisdom of the experiment that has been made. But while on dockyard economy, I should like to ask a question with reference to a statement I saw in the newspapers this morning, that it was contemplated to reduce or abandon the establishment of female spinners at Chatham. If anything of the sort is done, I can only say that it will be the very reverse of economy. After a long controversy, with the dockyard people and in this House, the late Board succeeded in introducing machinery for spinning yarn, both at Chatham and Devonport, superseding the former expensive system of spinning by hand. If the result be that more yarn is now spun than is required, surely the reduction should be first made in the hand-spinning establishment still kept up at Portsmouth, and I think in part at Devonport, not in the women and girls at Chatham.

I have now gone through the smaller matters alluded to by my noble Friend, and running through the Estimates myself, I must say that I see but little noteworthy in the way of reductions, though I notice several petty increases. I do not mean so much increases of salary, to which I rarely take exception, as additional allowances and numbers. There is, indeed, one salary about which I should have asked a question, connected with the establishment of the First Lord of the Admiralty, but I understand it is not to be acted upon. I notice, however, such increases as these:—Three additional clerks in the Secretary's office, Whitehall; an additional clerk at Greenwich, an additional inspector-general at Greenwich; additional house rent allowances at Chatham, Devonport, and Pembroke; and similar increases at several foreign stations. But the worst of these is, I think, the increase of Greenwich. I do not know which member of the Board of Admiralty looks after this establishment, in which I used to take much interest; but I am sure that a little pruning is very much required there. I find that, without taking into account the clerks who are employed at the Admiralty on Greenwich business, or the superannuations, the maintenance of the 380 old men left in the Hospital costs no less than £42,500, or above £110 a man. Surely this is not the time to add an officer of the rank of Inspector General to this underworked establishment. I will now refer to a much more important item in the Estimates, in the nature, however, of a reduced charge, which the House ought to look upon with some jealousy. The expenditure for the extension of the Chatham and Portsmouth Dockyards has been made the subject of a distinct statute, and, according to the Estimate which was the foundation of this Act, the sums to be spent this year were to have been £205,000 upon Chatham, and £312,000 upon Portsmouth. In the present Estimates, however, the sums are given as £149,500 at Chatham, and £228,800 at Portsmouth, making a difference of £138,700 for the year. I do not say that this change of policy may not be justified, and I think I can guess what my noble Friend's answer will be; but when he explained so many comparative trifles, I think it is to be regretted that he did not allude to so important an alteration as this. I must also say a word about the extra receipts; and, in the first place, I deny altogether the doctrine that an increase in extra receipts is any justification for increased expenditure. If ships or iron, or stores, ought to be sold, let them be, whatever expenditure in other respects has to be incurred, and vice versa. But I still want a little more information about the "pigs" of which we have heard so much. We know nothing as to the amount proposed to be sold, or as to the pavement which is to be substituted for that which now consists of iron ballast. Indeed, from the entire omission of any provision for new pavement, I very much doubt whether the experienced officials under the Board of Admiralty know any better than this House what is proposed to be done. At least, if they do, some carelessness has been shown in the preparation of the Estimates. I cordially approve of the proposition, as far as I understand it, to sell a large amount of timber and old ships, though I do not think that my noble Friend gave sufficient credit to the late Board for what it had done in these respects. I know that an opinion prevails that the late Board was remiss in allowing so large an amount of timber to accumulate in the dockyards; but if any hon. Member will refer to the debates in 1860 on the subject of the stock of timber, and especially to the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), on the 16th and 19th of April, he will see that it was this House, and not the Admiralty, on whom the fault primarily rests. Indeed, the late Board, while I was a member of it, took upon itself the responsibility of stopping the delivery of timber, so that the present Government is only carrying out, and most rightly, the policy of their predecessors.

I now come to the great question of these, and for many years past, of all Navy Estimates: I mean the amount of shipbuilding proposed for the coming financial year. The policy of the Government may be stated in a line to be this: to spend the whole of the increase in the Estimates, £502,000, on additional shipbuilding and engine-building by contract. Their programme is as follows:—The two great iron-clads, Hercules and Monarch, now building at Chatham, are to be advanced to  $\frac{3}{4}$ ths and  $\frac{1}{2}$ ths. The iron-clad Penelope is to be launched at Pembroke, and the armoured wooden ship Repulse is to be advanced to  $\frac{3}{4}$ ths at Woolwich. As to contract work, £83,000 is to be spent on Captain Coles' ship Captain, and two new iron-clads on the half-turret principle are to be commenced. Passing now to unarmoured ships, the Inconstant is to be advanced to  $\frac{3}{4}$ ths at Pembroke, and a new Inconstant is to be built by contract. Of the Juno class, which my noble Friend oddly enough described as "dear to the hearts of sailors," the Juno herself is to be launched, and the Thalia to be advanced  $\frac{3}{4}$ ths. The Amazon class is to be made up to twelve in number, three being finished, and four laid down, at a total cost of £142,000. The Plover class of twin-screw gunvessels is, with the Myrmidon, to be made up to thirteen, six of which will be finished in the year, at a total cost of £144,000. Finally, not to speak of two or three smaller vessels, we are to build twenty China gunboats—ten in the dockyards at a cost of £139,000, and ten by contract. I think I have stated the programme fairly. Now, on this, one or two very serious questions arise. In the first place, I think some explanation should be given by the Admiralty why, in the present year, they have made so small an advance in building the Monarch and the Hercules. According to the programme published last year, the Hercules was to have been advanced on the 31st of this month to  $\frac{3}{4}$ ths, and the Monarch to  $\frac{1}{2}$ ths. According to the programme in the present Estimates, the Hercules will have only reached on the same day  $\frac{3}{4}$ ths, and the Monarch  $\frac{1}{4}$ ths. The difference between the two programmes is no less than 1,800 tons in the Hercules, and 1,600 tons in the Monarch, and I think that when, as I shall soon show, we are wasting both time and money on non-fighting small ships, the House ought to be informed why so great delay has been allowed by the present Admiralty to occur in the construction of our iron-clad fleet. Again, I regret that it is seriously proposed to commence a second Inconstant. These vessels be it remembered, are unarmoured ships of no less than 4,000 tons and ten guns of the largest calibre, with a complement of 600 men. This is, to my mind, like putting far "too many eggs into one basket." I do not object to the Admiralty completing the first Inconstant, which they are building at Pembroke Dockyard; but, until she is afloat and tried, I think they ought not to contract for a second vessel of such size, liable to be destroyed by a single shell. Coming now to the smaller craft, the proposals of the Admiralty appear to me very extravagant. It is intended to commence or finish in one year no less than thirty-five gunboats or gunvessels, of 700 tons or less. Now we have had no explanation as to the necessity for anything like so great a number as this being taken in hand in one year; and when the House considers that the construction of these vessels is the real cause of the increase in the Estimates; that it involves the reversal of the decision taken by the late Board, and virtually approved by the House, as to the gradual closing of Woolwich Dockyard; that it will interfere with the more rapid construction at Chatham of our iron-clad fleet; and that it will tend to perpetuate the policy of keeping up unnecessarily large squadrons in distant seas, I trust that they will pause before adopting the plan of the Admiralty. Let me point out the objections to building too many vessels of one class in one year. Not to mention the increase in the Estimates which it involves, it has this great fault; that all, or nearly all, these vessels will come for repair in one year; and I may say, in passing, that there is no part of the scheme of the present Board which I so highly approve as their determination to keep a due proportion between the cost of repairs and of building in our dockyards. The second fault is that, having exhausted in one year the demand for small vessels, we shall be obliged next year to find something new for the dockyards to do; and I confess I dread some new proposals for Inconstants, or other unarmed vessels. Our policy, it seems to me, ought to be vigorously to keep up, and even increase, the building of armour-clad or fighting ships in our dockyards, spreading the construction of our smaller craft over a series of years.

I now come to a larger question. I wish to call the attention of the House to a subject which has been but little discussed for many years past; I mean the state and extent of our squadrons in distant seas. We have been so busy discussing the merits of different systems of armour and of gun, the economy of our dockyards, and the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, that we have almost lost sight of the main question, that is to say, what force is it necessary for us to maintain in all parts of the world? and it is this question which I will ask the House to discuss. Indeed, my noble Friend, in introducing the Estimates the other night, almost challenged us to take this course. On that occasion he said—

"While upon this subject I may, perhaps, though only a subordinate Member of the Government, be allowed to say that it is in my opinion a grave question whether the time has not come for the House of Commons and the country to consider what is the absolute necessity or advisability of keeping up large squadrons in all parts of the world of small unarmoured ships, which, when a more formidable ship than they approaches them, must, what is vulgarly termed, 'cut and run.' At the present day, especially when, very properly, the principle of non-intervention is in the ascendant, no captain of one of these vessels would take upon himself, in the event of any dispute arising between British subjects and the Government of a country in whose waters his ship happened to be lying, to demand or exact immediate reparation. He could, in fact, do nothing until he received instructions how to act from Her Majesty's Government at home."—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1838.]

I cannot suppose my noble Friend used these very pregnant words without the entire approval of the Board of Admiralty; and the challenge thus thrown out I hope that both sides of the House will take up and debate with the moderation, and, at the same time, the interest, which the importance of the subject demands. As to the proposals which I shall make, while I have the satisfaction of knowing that they have the entire support of my hon. Friends near me, the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), the noble Lord the Member for Ripon (Lord John Hay), and the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre), in concert with whom they have been prepared, yet I feel strongly that persons who are not in office ought not to speak on a question of this sort with anything like the same certainty and positiveness as hon. Gentlemen opposite; who alone have access to many reliable and official sources of information. Any proposals, therefore, that we may make will be I hope received by the House only as suggestions put out tentatively and with modesty; and if, on any point, I may appear to dogmatize, I can assure the House that nothing can be further from my intention. What, let us consider, are the different kinds of fleets which this country has to keep up? They are three. The first comprises what may be called our stationary fleets, intended for defence at home, and, if necessary, for offence in Europe. The second, the fleets employed in the defence of our colonies, and in communications. The third, the fleets maintained for the protection of British commerce on the coasts of some civilized and all barbarous countries. (I omit occasional experimental or surveying squadrons.) In the first class are, of course, our Channel and Mediterranean fleets; in the second, those we keep on the coasts of our North American Provinces, in the East and West Indies, and in Australia; and the third class comprises our fleets in China, in the Pacific, on the West Coast of Africa, and on the East Coast of South America. Now, I will say at once, that in the present state of affairs, I do not believe that this country could give up any of these squadrons. I am not prepared to impugn the policy which carries the British flag to every part of the world, and which protects our commerce, whether in our colonies, or with either civilized or barbarous foreign countries. But my object is to inquire, whether the extent which some of these squadrons have reached is, or is not, excessive; and to see whether, while we really strengthen our fleets, and the influence of England through them, we may not at the same time render them both more popular and less costly. Now, with respect to the first class, I mean our home squadron, so far from diminishing its strength or numbers, I believe our true policy, as I will show, is rather to augment it. But, with respect to the others, I will place before the House the figures at which they have stood in former years, and discuss the reasons for their increase or reduction. Let me premise by pointing out the general influences which are brought to bear on this question. There are two causes leading to the increase of our squadrons. The first is that, after a war in any quarter of the globe, it is very difficult to return to the status quo ante. Nothing is so easy as to justify a sudden increase for fighting purposes; but when the fighting is over, a sort of vested interest is created, which it is not a little difficult to overcome. The second, and the greater, cause of increase is the pressure constantly exercised by the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office (who are not responsible for the expenditure) on the Admiralty, in the real or supposed interests of our increasing commerce. On the other side there are four reasons which point to reduction in the number of our sailors, being feasible and egredient. The first is the increased value of men compared with the tonnage and weight of broadside of our ships; the second is the saving effected by steam over sailing for our communications; the third is the increasing employment of the telegraph; and the fourth the inclination which our colonies are exhibiting to establish local means of self-defence, well exemplified as this is in the item of the present Estimates for the iron-clad for the colony of Victoria.

Let us now look to the strength of our fleets at the present date in 1856 and in 1846. I cannot, of course, give the exact figures at the present time; but I believe those I shall state are within a very few of those in possession of Gentlemen opposite. In 1846 our naval force in the East Indies, including China and Australia, consisted of 3,505 men; in 1856 of 3,331; in 1867 of 6,500. At the Cape and on the West Coast of Africa, we had in 1846, 1,428 men; in 1856, 2,232; and in 1867, about 1,700, besides the flag ship on its way. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: The total number is 2,085.] Our North American and West Indian fleet comprised in 1846, 2,457 men; in 1856, 4,346; and in 1867, about 5,400. On the South East Coast of America we had in 1846, 1,823 men; in 1856, 1,182; and in 1867, about 1,100. In the Pacific the number was 2,855 in 1846; 2,217 in 1856; and 2,700 in 1867. In 1846, therefore, the total strength of these stations was 12,068; in 1856 it was 13,308; and in 1867 about 17,400; showing an increase of nearly 5,400 during the last twenty years. I will now suggest, though as I have said before, with great diffidence, and with no desire to speak positively, what strength I believe we actually require on these stations. I will take first the China, East India, and Australian stations, where as now we should have an admiral and two commodores. The China station proper includes the whole of the Eastern Coast of Asia as far South as Singapore. North of the Gulf of Pecheli we require nothing but occasional visits by the squadron. For Japan we require two vessels—a corvette at Jeddo, the seat of our Legation, and a smaller vessel at Nagasaki. Let me remind the House that Japan is now visited by mail steamers both from China and San Francisco, and does not require as large a force as it did. Coming to the Gulf of Pecheli, which would be visited periodically by the admiral, two gunboats will be necessary at Tien-tsin and Chefoo. At Shanghai and in the Yangtse river there should be a hulk or stationary ship for the senior officer, two gunboats, and probably two despatch vessels. At Foochow a gunboat, and another at Swatow and Amoy. At Hong Kong we should have a receiving ship, a hospital ship (the Melville), an iron-clad for the flag, a corvette, and probably three gunboats for the suppression of piracy. At Singapore we should require a despatch vessel and a gunboat. This would make our fleet in the China seas consist of an iron-clad, two corvettes, four despatch vessels, nine or ten gunboats, three receiving ships, and one or two troop ships, in all twenty-one ships, with 1,900 men, as against thirty-six which we keep there now. The reduction may appear considerable; but let me remind the House of the special causes which have led to so great an increase during the last few years. Not only have we ourselves been at war with China, but we still appear, most unnecessarily, to have some fear of Russia in connection with the Amoor, forgetting that, if we really were involved in hostilities with her, our fleet of little gunboats would be useless against a single iron-clad ship. But the main cause of the increase is the fact that we are keeping the entire police of the China seas. Considering that we are by no means the only traders to China, and that we have not even got the greater part of the river and inland sea trade either of China or Japan, I hope that Her Majesty's Government will, by agreement with the other Powers interested in China trade, relieve us from the Quixotic duty which we appear to have taken upon ourselves, that of sole protectors, in one quarter of the world, of the commerce of every civilized nation.

I come now to the East Indian station, where we keep a frigate, two corvettes, a sloop, and three gunboats. Here we have two good grounds for prospective reduction. The first is that, at Bombay, the local Government are building Monitors for the defence of the harbour; and the second, that within the next year the new line of troop ships will be running for the conveyance of our soldiers between England and the East via Suez. Though not strictly vessels of war, they will carry our flag, and may be, if necessary, heavily armed. I think we may well reduce our force on this station to six vessels and 1,000 men; and, even then, I trust that pressure will be brought upon the Indian Government to bear some part of the cost of this force.

I turn now to the Australian station. When I was there in 1856, our strength was 230 men; we have now there five ships with 1,100 men. To what cause is this increase attributable? Solely, so far as I am aware, to the New Zealand war, which is now entirely over. But two of the reasons which I assigned for the general reduction of these squadrons especially apply to this station: one is, that all the Australian colonies are now, I believe, connected by the telegraph; the other is the energy with which measures for naval defence are being adopted by the leading colony—Victoria; measures which I am glad to see that the present Admiralty, acting upon the views of their predecessors, are furthering; and which I believe will tend greatly not only to the strength of the navy, but to the increased attachment of the colonies to the mother country. The force on the Australian station may therefore very well, in my judgment, be reduced, say to three large corvettes: one to be stationed at Melbourne, one at Sydney, and a third at New Zealand; besides, if necessary, a surveying vessel. Our force on the station would still be about 750 men, or three times as many as we had there in 1856. The total effect of the reductions which I have proposed in the China, East India, and Australian stations, will be a decrease of 2,800 men, the difference between 6,500, our present strength, and 3,700, a number by 400 in excess of our force in 1856.

I come next to the Cape of Good Hope station. There we keep a corvette, a sloop, and a receiving ship, with 450 men; and, considering the requirements of the station, I do not suggest any reduction. But the next station, the West Coast of Africa, involves considerations of considerable difficulty, with which I shall deal very cautiously. My noble Friend said—

“I, for one, should feel the greatest satisfaction if the moment should arrive when Her Majesty's present Advisers or any other Government should deem it to be consistent with the interests of humanity and of the public service to modify or remove altogether the African coast squadron.”—
[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1838.]

I think I may interpret this language as meaning that the Government have under their consideration such a modification; and I will therefore limit my remarks to the simple expression of belief that, instead of the sixteen ships which, with the flag ship, now compose our force, we need only keep on the coast one corvette, eight despatch or gunboats, two small steamers, and two receiving ships, or altogether 1,000 men; thus effecting a reduction of 300, or including the flag ship, of 700 men.

I come across the Atlantic to a far more important station; our force on the North American coast, and in the West Indies. In the northern division, which has its head-quarters at Halifax, I propose no reduction; but I would suggest, for the consideration of the Admiralty, whether the number of our ships kept in the West Indies could not be, with advantage to the service, very considerably diminished. It is too large for the police of those seas. It is utterly useless for war. Should we unfortunately be entangled in a war with the United States, there is not a ship in the West Indies which would not be obliged, in the emphatic language of my noble Friend, to “cut and run.” Well, we had on this station in 1846, 2,450 men; in 1856, 4,350; and in the present year the number is 5,400. I propose to reduce the squadron, without touching the part of it kept on the North American coast, to 3,000 men, and the distribution which I would suggest is as follows:—an iron-clad flag ship, a smaller iron-clad, three sloops, and three gunboats at Halifax; a sloop and two gunboats at Bermuda; a receiving ship, a sloop, and two gunboats at Jamaica; and two corvettes and two gunboats in the Gulf of Mexico, and at the other islands. In this way we should effect a reduction of 2,400 men.

Coming now to the South East Coast of America, I find that we have at present, under a separate admiral's command, nine ships—that is to say, the flag ship, one sloop, six smaller vessels of different classes, and a receiving ship. The station consists, practically, of two distinct divisions, one of which protects our commerce in the River Plate, and the other is the force which we maintain on the Brazilian coast, as a sort of rear-guard to our African squadron. All we require for the station is a force consisting of two corvettes, two gunboats, a despatch-boat, and a receiving-vessel, with 800 men instead of 1,100; and we should be thus saved the great expense of a flag ship, which I venture to say, except for the purpose of carrying a flag, is, on this station, utterly useless at the present time. I pass now to the Pacific Station, which is in two divisions; the northern under an admiral in an iron-clad, and the southern under a Commodore in a 31-gun frigate at Valparaiso. We have there, besides, three corvettes, four sloops, two gunboats, and a storeship; in all, twelve vessels. This force may, I think, be reduced to a frigate, two despatch vessels, two corvettes (one at Panama and the other at Valparaiso), and three sloops for the service of the coast and across to the islands; or altogether to eight instead of twelve vessels. This would effect a saving of 1,000 men—the difference between 2,700 and 1,700. In passing, let me ask the Admiralty whether they have recently had under their consideration the propriety of abandoning the employment of Her Majesty's ships, both in the Pacific and on the other side of Mexico, in the conveyance of treasure. I believe the use of the navy for this purpose to be the remains of a vicious system which, as it is often the excuse for increased force, I hope will be put an end to.

Let me now recapitulate the changes which we have suggested. In China, the East Indies, and Australia, we reduce 2,800 men, on the West Coast, 700; on the North American and West Indian station, 2,400; on the South East Coast of America, 300; in the Pacific, 1,000; in all, 7,200 men. But we still leave everywhere, I believe, a force sufficient to protect our colonies and our commerce, to restrain piracy, and to be at hand for general service. But that is not the whole of our proposal. Instead of frittering away our force at these distant stations, we propose as a substitute a powerful squadron, which would be, I believe, very popular with the navy; and in suggesting which we are only recurring to the policy of former times. Our naval strength would be, in our opinion, greatly increased by the formation of a new flying squadron, with complements amounting in all to from 2,500 to 3,500 men, consisting of six or seven ships, some armoured and some not, with nearly equal sailing and steaming powers, with two flags (thus employing two more admirals), which, rendezvousing off Lisbon, would be ready at a moment's notice to be ordered by telegraph to any part of the world where an increase of our permanent squadron might be required. It is of great importance that such a force should be sent to sea at any moment without weakening the Channel or the Mediterranean squadron; and I will say no more at present in its favour, hoping that the idea will be thoroughly discussed and weighed, both in the service and at the Admiralty. Taking the strength of this new squadron at something over 3,000 men, and deducting that from the saving which I have suggested of 7,200 men, it will be seen that the total reduction proposed is 4,000 men. Let me repeat that I and my Friends near me throw out these suggestions tentatively and with diffidence, and I hope that they will be well discussed and criticised by gentlemen, whether in the service or connected with commerce, who have much more acquaintance than we have with many of our foreign stations.

I come now to the third and last question upon which I wish to address the Committee to-day. I mean the state of the navy lists. Nothing can be more unsatisfactory than the position of the questions connected with promotion and retirement in the navy. Every year the Board of Admiralty is besieged by officers asking that something may be done to "increase the flow of promotion;" and the usual result is the formation of a new list. Let any one wade through the little blue book issued every quarter, and he will find that the number of these lists is so great as to have taken up all the letters of the alphabet; and I will venture to say that outside the Admiralty nobody, and inside it not half-a-dozen officials, really understand why they were created or what some of them mean. Now, it is high time that this question should be taken up, and that we should not postpone it till, in a financial point of view, bad times come—when any sudden change would be attended by great distress to many deserving officers. Let me say at once that in all questions of this kind I am not for reductions of pay, but of numbers; and to show what we have reached as to numbers, will the Committee bear with me while I read to them some figures which I think will startle them. On the admirals' list we have 13 employed, whose pay is £32,700. But there are 82

admirals on half-pay drawing £48,300; 108 on the reserved list drawing £52,000; and 127 on the retired list drawing £55,400; in all, 317 unemployed admirals whose pay amounts to £155,700. On the post captains' list there are 114 employed whose pay amounts to £85,800. But there are 180 on half-pay drawing £38,100; 80 on the reserved list drawing £18,000; and 386 on the retired list drawing £93,700; or in all, 646 unemployed post captains whose pay is £149,800. There are 128 commanders employed afloat whose pay is £51,700; and 65 employed on shore in the coast guard whose pay is £23,700; giving a total of 193 employed commanders receiving £75,400 a year. But of unemployed commanders there are 214 on half-pay receiving £35,900; 78 on the reserved list receiving £13,900; 492 on a retired list receiving £63,600; and 256 retired as commanders from other lists receiving £41,000; or in all, 1,040 retired commanders whose pay is £154,400. Of generals of marines 1 only is employed at £1,400 a year; but 42 are unemployed at £26,500. To sum up all these ranks, there are employed 321, their pay being £195,300; and unemployed 2,045, costing £486,400. In other words, the case is this—if you name a commander, the chances are 6 to 1 that he has nothing to do; if a captain, 6 to 1; if an admiral, 24 to 1; and if a general of marines, 42 to 1. This is a state of things which I venture to say, when compared with the navy list of any other country in the world, or when judged by the rules of common sense, loudly calls for reform. But there is one, a very salient and marked case, which shows the impolicy of the present arrangements—I mean that of the younger post-captains. According to the navy list of the present quarter, there are 297 post captains on the active list, of whom 167 are of 6 years' standing, or less. Now, of these 167 only 35 are employed; in other words, it is about 4 to 1 that a captain, when posted, will have nothing to do for six years. But what does this mean? The average age at which an officer is posted is about thirty-five. Well, then, between thirty-five and forty-one, when a man is at his best, both as to physical strength and as to powers of command and organization, you turn round and tell him that he shall have nothing to do. This is a blemish, and I may say disgrace, to our system of administration, which absolutely requires the immediate attention of Government and of Parliament. Well, for these evils what remedy do I suggest? All our recent schemes for improving the flow of promotion as it is called seem only to end in giving additional retirement to the upper ranks for the moment, but not in permanently preventing the "block," and the disappointment of the younger men. Take, for instance, the Order in Council of last year—the most liberal scheme of retirement ever proposed. I hear already rumours about the lists being clogged, and some new relief and consequent expense to the country being necessary. What we really want is some means of enabling younger men, who are tired of the service or unsuited for it, to leave it. When a naval officer reaches thirty or thirty-five, he knows pretty well whether he will ever do any good in his profession. If not, or if he is tired of the service, the best thing would be to get rid of him. But our policy has been to give him a miserable half-pay, upon which he cannot live, but which prevents him from obtaining employment elsewhere. Instead of this, I would propose to buy him out with a sum of money down. The capital cost need not appear in the Estimates, as his half-pay might be paid over to the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt, who should be authorized by law to make the commutation. I believe that in this way not only should we get rid of a number of nominal officers who clog the lists and interfere with the flow of promotion, but that by degrees we might bring down the numbers of the superior ranks to some reasonable proportion to the amount of employment for them. We might, I hope, reduce our admirals' list to 40; our post-captains' to 180; and our commanders' to 300; and, retaining the present system of age-retirements as applicable to these ranks, we should insure greatly increased efficiency, and prospectively considerable economy.

I have now, Mr. Dodson, discussed, at I hope not too great length, the three questions which appear to me of the greatest importance in these or in any other Navy Estimates. I have pointed out the saving which I think can be effected in the proposed programme for shipbuilding, in the numbers of our foreign squadrons, and in the lists of our officers. Towards the end of last Session, the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) said of me, that I was always ready to defend Admiralty misdeeds, and that I should do better to indicate new fields of research for naval reformers. Perhaps the House will accept that suggestion as my apology for the proposals I have made. I have made them in no unfriendly spirit; for although I do not agree in politics with Gentlemen opposite, I am disposed to give a general support to the present Board of Admiralty. I beg to move, but only as a matter of form, that the Vote be reduced by 2,000 men.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That 65,300 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services, for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1868, including 16,200 Royal Marines."—(Mr. Childers.)

MR. CORRY said, that as he was not concerned in the preparation of these Estimates he hoped that the House would not expect him to enter into all the details to which the hon. Gentleman had referred. It was not possible for him to be familiar with all the views which had influenced his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) in the preparation of the Dockyard Estimates, or that had guided the Cabinet in the distribution of the seamen and marines over the various home and foreign stations. But he desired to follow the hon. Gentleman in some of the criticisms which he had offered to the House; and there were some points on which he would give all the information in his power. The hon. Gentleman had complained of the considerable increase in some of these Estimates, and had intimated his suspicion that they were not prepared with a due regard to economy. He had no doubt but that his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) would be able to vindicate his own conduct in that respect. The hon. Gentleman had next adverted to what he alleged to be an erroneous statement that was made by his noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox) in moving the Estimates, when he stated that a reduction had been made in the number of the naval cadets. The hon. Gentleman argued that this was incorrect, because the noble Lord had omitted to add the second-class cadets, who ought to have been added, in consequence of the decision of the present Board of Admiralty to keep up the rank of master by the entry of second-class cadets, which had been discontinued by the late Board. However this might be, and he had no doubt that his noble Friend could satisfactorily explain it, he desired to take the opportunity of saying that he heartily concurred in that decision, for he believed that nothing could happen more disastrous to the navy than the abolition of the rank of master. The maintenance of that rank was absolutely necessary in his opinion, as well as in that of the vast majority of naval officers, to the safety of the ships belonging to the navy, and the late Board of Admiralty never made a greater mistake than when they decided to abolish it. There was hardly a naval man in the House who would not agree with him in that. The hon. Gentleman had complained that the number of artificers in the fleet was too small. He believed it was; but he could not concur with the hon. Gentleman that it would be wise to increase their number at the expense of the Royal Marines. He had felt it to be his duty two or three years ago to call the attention of the House to the reduction which it was then proposed to make in the number of the coast guard and of the Royal Marines, for he considered that it was most dangerous to diminish the strength of those two most valuable naval reserves. He was still of the same opinion. The hon. Gentleman had next criticised the discharge of a certain number of female spinners in Chatham Dockyard, a point of detail that his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay), the Superintending Lord of the Department, would be able to explain satisfactorily. The next cause of complaint advanced by the hon. Gentleman referred to the diminution in the Estimates this year, as compared with the amount which ought to have been proposed under the Treasury Letter of 1865. The Estimate for Chatham would have been, according to the letter, £205,000 instead of £150,000, as proposed to be voted, and £312,000 for Portsmouth, instead of £228,000 for the extension of Chatham and Portsmouth Dockyards. The Estimate for Chatham was £205,000 this year, against £228,000 in the previous one; and that for Portsmouth was £228,000, against £312,000 last year. This diminution, however, was not in any way to be attributed to any disinclination on the part of the present Board of Admiralty to push forward the works in question. The fact was that, in consequence of the commercial crisis of last year, the late Board of Admiralty had not been able to complete all the contracts—some were even now incomplete, and therefore it was impossible to spend with advantage during the ensuing year a larger sum of money than that now proposed. The hon. Gentleman must know that he (Mr. Corry) would be the last person to keep back these dockyard works, because it was in a great measure at his instigation that they were undertaken. He knew that they were not very popular in the House; but if hon. Gentlemen were only acquainted with the absolute necessity of making the dockyards suitable to the altered dimensions of ships of war, and conditions of shipbuilding, they would agree with him that no money could be better laid out. The hon. Gentleman had next proceeded to advert to the shipbuilding charges in the Estimates, and had condemned the policy of building another ship of the class of the Inconstant before that vessel herself had been tried. No doubt, in ordinary cases, it was advisable to proceed in these matters with caution. But it must be remembered that other nations were building ships of this class in far greater numbers than ourselves. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the American ships had not been so successful as was anticipated; but he thought, and had always thought, that it was essential for England to have a few ships of extraordinary speed—of course, not armour-plated—for certain obvious purposes in the operations of war. He rejoiced, therefore, that it was proposed to build another ship of the class of the Inconstant. Two ships of this character were the very least we ought to have, and he hoped the new vessel would be constructed as soon as possible. The hon. Gentleman had next adverted to the delay that had taken place in the building of the Hercules and the Monarch. The present Board was not to blame for that. The cause of delay in the case of the Hercules was, he believed, that some of her plates had proved defective, and that a considerable time was lost before other plates could be supplied by the contractors; and the progress of the Monarch had been impeded by an accident to the caisson of the dock in which she was being constructed, which had necessitated the suspension of the work until the damage could be repaired. But the portion of the Estimates which the hon. Gentleman had most severely criticised was that which had referred to the intention to build a large number of small vessels. Now, if there was one proposal in these Estimates more than another that had his (Mr. Corry's) entire approval it was this one. For the last six years the deficiency of small vessels in our navy had been a constant source of anxiety to him, for they were absolutely necessary for carrying on the service at our foreign stations, and also for the protection of our commerce in case of war. The hon. Gentleman had asked why was it necessary to build so many in one year? The answer was because hardly one had been built by the late Government during the last three or four years, and the consequence was a great deficiency of vessels of this class because hardly one had been built in previous years. He did not make this a matter of reproach against the late Board of Admiralty, for they had had plenty of important work on their hands in constructing the armour-clad fleet. But it was the fact that the construction of these small ships had been almost wholly neglected for the last three or four years, and during all that time their number was being continually diminished by ships belonging to this class, being broken up or otherwise removed. From a Return which he held in his hand, it appeared that since 1860, 151 steam ships of various classes under the rank of frigates—namely, corvettes, sloops and gunboats, had been removed from the list; and all of these were vessels efficient for war though, perhaps, in want of repair. Besides that, seventy-three sailing ships had been removed, so that the total diminution in the six years of old men-of-war of the smaller classes was no less than 224. The consequence, he need hardly say, was that there was an alarming deficiency of those small vessels in the navy, and he entirely concurred in the proposal in the Estimates for the re-construction of vessels of this description, though he admitted that the number intended to be built was large. The hon. Gentleman had next referred to the state of our foreign squadrons, and had proposed a large reduction under this head. The hon. Gentleman had admitted, however, that he was well aware of the pressure always put upon the Admiralty by the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office; and he (Mr. Corry) was able to say, from his own experience, that this pressure was absolutely irresistible. As an example, he might mention that in 1843 or 1844, when they were on the brink of a war with France, the whole of the naval force in commission in the Channel for the protection of the English, Irish, and Scotch coasts, consisted of one second-class paddle-wheel steam frigate. And this was no fault of the Board of Admiralty, which had for three years been endeavouring to organize a Channel squadron, but the moment a ship was reported ready for sea at Plymouth, or Portsmouth, or the Nore, or elsewhere, an application was immediately made for her, either by the Foreign or Colonial Office, on the ground of some specially urgent necessity that had arisen on some foreign station. The ship was accordingly sent off, and all the efforts of the Admiralty to form a Channel squadron were not successful until four years had passed away. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman that it was desirable that the Estimates for our foreign squadrons should be kept down as much as possible. But the hon. Gentleman had overstated, he feared, the extent to which the reduction could be safely carried. He had proposed to reduce the squadron on the China station, but they had an enormous trade to protect out there, and those seas swarmed with pirates. Their depredations had, indeed, been pretty well suppressed of late by our vessels; and four or five captured piratical junks were no longer seen at Hong Kong every month as used to be the case. Still, with such a trade the pirates had to be watched. Their imports in China were upwards of £20,000,000 every year; they had fourteen treaty ports in China, and five in Japan; and for the protection of these extensive interests they had a force of thirty-eight ships-of-war, thirty-five of which were almost of the smallest class; and the number of men composing their complement was 4,447. He should be very glad to reduce the cost as far as possible; and he would do all he could to effect that object. When his hon. Friend talked of the advisability of reducing the strength of their distant squadrons, he must remind him that he had not proposed anything of the kind when he was in office. On the contrary, the force on foreign stations was larger when the late Government was in office than it was now. Exclusive of the Mediterranean, there were in 1860, 20,000 men on the foreign stations; in 1861, 22,000; in 1862, 27,000; in 1863, 23,000; in 1864, 24,000; in 1865, 21,000; and in 1866 and this year, 19,000. So that the force last year and this was less than in any year since 1860, and there was a reduction of 8,000 men since 1862. He was not prepared to say that some reduction might not be possible on some of the stations ; and he would give his attention to the subject, with the anxious wish to bring the force to the smallest possible amount. He did not, however, think it would be wise, under existing circumstances, to reduce the naval force much lower than it was. As to the suggestion of his hon. Friend, that there should be a larger squadron at home instead of a large force abroad, if the Government adopted that view, they would be at once entering into rivalry with naval forces of other Powers, who would also have their large fleets at home, and the old race of competition would be revived, which would not in the end lead to economical results. The foreign squadrons, also, were of the greatest possible use in keeping up the skill of officers and men ; and in that respect it would not be wise to reduce them to too low a mark. Home squadrons never saw the same amount of real service at sea, and consequently neither officers nor men had the same opportunities of acquiring a knowledge of seamanship as when serving on distant stations. With regard to the state of the lists nothing could be more unsatisfactory. In consequence of the scheme of Retirement of 1846, of which he (Mr. Corry) was the originator, and of that which was subsequently introduced by Sir Francis Baring, the captain on arriving at the top of the list from which he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, was twenty years younger than under the old system. In 1846, the senior captains were of thirty-eight years' standing which had been reduced to eighteen by the retirements to which he had referred ; but although these and other retirements had relieved the list to a certain extent, they had encumbered the retired lists to an almost intolerable degree, until there were almost enough admirals and captains to man one of those fleets on the coast of China. This was an unsatisfactory state of things, and it should have his anxious attention. In considering the state of the lists he could have no better adviser than his hon. and gallant Friend near him (Sir John Hay), and it would give him great pleasure if some plan could be devised to meet the evils to which his hon. Friend had called attention. His hon. Friend had suggested a plan which he (Mr. Corry) believed was the plan proposed by himself in his evidence before the Retirement Committee in 1863. It was that instead of only retiring officers when they had attained to high rank, they should also give encouragement to subordinate officers to retire, which would be attended with greater economy, while it would contribute to the comfort of the officers themselves, enabling some, perhaps, to settle in Australia, others to marry, or establish themselves in other lines of life. It might be more satisfactory to officers than putting them compulsorily on the retired list, which caused many of them to spend the remainder of their lives in grumbling. He would give his attention to this as to the other subjects which had been mentioned. Not having been concerned in preparing these Estimates, and, as his right hon. Friend wished to offer some remarks to the House, he would not intrude himself longer on the Committee, but he would be willing to give any further information that might be required during the progress of the discussion.

MR. SAMUDA said, that in round numbers £500,000 was asked for in these Estimates in excess of the amount asked for in the previous year. The state of the iron-clad navy at the close of last Session was by no means satisfactory. In July last he had called the attention of the House to its inefficiency, compared with the navies of foreign States—his views were generally concurred in, and he had the satisfaction of observing that the statement which he then made, pointing out the necessity of a very considerable increase in the iron-clad fleet, received the sanction of his right hon. Friend who, till lately, filled the high position of First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington), and who was responsible for the present Estimates. He had expected, therefore, to see in the present Estimates some suitable provision for an addition to that portion of our fleet ; or, at all events, that any sum asked for the increase of the fleet would be principally devoted to this important object. He found, however, that of all the sums asked for in the shipbuilding Vote, only the small sum of £570,000 would be available for increasing the iron-clad portion of the fleet beyond the previous provision made in last year's Vote. He wished the Committee to fix its attention on this important fact. No less than £2,751,000 was the amount which the country became engaged to spend in shipbuilding under their Estimates, and it consisted of the following items :—In the contract works £275,000 was to be spent for a turret ship on Coles' system ; in screw ships and gun-boats, £745,000 ; for engines, £634,000 ; making a total of £1,651,000 ; in addition to which the dockyards were to undertake works of great magnitude, to the extent of 23,544 tons of shipping, of which only 6,300 represented iron-clads, and this would give a further sum of £1,080,000, or a total of £2,730,000, which the country would be bound to pay now or hereafter. Of this sum the amount to be spent in the present financial year was £1,850,000, out of which only £744,000 were due to iron-clads; but again this sum has to be reduced by £174,000, because the programme of Estimates of 1866-7 of the late Admiralty provided to advance the two iron-clads Hercules and Monarch 5,652 tons, while they have been advanced only 2,750 tons; and therefore after accepting the obligation of their predecessors, and the money voted by Parliament to carry it out, they had reversed that policy and diverted the money to other uses, and £174,000 of the present year's money must therefore be spent before the iron-clads are advanced to a stage that we had a right to expect to find them at the present time; and the result is, therefore, that of all this enormous shipbuilding Estimate only £570,000 is applicable to the advance of the iron-clad fleet. Even last year many hon. Members agreed with him that the iron-clad fleet was not making enough progress, but this had thrown us still further back. The objection now was not only that the quantity of work had been diminished very considerably, but that the Vote had been diverted from the purpose to which Parliament intended it to be applied—namely, iron-clads—to a totally different class of vessels, a course only to be justified by a state of war, or by an emergency so sudden and so severe that no opportunity could be afforded to submit so serious a change to the House. Then there were thirty or forty vessels falling within the category of gunboats, and ranging between 600 and 900 tons, on which the Admiralty were about to spend £600,000. He might be told that the vessels to be replaced were rotten. If so, why restore them with vessels likely also to become so? These were wooden vessels. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: Composite, with iron plates.] He doubted whether a composite ship was longer lived than a wooden one; because the injury resulting from contact between the wood and iron counter-balanced any benefit that might in other respects arise. The restoration should have been in iron and not wooden ships, and it would have been better to have substituted vessels of 1,200 tons, carrying one or two cupolas, and covered with armour, by which means they would have had real fighting ships most useful in supplementing the navy as well as in acting independently on foreign stations. But the proposed vessels were precisely the description which were referred to by the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) as vessels to be avoided, because they could neither fight nor run away, and a great responsibility rested on those who had recommended the expenditure of so much money on vessels of such an ephemeral description. Again, with regard to the quantity of vessels proposed to be built, after what the requirements had been stated to be by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox), he thought the building of the thirty-five gunboats might have been postponed. The noble Lord referred to "two" vessels being wanted for Africa, and "some" for the Pacific, and in no way referred to the requirements for this class of ships as being of such magnitude as to necessitate thirty-five new vessels of this generally admitted objectionable class. He had not the same objection to make to the eight sloops of 1,250 tons, as they were vessels of moderate size and good speed, and therefore suitable to the protection of commerce; but he should not have expected that his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) would have magnified the Lilliputian navy at the expense of the iron-clads; and looking to the objectionable character of the gunboats, to which he had already referred, it did appear to him a responsibility of the gravest character to engage the country in an expenditure of nearly £750,000 in such craft, and he hoped his right hon. Friend the present First Lord of the Admiralty will be able to tell the House when it reaches Vote 10 that he has re-considered this Vote with a view to its modification. While on the subject of wood vessels, he would refer to the noble Lord's statement of the Admiralty's intention to break up the old wooden first rates, which were treated by them as obsolete, and in accordance with which decision ten had been already sold to the breakers for £85,000. If they were pronounced rotten he should not complain of their being broken up; but reference was made to a proposal the Admiralty had received to convert them into armour-cased turret-ships, which was at great length shown to be impracticable. Now he was not about to propose to convert these vessels into armour-clad turret-ships at once, but he was about to protest against breaking them (or at least many of them) up, and dispossessing the country of them—he had himself turned his attention to the advisability of converting those ships—he had subsequently abandoned that idea, from reasons wholly apart from any difficulty in the operation, but because it was doubtless better to add to the navy from time to time with iron hulls, which are much more enduring and better in every way; but the possession of the old first rates as a lay by and a reserve is invaluable in the event of war becoming imminent, because notwithstanding the condemnation and the declared impossibility of making any conversion of these ships, he had gone carefully into the matter in conjunction with Mr. Oliver Lang, and they both were of opinion that in twelve cases at least, a very satisfactory result would be obtained, and twelve most formidable vessels could thus be obtained in one-third the time it would take to build them, and for a cost of only £100,000 each, and though not possessing the durability of iron hulls, few persons will doubt the advisability of having such a means of supplementing the navy on an emergency, and the impolicy of dispossessing yourself of it as it exists. The names of the vessels he thought would pay for conversion were (three-deckers) the Howe, the Victoria, the Marlborough; (two-deckers) the Bulwark and the Robust, which were building, the Anson, the Duncan, the Atlas, the Defence, the Renown, the Gibraltar, and the Revenge. To revert to the Estimates, it was also proposed to build two armour-clads of 3,700 tons each, which would be entirely armour-clad, and which would have semi-turrets on their upper decks. He regretted, however, to find that the Admiralty proceeded upon no regular system, all was shifting, there is no stability, no general character that guides and underlies all their productions, and forms a sound base for all their operations. Of the large vessels of our iron-clad fleet they had almost as many classes as ships. Twenty-four ships had been built and were building, and these were divided into six classes. Of the Warrior class there were four; of the Achilles and Bellerophon class, nine; of the Agincourt class, two; of the wooden-plated frigate class, five; of the cupola ships, three wholly covered and one partially covered. They had in these two ships a seventh class, and now the House was called upon to sanction an eighth class—the Inconstant—in which the ships were altogether denuded of armour. He could not approve of this last class. Supposing that a vessel of the Inconstant class came in contact with one of the Agincourt class; the former of these was expected to make fifteen knots, and was supposed to trust to her great fleetness and her powerful guns; but the Agincourt had made fifteen-and-a-half knots, and was wholly plated, and carried guns at least as many and as powerful, with this important difference, that the Agincourt can attack them with shell, and their destruction will be both swift and certain; the Inconstant can only reply with shot, for shell will not penetrate her adversary's sides, and the unarmoured vessel can never live the time necessary to inflict even serious damage with solid shot. How, therefore, could the Inconstant hope to gain an advantage over such a vessel? He protested against placing English lives and English honour in such peril. He entreated the Admiralty not to be led away by the circumstance that some other nations were building similar classes of ships. It was necessary that we should rely upon our own judgment. He thought the Departments ought to found their general policy on the experience of those whose duty it was to take a large range of view in reference to this matter. Last year he had suggested that a committee of scientific and practical men should be brought together for the purpose of devising some general policy; but if his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty did not approve that plan, he ought to use his own judgment, and to form a sound and broad policy on which the future re-construction of the navy might be founded.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT said, that at the present time, when science was making advances hitherto unexampled, and when all the great maritime Powers were strengthening their navies, too great care could not be given to the subject of the construction of our vessels of war; economy and retrenchment in careful forethought should be observed before they were commenced, but only as compatible with the integrity of the national defences. Indeed, it must be obvious to all men of common sense and common observation that, looking to the insular position of this country, to our mercantile strength and vast commerce, and to the distance between us and our numerous colonies and dependencies, this was a point of most vital importance. He was glad to say that the nation had always most willingly borne the expense necessary to maintain the navy in an efficient condition; all it at any time had demanded had been a rigid supervision of expenditure, and that under the vigilant eyes of this House the means placed in the hands of the Government should be employed in a manner deserving the cordial support which Parliament affords, and the enthusiastic unanimity of the country, which is its sanction. As regards ships of the Warrior class, his opinion was that their length was so great that they were not handy in rough weather and cross seas. Then, again, in consequence of their great length, a considerable number of men was required to man them. There was already a sufficient number of vessels of this class, and we required ships of not more than 4,000 tons, which would be far more handy, capable of carrying beyond failure their armament, easily to be turned either tacking or wearing—which these lengthened ships very imperfectly perform, and require much sea-room. And let him impress upon the Board of Admiralty, as a point of the first importance, that mode of construction to ensure an identity of speed both when under sail or steam. Some of our timber ships of war had been sold, in number thirteen; no less than 246 still remained. They jostle each other in a state of ordinary in Portsmouth, in Hamoaze, in the Medway. Sell these incumbrances; they only are formidable on paper, decaying piecemeal at their moorings, each year becoming of less value, each year increasing in necessity for repairs, whilst they give a delusive appearance to the strength of our navy. There had been since the year 1827 no fewer than seventeen First Lords, seventy changes among the Junior Lords, and fifteen Secretaries, having held office under the uncertain tenure, the condition of membership of a Board of Admiralty. Every such change the late Controller of the Navy (Sir Baldwin Walker), when examined before the Royal Commission to inquire into the state of the Navy, conclusively proved had necessitated a different arrangement, and constant alterations in the Royal Dockyards. Economy in such a fluctuation of opinions he pronounced to be a simple impossibility; and yet to such constantly changing Boards were committed the sacred trust of our navy, the very right arm of our National strength, with all its manifold departments—the manning of the fleet; supervision of dockyards; building, equipment, and repair of vessels; determination of the best modes and material of construction and naval architecture; supply of stores; control of expenditure; and, in a word, the maintenance of our navy in a state equal to any emergency, indispensable to the security of our commerce, the safety of our shores, and the continuance of our honour and freedom as a nation. This plain statement of the mischievous results which are the consequences of the irresponsible constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and the frequent changes at the Board, has a force of argument which no expression of his could deepen; and without party spirit or injurious reflection upon any individual, he could assure the House he merely had spoken for the welfare of a service whose well-being was bound up in that of the Empire itself. He believed that the remarks of the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), though they had occasioned a smile, would be read by the country with regret that the feelings of honourable men had been—though unintentionally, of course—deeply wounded. How did it happen that there were so many retired admirals, captains, commanders and lieutenants living upon the taxation of the country? The reason was this. From 1791 to 1818 no less than 997 men-of-war were commissioned—a number which of course gave employment to a great many officers. When the services of these officers were no longer required they were placed on half-pay, where they remained from 1818 until the Crimean War, when some of them were called for. They were thus prevented, the most of them, from rising in their profession, from seeking employment in other directions, achieving higher professional honours, while the solitary pittance which they received was not the sort of income which any hon. Member would wish his son to be compelled to live upon. Those men ought not to be treated in an indifferent manner, or to be spoken of as they had been, especially when it was considered and remembered that most of them were as old as himself. They could not live long, and if the country could not employ them they should not be spoken of disrespectfully. If they were referred to at all, it should not be in a disparaging and ungenerous tone, as unwelcome as it was undeserved.

SIR MORTON PETO said, there was no part of the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox's) statement on a previous night which did him so much credit and gave so much satisfaction as the statement with reference to the decrease of the amount for repairs. He trusted that the Board of Admiralty would feel that it was their policy to pursue that course, and at all times to give it their most earnest attention. Enormous amounts had been consumed in repairs, and unless great care was taken in the construction of our vessels, the result which the noble Lord had indicated, and which the House had much reason to hope for, would not be attained. The recent failure of France in her construction of wooden ships armour-plated—they having come home after severe weather in a most unsatisfactory condition—ought to be a lesson to this country. He believed that the real fact with regard to those vessels was that they were constructed of wooden frames, covered on the outside with iron armour. Four vessels, indeed, constructed by the French Government, and one of which was the Gloire, were, he believed, looked upon as inefficient, and that fact ought to set us a warning in the construction of our vessels. Such vessels needed constant repair. It was very undesirable that the stores and controller's departments should be distinct one from the other; because until the controller was entirely responsible for the stores, they would never obtain that responsible management which was necessary both for the efficiency and economy of the service; and he hoped the present First Lord of the Admiralty would give it his serious attention with a view to the amalgamation of the two departments under one responsible head. He was surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) state that the accumulation of timber in the dockyards was owing to the pressure put upon the Department by that House. In 1862 and 1863, reductions of the Vote for Timber were moved in Committee. He had himself moved in 1863 to reduce the Vote on Account of the purchase of timber by £250,000; but although Lord Palmerston stated that no more wooden ships were to be built, there were at that time 112,000 loads of timber, sufficient to supply the navy for five years, taking the average consumption as a data. It was a well-known fact that the Duke of Somerset purchased the whole of the timber that was now proposed to be re-sold with money that was distinctly voted for iron vessels, the conduct being justified on the ground that the money was voted under the head of stores. The timber so bought without authority from the House was now being re-sold at an immense loss to the country, and this was the result of the manner in which the Duke of Somerset had employed money which was voted for the construction of iron-clad vessels. Such a mistake would, he hoped, be a warning for future Administrations, and no Board of Admiralty sitting on either side of the House would ever, he hoped, again take such a liberty—a liberty which, in this instance, had resulted in very great loss to the public. He had taken pains to inquire into the quantity of iron ballast in the dockyards, and from an advertisement of the sale found that there were about 35,000 tons, chiefly of Swedish iron, fit for malleable purposes, and worth, on the average, £4 a ton, and a further quantity of 35,000 tons used as ballast on board ships in ordinary. As to our colonial dependencies and foreign squadrons, he thought that a great reform was required, and he hoped that the Admiralty would consider whether there could not be a combination with other Powers, so that a joint policy might operate where protection of trade was required. This might, he thought, be done to put down piracy in China, where the French had a number of admirable steamers, and where also they had a large trade to protect. As to the African squadron, he questioned whether it would not be better to have several fast steamers upon the coast than having vessels, as at present, to ascend the rivers. He hoped, also, to see a combination of the offices of the Admiralty, instead of having one set of offices at Whitehall, and another set at Somerset House. He ventured to think that much of the correspondence pressing upon the Department to which the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) had alluded would be rendered unnecessary if Whitehall and Somerset House were brought under the same roof. On the minds of the members of the Committee which recently investigated that subject there had been a conviction no less strong in favour of the concentration of some of the dockyards. He trusted the recent change at the Admiralty would not deprive the House of the prospect held out by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) of the re-constitution of that Department with a single Minister in a position of power and responsibility.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox) gave a clear and full explanation of these Estimates on a former evening. His statement has been followed up to-night by my right hon. Friend the present First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry), so that very little is left for me to say. Inasmuch, however, as I was connected with the formation of the Estimates, I trust the House will allow me to offer a few remarks. In the first place, I would acknowledge the extremely fair and temperate manner in which, by every speaker on the opposite side of the House, these Estimates have been referred to, especially by my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers). My hon. Friend, indeed, rather complained of the extent of the Estimates; but he hardly showed his usual fairness in mixing these up with all the other Estimates called for by the requirements of the country with which these have little to do. No doubt the Estimates are, on the whole, in excess of those of last year; but, while my hon. Friend naturally commented upon that fact, the Member for Tavistock complained that the Estimates were not large enough. [Mr. SAMUDA: The portion applied to iron-clad vessels.] I am afraid that if we had increased the building of iron-clad vessels to any extent it would have been impossible, owing to their great cost, to avoid a considerable increase of the Estimates. My hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract referred to the extra receipts of £450,000 in a tone of general approbation; but found fault with us for not making in the Estimate some charge for tramways, or whatever might be laid down in place of the iron taken from the dockyards. The only answer I can give to that complaint is that the arrangements for the sale of the ballast iron in the dockyard up to this time have hardly reached a point at which we are in a position to enter into an arrangement for repaving the dockyards with other material. At this very moment we are carrying on negotiations as to the best mode of bringing the iron to market; and the real point upon which I hope to receive the approbation of the House is, whether we are not taking a wise course in bringing this iron to market instead of leaving it where it is. I throw no blame on the late Board of Admiralty for being misled, as I think they were, with regard to the value of this property. They made inquiries; in fact, they proceeded to sell some of this iron, and could get but a very small price for it; but that was in consequence of the mode in which they set to work. When we first commenced inquiries we were told by persons who ought to be very competent judges, by persons in the Arsenal at Woolwich, that they did not consider the iron to be valuable; but we followed up our inquiries by further investigation, and I think a very moderate estimate is made when I say that, after allowing for any expenses that may be involved in repaving the yards, we expect to receive into the Treasury a sum of no less than £100,000 for this iron. The hon. Member also approved our scheme of selling certain ships; but the hon. Member for Tavistock cautioned us with regard to the sale of ships, and conveyed the impression that these wooden ships could still be converted into valuable iron-clad men-of-war. [Mr. SAMUDA: On an emergency.] Even supposing he is right in his belief, let me remind him that there is no reason why we might not sell a considerable number of these vessels. There are now in our harbours between 90 and 100 line-of-battle ships and frigates; that is to say—58 line-of-battle ships, and between 30 and 40 frigates. A revolution has taken place within the last few years, and those ships are maintained at a cost of £1,000 a year each. They are deteriorating every year, and for the purposes of war they are practically obsolete. Clearly there is no necessity for retaining so many of them. Some of them, no doubt, will become useful for hospitals and other purposes; but we cannot think of retaining 90 or 100 of those wooden line-of-battle ships and frigates at a cost of £1,000 a year each. It was my intention if I had remained at the Admiralty to send more of them into the market, and I had hoped to realize not less than £200,000 in that way this year. But some of them I intended retaining, believing they might be turned to some useful purpose. In consequence of the strong statements published by Mr. Henwood, the Admiralty thought it right to refer the question to the professional advisers of the Board, who, as the House is aware, are very able men; and their opinion was that, looking to the construction of those ships, it would be a waste of money to convert them into armour-covered men-of-war. Then, as regarded the timber in the dockyards, my hon. Friend asks who is to blame for the large quantity in stock. It is rather late to enter into that question now; but, if I remember rightly, Lord Palmerston was the great advocate of keeping up a large stock of timber in our dockyards. Even in the days of wooden ships it was not thought necessary to keep more than 60,000 loads; but we found more than 100,000 loads in store. I think it will be the best economy to sell this before it is further deteriorated; and I believe that the total receipts to the Treasury on account of the sale of timber will exceed the estimated £400,000. [Mr. STANFELD: What price will be obtained?] It will vary; but, as well as I remember, the difference between the buying price and the selling price is about one-third. My hon. Friend the Member for Tavistock complained very much that we had not built more iron ships; but if he looks at our Estimates he will see that we do propose to make a considerable addition to our fleet of iron-clad ships. We have just commenced the Captain, which will be for a trial of Captain Coles' arrangement of turrets. She will be a sloop of 4,000 tons, built entirely under the direction of Captain Coles. We determined that a large wooden man-of-war, commenced some years ago, and on which £50,000 had already been laid out, should be converted into an armour ship. We shall have two ships of 3,700 tons, whether they are to be ranked as first-class or second-class I do not know, nor do I think it matters much; but they will be very powerful. They are to have the half turrets on each side—a very valuable invention—and by means of this arrangement will be more effective than the ordinary broadside vessels built on the turret principle. I was very sorry to hear the criticism of my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract on the second Inconstant. The building of the first ship was part of the policy of the late Board of Admiralty. When we came into office we found that she was in progress, and we had to address ourselves to the question whether she was not a class of ship which the country required. Looking at what was going on in other countries, we found that the United States were building twelve of this class. [Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE: They are building six of the larger class and six of the smaller.] I believe very much in the vigour of the United States, and when I had the pleasure of seeing the Secretary of the United States Navy in this country some time ago, he made no secret of it that his department looked upon these ships as the most effective men-of-war, and capable of acting against the commerce of other countries. The Government of France also has adopted the policy of having ships of great speed, capable of going to sea as cruisers, and also capable of carrying, as far as their guns go, very heavy armour. As to the Agincourt, she is a very valuable ship; but she is a ship of 7,000 tons only, being 3,000 tons smaller than our Inconstant. Does my hon. Friend really think that such a ship would be as efficient as the Inconstant in protecting the commerce of this country? I wish to say a word respecting the complaint as to the number of small vessels which we propose to build. I cannot refer to this subject without making some allusion to an answer which I made in this House soon after I came into office last year, and which I am afraid was taken for what I did not mean it to be—an attack on the late Board of Admiralty. I was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) what was the state of our reserves. In reply, I could only say that our reserves were not in a satisfactory state. I had great difficulty in sending reliefs to foreign stations; and this arose from the want of small vessels. For many years there has been, and there still is, a regulation, that in our ports we should retain a certain number of ships as a reserve for emergencies. It appears, however, that the regulation had not been regarded, because when one vessel, the Bombay, was burnt, there was no ship to take her place, and when the Amazon was sunk, there was not one to take up her duty. The hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) called attention to the Minute of Sir Frederick Grey, which we found at the Admiralty. I regret that the hon. Member's unwillingness to take that Minute in the way it was offered, has prevented it from being laid on the table. I was not aware of the contents of that Minute when I made my statement; but when I saw it subsequently, I found that it confirmed the answer I had given to the hon. Member for Liverpool. It referred only to the small vessels; but as regarded those vessels it said that there was not one to send out. We are now building those small vessels. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) alluded to this point, and I wish to call his attention to these facts. The Board of Admiralty has now only two sloops, two frigates, and three gunboats fit to send out as reliefs to foreign stations. In the years 1864 and 1865, twenty-five paddle steamers, twenty-two screw steamers, and five paddle steamers of a large size, making in all fifty-two vessels, were got rid of from the navy. Fifty-one gunboats were likewise got rid of within those two years, making together upwards of 100 vessels put out of the service as useless. I make no complaint of that; but I say the fact that upwards of 100 vessels having been got rid of within the period I have named, fully accounts for a deficiency. The policy of the present Board has been not to spend large sums of money in the repair of obsolete vessels. [Cheers.] I am glad to hear that cheer, and accept it as the Committee's approval of the Government policy, which has already been commended by the hon. Member for Pontefract. I think I should surprise the House if I were to recount the sums spent in repairing vessels which, after all, were not fit for the service. Compared with the prime cost of these vessels the sum spent in repairing them has been immense. We have, therefore, determined to abandon repairs of this nature, and devote the labour thus saved to the construction of new vessels of a better type. This is the answer to the regret of the hon. Member for Pontefract that we were proposing to build so many small vessels; it is necessary that we should build a good many in order to supply the place of others returning from foreign stations. I now come to what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire upon a former occasion, with regard to the policy of maintaining our squadrons upon foreign stations, and also to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Pontefract upon the same subject this evening. The latter referred to three periods, giving the extent of our foreign squadron in 1846, in 1856, and in 1867. That, no doubt, answered the hon. Member's purpose very well; but I think it would be better, considering what has been said upon the matter, to give a full statement, and refer to what has been the policy of the country not at periods of ten years apart, but during the last seven years. I hold in my hand a statement which I have had prepared of the number of ships and men and the aggregate tonnage of the ships on the 1st of January in each year, from 1860 to 1867 inclusive, and I should like to give the House a few of these items. This statement, unlike that of my hon. Friend's, includes the Mediterranean and all foreign stations, and I find that, although from 1860 to the present time the change has not been very great, it has been in the direction of a gradual reduction, so that the amount of our force on foreign stations has been considerably less during this year than it has been during any former year since 1860. My hon. Friend adopted the plan of mentioning the number of men; I will mention the tonnage as well as the men. In 1860, then, omitting the tens and units, the men numbered 35,700, and the tonnage summed up 189,800. In 1861 the men numbered 38,500, and the ships' tonnage 202,400. In 1862, the men 48,900, and tonnage 209,300. In 1863, the men 32,500, and the tonnage 187,300. In 1864, the men 32,200, and the tonnage 190,300. In 1865, the men 28,900, and the tonnage 173,600. In 1866, the men 27,000, and the tonnage 167,500. In 1867, the men numbered 24,800, and the tonnage 160,500. Thus, the Committee will see that the aggregate force upon all our stations in the year 1867 is considerably less than it has been during the last seven years. Now, I will refer to that portion of the hon. Member's statement concerning a squadron which excites greater interest and greater doubts than any other—I mean the West African squadron. With regard to that we come generally to the same result. In 1860 the men on the West Coast of Africa numbered 1,900, and the ships consisted of 11,400 tons. In 1861, the men were 1,900, and the tons 10,800. In 1862, the men were 2,100, and the tons 13,700. In 1863, the men were 1,900, and the tons 14,700. In 1864, the men were 1,800, and the tons 14,800. In 1865, the men were 1,300, and the tons 14,300. In 1866, the men were 2,300, and the tons 17,900. In 1867, I find the men are reduced to 1,500, and the tons to 12,700. So that this year the West African squadron is smaller than it has been in any former year since 1860. [Mr. CHILDERS: Does the Return include the flag ship?] The figures I have quoted do not include the flag ship; but with that addition, even the comparison I have drawn would be very little altered. I have made these remarks, Sir, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), referring to my noble Friend behind me (Lord Henry Lennox), alleged, as I understood him, that it was improper to maintain a foreign squadron at so high a rate. The hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) has offered a similar opinion to-night; but I ask him how it happens that, during the whole seven years in which he or his Colleagues were in office, similar doubts with regard to the propriety of these foreign squadrons seem never to have crossed their minds. The present Government succeeded to office only last summer, so that I do not wish to claim credit for having reduced the foreign squadrons to their present condition. But I wish to point out to the Committee that the recently announced views of the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen were not declared until the invigorating air of the other side of the House prompted them to doubt the expediency of continuing these foreign squadrons, which they maintained in greater force and in greater strength during their term of office; though I do not in the least blame them and their Colleagues for having done so. The question, however, remains as to how far we ought to maintain these squadrons, and to what extent, if any, we can afford to reduce them consistently with carrying out the services they perform in contributing to maintain our position as a maritime Power. If we had not squadrons in various parts of the world, we should be unable properly to check piracy, nor should we be able to carry on other national objects. There is only one more point to which the hon. Member for Pontefract alluded, saying a great deal that is most painfully true, but which has been said very often before—namely, the encumbered state of the Navy List. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the immense burden we have annually to support on the half-pay, the retired, and the reserved lists, which, as he observed, extend over nearly every letter of the alphabet. He knows well how great is the difficulty connected with this subject; for when men have once served the country, you cannot cast them adrift. This state of things results from the great naval power which we were obliged to maintain during the great war; for on the return of peace we found our Navy List so large that we were never able to bring it within the limits that could have been desired. The hon. Gentleman's suggestion—namely, whether some plan might not be adopted for buying out these officers, and so effecting an economical settlement without doing them injustice, is not a novel one; and I confess I think it would be very well worth trying. But there is another thing which it is incumbent on us to do, and that is to be very careful not to introduce into the navy a larger proportion of officers than is likely to be required for the service. Without wishing at all to deviate from that proper absence of party spirit which has characterized this discussion, I must say I think the late Board of Admiralty was not so cautious in this respect as it might have been. The first thing we had to do on coming into office last summer was to make a reduction of one-third in the number of cadets entering the service, through the list of cadets, midshipmen, and sub-lieutenants having become so crowded. We also found that the assistant clerks had been admitted to a very imprudent extent, so that the list was clogged; making it hopeless for them to rise in their profession or to have justice done to them; and we were therefore obliged to put an entire stop to the entry of them. I have felt it my duty, owing to my connection with these Estimates, to make these remarks; and I have to thank the Committee for the attention which it has accorded me.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to ask whether the addition to the second-class naval cadets would not really bring the numbers up to the point where they stood before the first-class cadets were reduced?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that when he spoke of the undue admission of cadets, he spoke not so much with reference to the aggregate of officers on the Navy List as with reference to the midshipmen and sub-lieutenants, and other ranks more immediately above them, which choked it up and prevented all hope of promotion.

MR. STANSFELD moved that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. CORRY said, he would not then press the Committee to proceed further; and he would fix the resumption of the Navy Estimates for Friday evening. With reference to the flag ship on the African station, the Admiralty had been obliged to send so large a ship there because they had not at the time a smaller one for that particular duty. It was proposed, however, as soon as possible, to replace the Bristol by a smaller vessel, and transfer her to another station.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES ACT REPEAL
BILL.—LEAVE.

MR. MACEVOY said, he moved for leave to introduce a Bill for the repeal of this Act. As he understood no opposition would be offered at that stage, it was unnecessary for him to trouble the House with any observations.

MR. O'REILLY said, no one could feel more strongly opposed to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act than himself—one of the first acts of his political life being to aid in depriving of his seat a personal friend who had not voted against that measure. He could not but ask, however, what would be the practical result of this Bill? If the hon. Gentleman were able to say that he had any assurance from Her Majesty's Government on the subject, or if he could hold out any hope of bringing the matter to a successful issue, he would have his best support and assistance. All, however, that the hon. Gentleman had stated was that the Bill would not be opposed at the present stage. He had been anxious to know what was the opinion entertained on this point by the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical authorities in this country and in Ireland, who felt most sensibly the injustice and pressure of the Act. He had accordingly had communications from the Cardinal Archbishop of Dublin, and also from the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh and the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cashel, and he had communicated personally with the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster. He was therefore able to say that, much as they felt the injustice of the Act—and Dr. Manning had remarked how hard he felt it on him, as a Christian Bishop and an Englishman, daily to be obliged by a higher duty to violate the statute law of this country—the present proposal was no suggestion of theirs, and they did not feel it part of their duty to raise the question at this time. They feared that to do so would only lead to an idle agitation which would hinder more practical and serious measures. He could not express this feeling better than in their own words, and he would therefore, with the permission of the House, read two very brief extracts. The first was from the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cashel, who said—

"This is not the time to ask for a repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. That question can very well wait for a while. At present the Irish Members ought to concentrate their energies upon the land, the Church, and the education question."

The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh said—

"It should be repealed; but if the discussion of it just now would have the effect, as I believe it would, of drawing off attention from matters of much more practical importance to Ireland, it ought to be postponed."

In those sentiments he entirely concurred. The law was, he believed, useless and unjust, and he hoped the good sense of this country would in time—and that a brief time—assent to its repeal. He saw, however, no good practical result which was likely to flow from raising the question at the present moment. If the hon. Gentleman could elicit from the Government a distinct expression of their opinion on the matter, then he might be doing good service. From those on his own side of the House, he required no such expression of opinion, because in 1851 they had the courage to stem the popular current, and to speak words of truth. If the Government were now merely to say that they would not oppose the introduction of the Bill, he held that such a statement would be no avail. He, under those circumstances, could see no advantage which was likely to arise from the hon. Gentleman's proposal.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he should rejoice to think that there was any prospect of success likely to attend the Motion of his hon. Friend at the present time. They must all do justice to the generous motives which impelled him to make this Motion, to undo a great wrong inflicted upon a mistake and a misunderstanding. The Roman Catholic hierarchy of England and Ireland were stigmatised as guilty of a misdemeanour in doing that which was only their duty in accordance with their religious convictions. He believed a great mistake had been committed in passing the Act which it was sought to repeal—a statement the justice of which he hoped the good sense of the English people would lead them before long to acknowledge. He did not, however, think that public opinion was ripe for the change proposed; and he therefore thought it was desirable that his hon. Friend should not press on his Bill at present.

MR. WHALLEY said, he understood that Archbishop—he begged pardon, he meant—Dr. Manning had expressed his regret that he was obliged to break the statute law of the land every day, and if the House of Commons and the Government allowed the law to be so broken, he should be disposed to second the proposal for the introduction of the Bill. He wished to know whether the Government meant to support this Bill? He contended that the concessions which had been made by the present and previous Governments had never been fairly submitted to public opinion.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am only desirous of making a remark which appears to me to be called for by the speeches which have proceeded from my hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly), and the hon. Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer). Prima facie, this Motion is one for relieving from certain civil disabilities the prelates of the Roman Catholic Church in this country, and we have had rather a striking declaration on the part of Gentlemen, than whom no other two Members in the House can be better qualified to represent the opinions of those prelates—that although they are convinced that the law inflicts upon them a wrong, yet, in view of the public interests and of more pressing demands, they do not wish to see the time of this House occupied and the temper of parties embittered by discussions which may, after all, prove fruitless. And I will never sit still and hear a declaration so wise as that which the hon. Members have signified as proceeding from those affected by the Act, without doing them the simple justice of saying that it does them the highest honour both as regards their judgment and prudence. In respect to the Bill itself, I confess on this occasion, I have on one point the satisfaction of coinciding with my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) who feels—and feels justly—that it is a very considerable scandal that we should have a law of this description, which law no man volunteers to put into execution. I do not depart in any particular from the opinions which sixteen years ago it was my duty to express in this House at the time of passing this Act. The question then was, whether what I, for one, thought was a grievance, should be inflicted. The question of grievance to the parties who were the objects of the Act was a very material point. Another material point was the evil which ensued when a law was permitted to exist, which law could not be enforced. But is the time favourable for the introduction of the Bill of the hon. Gentleman? That is the whole case I wish to represent to the House, and the point to which it reduces itself. For if the circumstances are not favourable, surely it is not to be desired by any rational man, whatever his views may be, that he should stir up controversy and animosity unless he thinks a practical object can be attained. I ask myself, Is it to be attained? I confess the answer entirely depends on another question—which there is no one here to reply to—What are the intentions and views of Her Majesty's Government? I am unauthorized to speak for Gentlemen on this side of the House, or to utter more than the opinions I venture to form; but I do venture to form an opinion that as far as this side of the House is concerned, the hon. Member who makes this Motion will find little difficulty in the prosecution of his enterprise to a successful conclusion. But what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government? Will the second reading of this Bill and its later stages be supported or not by Her Majesty's Government? If they will be, then I say, by all means let us go forward with the Bill. If it will not be supported by the Government, then, in my opinion, having such adversaries in his face, the hon. Gentleman's undertaking so opposed will be rendered hopeless by reason of that opposition. If there is not the assurance of support, let the hon. Gentleman make his Motion, and I am not the man to oppose it, but it will be singularly sterile in its practical results. We cannot ask any Gentleman opposite, who is probably not in possession of the views of the Cabinet, to speak for them; but it would be desirable that my hon. Friend the Member for Longford and his friends should make it their business to ascertain the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as to the course they mean to pursue with respect to the ulterior stages of the Bill.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, that during the last two days there had been floating rumours about the lobbies that Her Majesty's Government would support the Bill, and one of the organs of the Irish Executive, The Irish Times, had stated, on information received from this side of the Channel, that they were determined to do so. Now, in the absence of any Member of the Cabinet, he should be glad to hear from the Solicitor General for Ireland whether there was any truth in those rumours.

MR. REARDEN said, he had not expected to hear such expressions as had fallen from the hon. Member for Longford

(Mr. O'Reilly) with regard to an Act which would be a disgrace to Roman Catholics as long as it remained unrepealed. He had more confidence in the support of Her Majesty's Government to this Bill than some Members on that side of the House. He could remember a time when the throats of Roman Catholic Members were very near being cut in the streets of London. From that time the Liberal party under Earl Russell had never been a strong one, and but for the influence of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), it would have been smashed up. They were as much buried politically as Lazarus was bodily, and the right hon. Gentleman accomplished their resurrection. If Roman Catholic Members did not support this Motion they would have a sorry account to give to their constituents.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, he agreed in the opinion that the action of the hon. Member for Meath on this occasion would lead to no result. After the opinion expressed by the Roman Catholic prelates, who had taken a part on the side of law and order, he thought that the House had a right to know what course the Government—of whom he saw two Members though not members of the Cabinet present—would pursue in respect to the Bill.

MR. M'KENNA trusted that nothing which had been said or quoted by the hon. Gentlemen who were opposed to the introduction of the Bill would prevent its being read a first time. It was not usual at this stage to press the Government for an expression of opinion; but as hon. Members had it quite in their power to elicit the opinion of the Government at another day, he hoped that they would not prevent the Bill from reaching the point when all would be able to test the disposition of Her Majesty's Government. For his own part, he could not help believing that much of the indisposition of hon. Members to the introduction of this Bill arose from tenderness of feeling towards the head of the late Government, whose supporters they were. The noble Lord the head of the late Government, who now sits in "another place," was the author of this disgraceful Act, now sought to be repealed, and it was perhaps a pardonable consideration for his feelings which induced the hon. Member, who had quoted letters from distinguished prelates, to write to them in such a strain as to elicit their most commendable postponement of their own case to that of the laity; but for his (Mr. M'Kenna's) part, not having before him the communications which elicited these letters, he thought he would show greater consideration for the distinguished writers by giving his heartiest and most unqualified support to the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Meath, and by doing his utmost to remove from the statute book an Act which was not only a perpetual insult to Catholics, but a reproach to any Administration which permitted it to remain on the statute book simply to offend the well-disposed, and to be violated openly.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on the Bill would be very important. Those who valued the independence of the country, and the declaration made by Lord Russell on this subject, must object to the repeal of this Act. It was to assert that independence that the whole of the nation was roused. The people were most tolerant, but he believed it would be a rash act to repeal this law. The thirty Irish Roman Catholic Members were representatives of a foreign power in that House, and the people desired a reform of the House of Commons mainly because they found one party pitted against another, who were ready to throw out any bait to secure the votes of Irish Members. The feeling was growing strong in the country against that course of proceeding, and it was prudent on the part of the hon. Member to seek the repeal of this statute before the House of Commons should be reformed.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that no one would support the Motion of his hon. Friend sooner than he would, if he thought that his hon. Friend was the authorized representative on the occasion of the Roman Catholic body, or, if he saw any chance of its obtaining the support of Her Majesty's Government; but, in the absence of any Member of the Cabinet, he did not think it would be right to call upon any Member of the Government present to express any opinion on it. One of the most unhappy recollections of his Parliamentary life was connected with the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, which he had, in conjunction with his right hon. Friend near him, resisted. He would suggest that the second reading of the Bill should be fixed for the earliest day possible, in order to give the Government an opportunity of stating their views.

Mr. Bearden

MR. ESMONDE said, he would ask the representative of the Dublin University (Mr. Chatterton) to express the opinion of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. BRYAN said, he hoped to hear what was the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on the question.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he thought the Act wrong in its inception; but he doubted whether the Mover of its repeal was not unhappy in his selection of a time for proposing it.

MR. MACEVOY said, he had not anticipated that the Bill would have met with such a reception from his friends. One hon. Member (Mr. O'Reilly) had brought down upon him the authority of the Church, but, as far as one prelate was concerned, he believed his opinion had been somewhat exaggerated by the hon. Member [Cries of "Name!"].—he referred to the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster. He had had no opportunity of testing the views of the other prelates referred to. He still clung to the hope that the House would be prepared to allow the Bill to pass a first reading. He joined with every other hon. Gentleman who had spoken in the expression of anxiety to learn from the Government what course they would pursue when the Bill came on for a second reading. The measure seemed to have fallen on hon. Members like a shell, almost like a Reform Bill. They all knew that there was no anxiety in the House so great as the anxiety lest the occupants of the Treasury Bench should introduce a satisfactory measure of Reform; but suppose the Government should take larger views than they were believed to entertain with regard both to Reform and this question, and deal with them in a liberal way. He had seen some changes in the opinions of Members of the House; and he was much inclined to think that the Government would disappoint the Gentlemen who had now made such telling speeches against him. ["Oh, oh!"] As far as he could judge, the speeches appeared to be directed against the course he had taken, and nothing had been left undone that could embarrass him in what he had undertaken. He certainly did not expect that at that hour (twenty minutes past one) a debate would be got up against the wishes of the Mover of a Bill like that, when it was well known to hon. Gentlemen that the Government had no intention of opposing its introduction, and when it was well known that in all probability no Members of the Government would be in the House, seeing that the first reading of the Bill was a mere matter of form. He was, however, willing to join them in expressing a desire to learn what course the Government would pursue, and he should be disappointed if the answer of the Government did not disappoint hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House.

MR. BRADY said, he did not think this subject should be allowed to lie dormant, and he gave the greatest credit to his hon. Friend for the introduction of the Bill. He disapproved the way in which this Bill had been met by the Irish Members, and complained of the silence of the Government.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, he thought the statute not only obsolete now, but obsolete from the time it passed.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) said, that the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), and the right hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Chichester Fortescue), understood his position better than to expect him to express any opinion upon a question like this. All that he could say was that he had no special communication with the Government on the subject. The only intimation he received was that the Bill would not be opposed on the first reading, and it was not expected that any discussion would take place. The question was not peculiar to Ireland; certainly, it was not in his department.

MR. COGAN said, he thought it was due to the House that some Member of the Cabinet should have been present. He did not think that discussion was desired, and perhaps this was another part of the "organized hypocrisy." He hoped the Bill would be withdrawn. He believed it to be a political sham, though not so intended by his hon. Friend, likely merely to delude the country. He called attention to the opinion expressed by the Roman Catholic ecclesiastics on the subject.

MR. WHALLEY: I rise to order. I wish to know whether the hon. Member is not out of order in quoting a Roman Catholic ecclesiastical authority.

MR. SPEAKER: The interruption of the hon. Member seems to me without foundation.

MR. WHALLEY: Is it in order to mention these ecclesiastical authorities?

MR. SPEAKER: There was nothing out of order in the speech of the hon.

Member, and nothing to justify interruption.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to repeal the Act of the fourteenth and fifteenth Victoria, chapter sixty, intituled "An Act to prevent the Assumption of certain Ecclesiastical Titles in respect of places in the United Kingdom, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MACEVOR, Mr. M'KENNA, and Mr. LEADER.

THAMES EMBANKMENT—SHEILDS' PETITION.—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. LOWE said, that he also had an Irish grievance. He moved for a Select Committee to be appointed to inquire into the facts stated in the petition of Mr. Francis Webb Shields. That gentleman's plan for the Thames Embankment had been selected out of those of fifty-nine other engineers as the foundation of the plan upon which that great work had been carried out under the superintendence of the engineer of the Metropolitan Board of Works. Mr. Shields had been put to considerable trouble and expense in preparing his plans for the competition, for which he had received no compensation whatever. He thought the case was one which deserved to be inquired into.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Petition of Francis Webb Shields, C.E. [presented 8th March], relative to the Thames Embankment, be referred to a Select Committee to inquire into the allegations thereof and to report their opinion to the House."—(Mr. Lowe.)

MR. HUNT said, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would not object to the debate being adjourned in consequence of the absence of the First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners), who had left the House under the impression that the Motion would not have been made at that late hour (five minutes to Two o'clock).

MR. LOWE said, he must decline to assent to the adjournment of the debate. It was the business of the First Commissioner of Works to be in his place when such a Motion was likely to be made.

MR. HUNT moved the adjournment of the debate.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—STATISTICS.—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL STANHOPE said, he observed it had been stated in the House of Commons that a Return of great importance would be laid upon the table of that House—he believed it was to be produced that night—illustrative of the number of persons that may be expected, under the proposed Reform Bill, to have votes, and in other respects having an important bearing on that measure. Now, he thought it was very desirable that their Lordships' House should also have the same information; and he hoped, therefore, that the noble Earl at the head of the Government would consent that whatever information was laid before the other House should also be produced to their Lordships.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought the request of the noble Earl perfectly reasonable. He had no difficulty in promising that their Lordships should have all the information that may be laid on the table of the other House.

COLONIAL CHURCHES.

PETITION.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY rose to present—

"A Petition from the Bishop, Clergy, and Lay Representatives of the United Church of England and Ireland, in the Diocese of Sydney, Australia, praying that no Steps may be taken which will enable Bishops to be consecrated in and for the Colonies in a Manner contrary to the recognised Rules of Ecclesiastical Policy and the Ordinances of the United Church of England and Ireland, or which will in any Way affect the Relation of the Members of the Church in the Colony towards the Church in the United Kingdom, or weaken the Connection between the Church in the Colony and the Church in the United Kingdom."

It would be in the recollection of their Lordships that when the measure to which this petition referred was introduced into Parliament last Session considerable doubts were expressed as to what would be the effect of the measure, and among others he himself expressed his doubt whether it would be acceptable to the parties for whose benefit it was professedly intended; and he suggested, on the withdrawal of the Bill, that advantage should be taken of the interval to ascertain the opinion of the colonies, in order that Parliament might not legislate on a question of such importance without giving the parties affected an opportunity of being heard. It so happened that, by the force of circumstances, that Bill was not proceeded with, and the question remained unsettled, though it was understood that the Government intended to introduce a measure to the same effect in the course of the present Session. The interval between the two Sessions had been employed by some at least of the colonies in considering the subject; and the result was the petition he held in his hand, signed by 120 of the clergy of the diocese of Sydney, which was the metropolitan see of the Church of England in Australia. The prayer of the petition was in effect that no such measure as that of the last Session should receive the sanction of their Lordships, and specifically against the proposal contained in one of the clauses of that measure, whereby a colonial Bishop might have been consecrated by the laying on of hands of a single Bishop, as contrary to the universal practice of the Church, which had always been that the consecration must be performed by three Bishops. It was therefore clear that the measure of last year, in the opinion of the united synod of the colony, lay and clerical, would have been most injurious to their feelings. He believed that a similar petition from the diocese of Melbourne was in the hands of a noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon), and no doubt the feeling of other colonies was very much the same, and he could not but congratulate their Lordships on the delay which had fortunately interposed to prevent the passing of that measure. It had always seemed to him that it was a very short and perfunctory mode of dealing with the unquestionable difficulties incident to the relations between the colonial Churches and the mother church, merely to turn them loose, and leave them altogether to themselves. Yet this was, in fact, the purpose and object of the Bill of last Session. Many of the difficulties which existed, or were supposed to exist, when the Bill was introduced, had since been diminished to a considerable degree by the decision of the Master of the Rolls, from which it appeared—and the decision had not been overruled—that there was not that total failure of effect in the patents of the Crown which had been supposed, and whatever difficulties might exist, surely arrangements might be made by which an appeal might be secured for the benefit of the colonial Churches to the ultimate resort of the Privy Council. He was aware that that course was not very agreeable to certain parties, for there had been growing up of late a very great aversion to the jurisdiction of that Imperial, or indeed of any civil courts in ecclesiastical matters. There might be objections to the constitution of the Privy Council; but he could not but think, whatever objections might exist, that we should not impose on the daughter Churches against their will the necessity of abstaining from appeal to that tribunal which decided all similar cases in the mother Church. He desired to express his strong feeling that the question referred to in the petition was one that ought to be referred to a Committee of their Lordships' House, in order that the difficulties connected with it might be fully investigated before the whole House was called upon to come to any decision on the subject. With these observations, he begged to lay the petition upon the table.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he was confident there was a great misunderstanding as to the intention and effect of the Bill of last Session. The noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby) had spoken as if the effect of the measure would be to deprive the members of the Church of England in the colonies of the appeal to the Privy Council which the Church of England now enjoyed. But that would in no way have been the effect of the Bill. The appeal would remain precisely on the same grounds as the appeal of any other religious body. Since the close of last Session, when he addressed the House at some length on the subject, and, in consequence of the observations he then made, one or two communications had been addressed to him on the part of colonists; and, as far as he understood them, they did not seem to understand the question, and appeared to think that there was some connection between the Crown and the Church of England in the colonies which did not really exist. As the Master of the Rolls had said—

“The United Church of England and Ireland is no part of the Constitution in any colonial settlement, nor can its authority or its Bishops claim to be recognised by the law of the colony, otherwise than as members of a purely voluntary association.”

That dictum was incompatible with the desires and wishes expressed in so many letters from the colonies. The supremacy of the Crown could not be maintained within the colonies in the same sense in which it was maintained here; the supremacy of the Crown could be maintained in the colonies only so far as it meant supremacy of the law.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I am glad my noble Friend (the Earl of Harrowby) has brought the subject again before your Lordships. The question of the connection between the Home and the Colonial Churches is one of great difficulty, and the more it is discussed the more shall we be likely to come to some understanding upon it. The question is how that connection shall be maintained? and it is one on which, undoubtedly, great diversity of opinion prevails. My noble Friend has presented a petition which spoke anxiously in behalf of Bishops being consecrated in England for the colonies, and in behalf of the supremacy of the Crown being maintained as in times past. With regard to the consecration of the Bishops here, there can be no difficulty on the part of the Bishops, but there may be a difficulty in the way of the Crown compelling it. I received by the post yesterday these four answers to questions which had been put by my right rev. Friend (the Bishop of London) in a circular addressed to colonists, with the view of ascertaining the feelings of both the clergy and the laity on the points referred to. The answers are those of one to whom the circular had been addressed:—

“1. I cannot see why the Bishops of British Colonies should receive their mission from the Archbishop of Canterbury, or why, as the English gives and does nothing for the help of the Colonial Church, we should be hampered by its patronage and interference. Such an arrangement would, I conceive, be a source of delays, inconvenience, and weakness; and the English Church would not, I think, be acting the part of a friend if they claimed the right, which would not fail to damage us in the judgments of the other Protestant bodies.

“2. A court of appeal so distant would, I conceive, be worse than worthless, and would be utterly beyond the reach of the poor man. It would, therefore, be a court of appeal only for the rich; while it would clearly imply that we in the colonies are not worthy of being trusted in the management of our own affairs.

“3. The Royal supremacy question has, I believe, been virtually settled by the Judicial Committee of the House of Lords. Our Bishops, if I recollect rightly, have been told that they can exercise no authority under the Sovereign, and that we are on equal terms with the other bodies. I am unable, therefore, to see that the Royal supremacy is an element of our condition here.

“4. Unity of doctrine and discipline is, I conceive, the great bond by which we are united to the Church of England; and our New Zealand Church constitution provides that this link shall be maintained inviolate. Whether for good or bad the mother must now part with her child in this island, and she will show her good feeling by frankly wishing it ‘God speed.’”

I thoroughly believe that that is the best security that can exist, and I do not know that you can find any other which you can force upon the colonists. As to forcing upon them the Royal supremacy, you cannot do it in the way it is done here. Here the Sovereign is supreme in all causes, ecclesiastical as well as civil; but then ecclesiastical causes must go through Ecclesiastical Courts. In the colonies there are no Ecclesiastical Courts; therefore, no ecclesiastical causes from the colonies can be brought before the Committee of the Privy Council here. I quite admit that these causes may come through a different channel to the Committee of the Privy Council; they may come through the civil courts in a civil aspect. There are several parallel cases in which doctrinal matters have been dealt with by the civil courts. The case of Lady Hewley's charity will be familiar to many of your Lordships. In the time, I think, of Charles II. Lady Hewley left an endowment for the maintenance of godly ministers, which ultimately fell into the hands of the Unitarians. The matter went to the Committee of Privy Council, and as the persons to whom it had been left held views different from those of Unitarians, the endowment was taken from the Unitarians by the civil court, and given back to those who brought the matter before the court. So in like manner similar matters from the colonies may come before the Committee of the Privy Council. Suppose a voluntary contract were entered into, the Colonial Court is bound to maintain it in the way laid down in the fourth answer. A clergyman preaches doctrine that is held by the Synod to be contrary to the doctrine of the Church of England; the Synod deposes him; he appeals to the civil courts, they ratify the judgment of the Synod, and he appeals to the Privy Council. That is the mode of proceeding that is still open to either party; and therefore neither is, in any way, cut off from the protection of the Crown. It has been said more than once—"What is to become of these separate Churches? They may drift into all sorts of doctrine. One Church may become Romanist and another Socinian." But they might just as easily have done this before as they can now. What was there to have prevented the Church in New Zealand becoming a Roman Church if it chose? Between the colonial Churches and the mother Church in England, there is the strong tie of reciprocal affection, and there is also, I may add, the tie of interest; and the connection between them may be thus maintained just as strongly and securely in the future as it ever has been in the past.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I have a petition to present to your Lordships from the Bishops, Clergy, and Laity of Victoria, and its prayer is much to the same purport as that of the petition presented by my noble Friend. My noble Friend states that his petition deprecates any steps being taken—

"Which will enable Bishops to be consecrated in and for the colonies in a manner contrary to the recognized rules of ecclesiastical policy and the ordinances of the United Church of England and Ireland."

I must say I fail to understand what is the real meaning of the petitioners in using these words. A few weeks ago I entered very fully into the subject, and I need not repeat what I then said; but I beg the House to remember that a mandate would be issued, through the Archbishop, for a consecration in this country; while for a consecration in the colonies it was unnecessary that the Crown should issue a mandate—and, indeed, it would be against the dignity and credit of the Crown that the Sovereign should be advised to issue a document which, upon the face of it, could not be of any validity in the colonies. Your Lordships will remember that there is an alternative to the appointment of Bishops by the Crown, and that in Canada Bishops are elected by diocesan synods with the most complete freedom. The Bishops are the principal parties to the petition which I have the honour to present to your Lordships' House. The Bishop of Melbourne is even in favour of the colony of Victoria electing its own Bishops, although it is true he desires that the formality of a confirmation of the election should be gone through. I gathered from the petition which was read by my noble Friend, that the petitioners insist upon the maintenance of the old canonical rule that three Bishops should be present at every consecration. Now that I believe is a very wholesome rule, and I have never heard that there was any intention to depart from it. And here I must, in justice to the right hon. Gentleman who was my predecessor in the Colonial Office (Mr. Cardwell), state that my right hon. Friend did not contemplate, either directly or indirectly, when he introduced his Bill in another place last year, to take any step which could be fairly said to be at variance from the ecclesiastical policy and ordinances of the Established Church of England and Ireland. As for myself, I challenge any one to point out an act of mine which would justify the supposition that I intended to take such a step. Then the petition presented by my noble Friend goes on to refer to a larger and far more important question. The petitioners pray that no steps may be taken which might tend to weaken or impair the connection subsisting between the colonial Churches and the mother Church of this country. The only objection I have to that part of the petition is that the petitioners assume as a fact that such steps have been taken or have been contemplated. Now neither my right hon. Predecessor in office, nor any Secretary of State, nor any Government of late years, has done anything to weaken that connection—and for this simple reason—that there is no longer any connection to weaken or impair. The petition then asks that the colonial Church may always be considered an integral part of the Church of England and Ireland as by law established. But let us see what is the meaning of those words. They seem to me almost to be a contradiction in terms. If the petitioners are using these words in a doctrinal sense, and mean that the colonial Church accepts the same standards of faith, and is bound up in the same unity of doctrine, observances, ritual and liturgy with the Church at home, then I agree that the two Churches are one; and in that sense I trust that the colonial Church will always remain an integral part of the Church of England and Ireland. But, if used in any other sense, what is the meaning of the expression, "the Established Church of England and Ireland?" The Church of England and Ireland is, in fact, constituted by statute. As far as its legal status is concerned, it is created under the Act of Union, which combined the two Churches of England and Ireland. It is a very elaborate organization, and in that organization the Bishops and clergy of the Church of England and Ireland have certain recognised positions and functions. But what colonial Bishop or colonial clergyman has any share whatever in this organization? The most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) and my noble Friend have touched upon the Royal supremacy; and no doubt this question ultimately resolves itself into that. I spoke in your Lordships' House upon this subject a short time ago, and therefore I shall not make many remarks upon it now. I must, however, point out that the Royal supremacy has really no part or action in reference to the colonial Church. Of all the powers which the Royal supremacy is supposed to carry with it there is not one, with the exception of the appointment of Bishops, which has ever been exercised by the Crown in those colonies which are possessed of independent Legislatures. I think it will be admitted that if the Royal supremacy was possibly carried by settlers from this country to distant colonies, it must have been carried wholly or not at all. I myself entertain the opinion—which I believe is held by the highest legal authorities—that the Royal supremacy was never carried into distant colonies by settlers from this country. If, however, I should be overruled in this particular, and it be held that these settlers did take out the Royal supremacy with them, the question would arise whether they carried it out altogether. If it went out altogether it was, of course, subject to curtailment, abridgment, and abrogation just in the same way as it might have been modified in this country. And, indeed, the Royal supremacy has been modified in this country by a succession of statutes. It has been modified also in the colonies—in Victoria, for instance; in Canada, too, it was reduced to the merest shadow by an Act passed some ten years ago; and by the recent judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council it was reduced to a shadow in all the colonies which are possessed of independent Legislatures. Therefore, to raise the question of Royal supremacy is to raise up a mere phantasm. I admit that there are considerable difficulties in the present position of the colonial Churches; but those difficulties are to a great extent of our own making. My Lords, I have a strong sympathy with those Churches. I believe that very much has been done by them in their respective colonies, and therefore I should be sorry that the remarks I am about to make should be in any way misapprehended. We have committed the great mistake of training the colonial Churches in a spirit of dependence on the mother Church. We gave these Churches false and fictitious supports, which have been suddenly swept away. The Churches consequently find themselves placed in a position of extreme difficulty and embarrassment. I should not be at all surprised if at first they fail to perceive that their real strength does not rest so much in statutes and Acts of Parliament as upon their own inherent strength—their own inherent power of drawing closer together the bonds of that spiritual union which has hitherto connected them, and will, I trust, in all times, connect them with the mother Church. But we have also created other difficulties. Successive Governments have advised the Crown to issue letters patent to the colonial Churches, and the colonial Churches have acted on the supposition that these letters patent were valid. Suddenly, however, everything is changed, and it is discovered that the letters patent are null and void. The consequence is that questions are arising with regard to the legal and proper transmission of Church property in the colonies, and as to the position of the Bishops and the validity of the acts done by them, and as to the status of the clergymen ordained by these Bishops. Then if you look beyond that, as it was my duty to do a short time ago, you find a mass of legislation which would perplex any lawyer, and which to a layman is absolutely bewildering. That legislation was conducted at different times, by different persons, and under different circumstances. The same words and the same phrases are used in different senses in different Acts. I believe there are two ways of dealing with the difficulty. First of all, you may sweep clean away all this mass of conflicting anomalous and irreconcilable legislation, and place the whole matter on a simple and intelligible basis. That, in my opinion, would be the best, the simplest, and, if I may use the expression, the most workmanlike way of proceeding. If it be objected that that scheme is too large and extensive, the next best plan would be to repeal those particular clauses which inflict great inconvenience, and even personal hardship, and to place the law with regard to the admission of Bishops and clergy and the transmission of Church property on an intelligible basis, which should be fair and equitable as regards other sects. I do not consider it necessary to carry the subject further. I have thrown out suggestions for the consideration of my noble Friend the noble Duke (the Secretary of State). I trust he will give those questions his best attention, and carefully entertain those measures of procedure which I have just now described. I am sure this is a matter which presses for decision; but, at the same time, it is one of those questions which I should rather see not legislated on at all than legislated on hastily. I have only further to remark that while those difficulties do exist and are such as ought to be removed by the Government and Parliament, on the other hand I do not think that the colonial Church is in that hopeless condition which many persons have represented it as occupying. There are synods in almost all our free colonies. You have the organization of a great voluntary association. But the difference between such an association and an established Church, I take it, is this—that whereas an established Church rests on the law, and the members of it have a status in the eye of the law, the voluntary organization is not recognised by the law, and the members of the voluntary association have no legal status. Thus, a parish clerk in the smallest parish of the country has a legal status, while a Roman Catholic Bishop has as such no status at all. This is the position in which the Church of the colonies is placed. She is placed in the position of a voluntary association, whether that may be for the better or whether it may be for the worse. The Crown is supreme in controlling the terms of the contract, whether expressed or implied, between the various members of the body. In that sense, and that sense alone, the Crown is supreme. The colonial Church receives the protection which the Crown gives; she receives all the advantages which a civil court can give; but I do not apprehend that she has, or that she could have, the power of appeal, in ecclesiastical cases, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. If there is a question of appeal, it must come as a civil question raised on a point of fact, brought from the civil courts in the colonies to this country. My Lords, though, no doubt, the petition which has been presented by my noble Friend, and that which I am now about to present, speak in common terms, stating as they do that there should be a connection established between the colonial Church and the mother Church of this country. Do not let us deceive ourselves in supposing that this is the feeling of each and all the colonial Churches. I think it right to say that there is a great division of opinion on the subject, and it is well to recognise the fact. It is perfectly true that the Synods of Sydney, Melbourne, and Adelaide, are agreed in favour of a connection with the mother Church of this country; but the Synod of Canada repudiates anything like the connection asked; and we know that in New Zealand no less than five Bishops, supported, as I understand, by the concurrence of the clergy and laity of their dioceses, have tendered their resignation of letters patent back into the hands of the Crown. Therefore I say that we have no right to suppose that these two petitions represent the common view, or in any degree the general sense of the colonial Churches. Therefore, the only safe course to adopt is, to respect in ecclesiastical matters just as we have with regard to civil matters the perfect freedom on the part of the colonists to self-government. This is the one great principle to observe, and if we stray out of that track it seems to me that we shall involve ourselves in difficulties. To attempt to build up upon a shadowy foundation of prerogative in the colonies a quasi-established or privileged Church would be to confer on them a useless and, I hold, even a mischievous boon; and, in the next place, it would inevitably place Parliament in collision with the colonial Legislatures; and I venture to say that in that conflict neither this House nor the other House of Parliament would ultimately prevail. I beg, my Lords, to present the petition of which I have given notice.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I beg to explain to what I understand the petitioners to allude when they ask that no legislation may take place which contravenes the usages of the Church. There was a clause—the 10th in the old Bill—introduced, I presume, per incuriam—which contained a provision wholly unknown in the practice of the Catholic Church—it enacted that a Bishop might be consecrated by one instead of by three Bishops ; but that Bill having been withdrawn we have nothing to do with it now. What we have to regard is the prospect of legislation in the future. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) seems to think there is no real force in the desire expressed by the petitioners that the supremacy of the Crown should be maintained; and he showed very lucidly how difficult it is in the totally different circumstances of the colonial Churches to maintain the Royal supremacy in the way in which it is maintained at home. But I think the noble Earl has not done sufficient justice to the importance of one point—namely, the consecration of Bishops under licence or mandate from the Crown. I attach much importance to that point on account of a recent decision, as your Lordships are aware, of the Rolls' Court. Many think that by the decision to which I refer a great deal of light has been thrown on this complicated question, while others no doubt think it has made the question more obscure. But be this as it may, that decision has been much canvassed in the colonies ; and, as I understand it, the result of the judgment of the Rolls' Court is that a Bishop consecrated under licence or mandate from the Crown is in a different position from a Bishop consecrated without that licence or mandate. The judgment lays down this—that if a Bishop be consecrated by the authority of the Crown and goes to a colony with a territory assigned to him, within that territory he has the same powers as a Bishop at home, with this difference, that, whereas the latter may make good his claim by appeal to his own court and to that of the Archbishop, such a Bishop in the colonies can only make good his claim in a civil court, which, in consequence of his having been consecrated by mandate or licence, will maintain his power according to the law of the Church of England. If that be law, it makes all the difference whether a Bishop be consecrated by licence or mandate from the Crown or not ; and therefore the petitioners are not desiring anything altogether impossible or useless when they ask that the Royal supremacy may be maintained. What they desire is simply this—that matters should remain in statu quo—that the decision of the Rolls' Court, which has not been appealed against, should remain the true exposition of the law as regards the status of Bishops now in possession of sees, or quasi-

sees, in colonies. My reason, however, for rising is to express my full concurrence in what fell from the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) and the two noble Earls, when they fully acknowledged the great importance of this subject, and the propriety of its being considered with reference to the opinions of the colonists themselves. We received a general statement last Session of the desire of the colonists to be altogether set at liberty, as it was called—from the fetters by which they were bound to the Church and State at home. It is now acknowledged that there is a great diversity of opinion on this subject, and this is a very important point. I mentioned on a former occasion that I had taken the liberty of writing letters to many of the Bishops and clergymen in the colonial dioceses ; and in that manner I have obtained a full explanation of the opinions entertained in thirty of these dioceses. My own calculation is that colonial opinion on the subject is pretty equally divided between those who wish to be free and those who desire to keep up the connection as pointed out in the decision of the Rolls' Court. It may be true that these persons scarcely understand the whole difficulty of the matter ; but if the subject be brought before us in the shape of a Bill it would be of the utmost importance that the Bill should go before a Select Committee, and that evidence should be taken as to the opinions and wishes of the colonists. I hold in my hand two petitions—one from the Cape diocese, and the other from the diocese of Grahamstown. These are, I believe, an expression of the opinion of the minority in these places. It is of great importance that the opinion of the minorities in the several dioceses as well as of the majorities should be considered. The petitioners say it has been laid down by the Privy Council that in the colonies members of the Church of England are in the same position as the members of any other body ; but that they are not if you prevent them from that which they consider essential to their Church—namely, a connection with the Crown of England as regards the appointment of Bishops and a strict adherence to the doctrines and principles of the Church of England. It is true there may be a voluntary agreement to adhere to the doctrines and principles of the Church of England ; but, on the other hand, there may not, and persons who are attached members of the Church of their fathers may thus be forced into a position, which on principle they repudiate. A very strong feeling exists among the colonists in favour of maintaining their connection with the Church in which they were baptized, and to which their forefathers belonged; and that feeling is not growing weaker, but has been strengthened owing to the facilities of communication which now exist between the mother country and the colonies. In fact, is it not true that many of those who formerly looked forward to the entire separation of the colonies from this country, as was the case with the ancient republics and their colonies, have now modified their opinion, in view of the opportunities which exist for colonists to visit the mother country, and of the increasing desire manifested on their part to keep up their connection with Great Britain? The right rev. Prelate then presented the petitions he had referred to.

LORD MONCK trusted that in any measure that might be framed upon this subject we should not throw overboard in matters of an ecclesiastical nature the principle which had been adopted with such eminent success in civil matters—namely, that of leaving the colonists the most perfect liberty to manage their own affairs. That was the object of the Bill of last year, and such he knew was the intention of his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) to have carried out, had he remained in office as Secretary to the Colonies. He was satisfied that the connection between the Church of England and the Church in the colonies could not be maintained by any attempt on the part of Parliament to coerce them into uniformity; but by trusting to the identity of religious sentiment—to that good feeling towards this country and its institutions generally which he was happy to say prevailed in all our colonies. He could speak from his recent connection with our great colony of Canada, to the vitality, growth, and vigour which the Church had obtained in that colony from the complete freedom of government which it enjoyed; and he was sure, both with regard to the feelings of the country and the best interests of the colonies, they would do well to base any measure which the Government might be about to introduce on the principles which had been enunciated by his noble Friend.

LORD REDESDALE said, he condemned the practice of discussing this question on the assumption of a departure from unity of doctrine on the part of the colonial Churches. If he saw any danger of a loss of that uniformity, he should be ready to entertain the question; but he thought the apprehension expressed on the subject argued a lack of faith—evinced a want of faith in the truth and position of the Anglican Communion, which was highly derogatory to it. There was not the slightest danger to be apprehended on that point. All the evidence showed that if there had been any danger of that kind, it would have been realized in the Episcopal Church of America. The United States obtained their independence under circumstances ill calculated to foster any affection towards the secular or ecclesiastical institutions of the mother country; yet the Episcopalian body in that country, instead of deviating from the doctrines of the parent Church, came and sought ordination for their bishops in this country. The American Church, indeed, rendered great service in promoting friendly relations between the United States and this country, and this had been recently shown in a very interesting way. When the Civil War broke out, the Northern and Southern Churches naturally separated, in the expectation that they would belong to different commonwealths, but when the contest came to an end overtures for reunion were promptly made. There was some difficulty as to a bishop of either section preaching the opening sermon at the triennial convocation, and it was settled by the choice of the Bishop of Montreal, who went over to Philadelphia and took part in the consecration of some bishops, great satisfaction being expressed at his presence and fellowship with them; and it was a remarkable fact that he was the first bishop connected with the colony who assisted at the consecration of the American bishops. The Americans had always shown the strongest affection for the Church of this country. He thought there was at present no need of legislation to secure uniformity of doctrine in the colonial Churches. He hoped that in any legislation that might be adopted that nothing might be done or thought of upon that particular point. Some colonies might desire a connection with the mother Church in one form, others in another: and he did not see why the colonies should not be permitted to adopt their own views with regard to their connection with the Church in this country, or even to separate from it if they thought it best.

Their great object must be to sweep away that which had created the difficulty, and to do all that was encouraging, and that would give the greatest amount of liberty. And if they proceeded in that spirit he did not see the necessity of a long inquiry as to what their legislation should be.

LORD TAUNTON said, he had so recently expressed his opinion on this subject that he should not on the present occasion trouble the House with many observations. He had ever approached this subject with great distrust. Nothing could be more unfortunate than that schisms should arise in the colonial Churches—one party constituting itself a Free Church and the other continuing a sort of quasi-Establishment. It was fervently to be desired that the members of the colonial Church should guard against internal dissensions. The noble Lord (Lord Monck) had testified to the energy and self-reliance displayed by the Canadian Church after it had obtained the power of self-government; and the American Church, though it had had an independent existence of nearly a hundred years, had not, he believed, deviated in any material point of doctrine from the English Church, though it had made a few alterations in the Prayer Book, some of which were regarded as advantageous by many persons in this country. He trusted the Government would not permit the matter to rest, but would speedily introduce a Bill with a view to having the question settled. The Colonial Office had excellent legal assistance and the best information to enable it to prepare a satisfactory measure. He especially desired that the measure which he hoped soon to see would not be referred to a Select Committee, but that the whole responsibility would be thrown upon the House at large; and he trusted their Lordships would deal with the whole subject impartially and comprehensively.

EARL STANHOPE joined in the desire that the subject might be taken up by the Colonial Office; and he also hoped that the noble Duke now at the head of that Department (the Duke of Buckingham) might adopt the views of his predecessor in office in framing a measure to settle this difficult question. In asking him, however, his intentions with respect to this question, he did not press for hasty or precipitate legislation, for he felt that there would be difficulty in dealing with this question when there were matters of the utmost urgency pressing upon the attention of the House of Commons; but it would be satisfactory to the House and the country to know that an intention existed at the Colonial Office to put an end to the state of uncertainty in which those connected with the colonial Church were placed, so far as legislation could do so.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, he thought it would not be advantageous, having regard to future discussions upon the subject, if he were to enter at all upon the merits of the measures which had been suggested or to make any remarks upon the discussion which had taken place. He would, however, say that he participated very largely in the opinion expressed by his predecessor in office when he said it was advisable that the question should be submitted at no very distant day to the consideration of Parliament; and he also agreed with the remark that it was desirable when the question was submitted that it should assume the shape of a Bill introduced on the responsibility of the Government. Although some little delay might have arisen from official changes, he believed that in the course of a few days he would be able to submit to his Colleagues a measure which he hoped they would approve, and authorize him to introduce to their Lordships.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY, in reply, expressed his concurrence in the opinion that nothing of a coercive measure ought to be attempted. All that the colonists desired was that security should be taken in some form or another for the continued connection of the colonial with the mother Church.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON expressed his satisfaction at finding the Bill before their Lordships' House. The position of the metropolitan workhouses last year was absolutely discreditable and disgraceful; but he now hoped in twelve months' time to see a radical change, and the entire removal of those evils which at present existed. He congratulated his right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board upon the ability he had shown in dealing with this question; and he thought their best thanks were due to those inde pendent gentlemen who last year used their best endeavours to bring the condition of the London workhouses to light ; and to show the necessity for some radical change in their management. They no doubt felt great satisfaction at the result of their labours. About this time last year he urged upon the right hon. Gentleman who was then the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Villiers) the adoption of certain rules as the proper basis of a measure on this subject, those rules having been recommended by the highest medical and surgical authorities in the metropolis. The right hon. Gentleman frankly admitted the necessity of them ; and he was glad to find that they had, without exception, been embodied in this Bill by his successor. There were two other matters of an administrative character which he pointed out at the same time — namely, that the whole of the sick poor should be placed upon the common fund ; and that a central representative Board should be created in London for the administration of the Poor Law. In those respects the right hon. Gentleman had not quite carried out the principles which he had recommended. Under the Bill, one-third of the indoor poor and the whole of the outdoor poor, with respect to the dispensation of medicines, would be made a common charge. This was a valuable step in the direction he desired, and he understood that his right hon. Friend contemplated further alterations in the administrative system, and possibly looked forward to a Central Board armed with still larger powers than those given in the Bill. He cordially approved the measure, and rejoiced to find that it had now passed through nearly all its stages.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he also wished to state that he looked upon the measure as most beneficial, and he believed he might say that it had been so received by the country. It was read the other night paragraph by paragraph at a large meeting of working men, and every paragraph was received with the utmost satisfaction. There were, however, one or two points to which he thought it necessary to direct attention. The Bill proposed to deal with the insane hitherto confined in workhouses on an entirely new footing. It was intended to erect large edifices of the nature of branch workhouses for the reception of the sick and insane poor, some of those buildings being capable of accommodating as many as 500 patients.

It was necessary, therefore, to consider what was the state of the law as to placing and detention of lunatic paupers in such places. It had been decided that there was no power under the statute law to detain any one in a workhouse against his will, and difficulties sometimes arose from such inmates wishing to leave, and the masters endeavouring to detain them. Now that this transfer was to be made to large asylums it was absolutely necessary that a law should be defined—first, as to what persons were to be confined in the new buildings, as also the same protection against the detention of sane persons which was provided in the case of county asylums. The clause described those who were to be shut up in those asylums in the general term “insane,” but cases of insanity were very variable, and he thought that some attention should be paid to that point. Again, the mixing up under the old system of insane with sane paupers gave the protection to the former, in case of wrong or injury done to them, of the testimony of reliable witnesses, whereas this proposal would deprive them of that security. He remembered a prosecution for ill-using a lunatic in which, though the testimony of his companions was very clear and decided, it was naturally received with caution, and the accused was consequently acquitted. He knew that the Poor Law Board were empowered to make stringent regulations ; but he feared that unless the law respecting the admission of these patients were clearly laid down, the protection and treatment of lunatics might be unfavourably affected.

THE EARL OF DEVON was gratified to find that the Bill, as a whole, had the approval of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), whose zeal and interest in the well-being of the poor were so well known. With regard to the clauses relating to lunatics, he wished to point out, without expressing an opinion upon the special points to which the noble Earl referred, that the object of the Bill, so far as it went, was to ameliorate the condition of the insane poor. He thought that the condition of the insane poor would be greatly improved by their being placed in a separate asylum. The noble Earl had referred to the want of protection of the insane poor in these asylums ; but he would see that the 30th clause authorized the Lunacy Commissioners to appoint one of their officers a member of the board of management, and by that means they would be fully cognizant of the state of the poor in the asylum. The observations of his noble Friend would receive the careful consideration of the Department.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Monday next.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If the Lords of the Treasury in December 1865 received a Petition from the Clerks of the Convict Prisons, praying that their salaries might be increased, the same being recommended by the Governor Colonel Henderson; and if in December 1866 their Lordships received a further Petition from the same parties with the same prayer, and whether any decision has yet been come to regarding it, and if there is any hope that their expectations may be realized?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the present Question was nearly identical in its terms with one which the hon. Member put to him three weeks ago, and which he then answered. The petition sent in at the end of 1866 was received and the matter referred to another Department, and it was still under consideration. But he wished to point out to the hon. Gentleman that every question of that nature was, more or less, a remonstrance against the control exercised by the Treasury over public expenditure. Since he had held office at the Treasury they had had applications from almost every branch of the Civil Service for an increase of salary; and if every such application was to be followed up in that House by the putting of Questions like the present, it would be exceedingly difficult for any person in his position to retain a proper control over the public expenditure.

MR. J. M. HALL AND THE ROYAL BOUNTY FUND.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SIMEON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether a grant has been made from the Royal Bounty Fund to Mr. J. M. Hall, of Fisher Street, Carlisle; on what ground and at whose recommendation such grant was made; whether he is aware of the character and antecedents of Mr. Hall; and, whether the money so granted has been actually paid?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that an application was made by the person named by the hon. Gentleman to the First Lord of the Treasury for a grant from the Royal Bounty Fund, representing himself to be a literary person in distressed circumstances. Lord Derby believed the statement, and was about to direct that the issue should be made to him from that Fund; but it came to his knowledge that he was not a deserving person, and therefore the intention was revoked, and the grant not made.

IRELAND—TYRONE MAGISTRATES.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, that as he wished to make a statement on the subject of the Question he had upon the Paper, to call the attention of the Government to the observations reported to have been made by Mr. Justice Keogh, one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Queen's Bench in Ireland, at the Assize Court of the county of Tyrone on Friday last, with reference to the conduct of certain Justices of the Peace for that county, and the alleged consequent failure of justice; and to ask whether any and what steps have been taken by the Irish Executive or the Lord Chancellor for Ireland to institute a full inquiry into the facts of the case and the conduct of the Magistrates referred to, he would postpone his Question till the Motion for going into Supply.

MAJOR STUART KNOX said, he would appeal to the hon. Member to further postpone the discussion of the subject. He himself was one of the bench of magistrates whose conduct was impugned; and though he was not present on the occasion, yet he knew very well that every one of his brother magistrates were persons of the highest character. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER explained to the hon. Member that he was out of order in discussing a Question which was not properly before the House.

MAJOR STUART KNOX said, he hoped that the hon. Member's sense of justice would induce him to postpone the Motion, in order that he (Major Stuart Knox) might have time to procure the necessary information from Tyrone, which he was sure would enable him to refute every word alleged against the magistrates.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, that as his only wish was to ascertain whether justice had been done, he had no objection to postpone the Question till Thursday, when he would put it on going into Committee of Supply.

WEST INDIA COLONIES—GRANTS FOR RELIGIOUS PURPOSES.—QUESTIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can lay upon the table of the House a Return of the sums paid out of the Colonial Revenues of the different West India Colonies for religious purposes in the years 1864 and 1865; specifying the amount given to each religious denomination; also, Copies of the Colonial Acts or Ordinances under which such payments are made; and, also, whether he can inform the House if there be any fees, rates, or dues levied by Law for religious purposes in Jamaica; and, if so, under what conditions?

MR. ADDERLEY replied, that all the information required was already published in the several blue books of the colonies; but he had no objection to its being taken out and placed in one Return, if possible. There were some fees of the character referred to, but he was not aware under what conditions they were levied.

ARMY—FLOGGING—H.R.H. THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has made any official communication to his Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief relative to the Resolution lately passed by the House on the subject of Military flogging, and has invited his Royal Highness's consideration of the subject?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I have, Sir, no objection whatever to state, in answer to the hon. Member's Question, that I have had communication with his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief with respect to the Resolution to which the hon. Member refers; but I am sure the hon. Gentleman will excuse me if I say that I must reserve to myself a discretion as to the time when I shall inform this House of the result of that communication.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—WEDNESBURY AND WEST BROMWICH.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been drawn to the following statement of statistics with reference to Wednesbury, a town proposed to be enfranchised under the present Reform Bill, and West Bromwich, an adjoining town, namely:—That Wednesbury in 1861 contained 4,057 inhabited houses, West Bromwich 8,109; Wednesbury in 1861 had a population of 21,968, West Bromwich 41,795; that West Bromwich is the head of the Poor Law Union of which Wednesbury forms a small part; that West Bromwich is governed by special Improvement Acts, is rated to the poor in £107,000 per annum, has most important local manufactures, and between 1821 and 1861 increased in population from 9,505 to 41,795; that by the last Census West Bromwich contains 3,000 more inhabited houses than the highest of the proposed Boroughs and 6,400 more than the lowest, and has 13,000 more inhabitants than the most populous of such Boroughs and 29,500 more than the least; and, whether, if these statistics are to be relied upon and are, in fact, correct, he will have any objection to reconsider the question of enfranchisement with reference to Wednesbury, and either enfranchise West Bromwich or make some arrangement between West Bromwich and Wednesbury which will recognise the claims of West Bromwich to enfranchisement?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I understand, Sir, the Question of the hon. Gentleman to refer to the comparative claims of Wednesbury and West Bromwich to representation in this House. I fear that the hon. Gentleman, who I know has great claims upon his time, has not been able to give his attention to the character of the schedules to the Bill. If he had done so he would have found that though the district was to have the title of Wednesbury, the constituency referred to was really to consist of the inhabitants of both Wednesbury and West Bromwich.

DISTURBANCES IN IRELAND—REV. MR. MAGINN.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the fact that the Reverend Mr. Maginn, Roman Catholic Priest of Glenbegh, refused to be sworn as a witness on the inquiry relative to the affray in which Police Constable Duggan was shot, stating as the ground for such refusal that when he met the Fenians in Glenbegh he was acting as a Priest, and that he did not know any of the parties as he put a handkerchief over his eyes, the said Mr. Maginn being the person referred to by the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the 18th February as having acted boldly and loyally; and, further, that the Roman Catholic Bishop Moriarty, also referred to by the Chief Secretary as having "cursed" the Fenians, has expressed his entire approval of the conduct of the said Mr. Maginn in so refusing to be sworn; and, whether any further steps have been taken or are intended to be taken to obtain the evidence of the said Mr. Maginn?

LORD NAAS, in reply, said, he was not aware that any particular inquiry had been instituted into the occurrence to which the hon. Gentleman referred. If, as was implied by the form of notice which he had given the day before, Sub-constable Duggan had died, then, of course, an inquiry would take place; but as, he was happy to say, Duggan was now recovering, no coroner's inquest on his body had been held. No official information had reached the Government of any such occurrence as that indicated in the Question.

MR. WHALLEY: Did the noble Lord mean to say that there had been no inquiry made with respect to the affray in which Duggan had been shot?

LORD NAAS: There has been no particular inquiry; but informations have, of course, been taken in the case.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—MEMBERS FOR SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN WHITE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Statements made by him in the House that it is the intention of Government to increase the Representation of Scotland, and also that "the improved Representation of Scotland is not to be satisfied by the sacrifice of English interests," are to be explained by an intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to diminish the number of Irish Representatives?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, when I first read this Question I thought it was probably intended to convey a friendly intimation on the part of the hon. and gallant Gentleman as to the source whence the increased Representation of Scotland might be supplied; but it certainly is not the intention of the Government to provide that increased representation at the expense of the sister country.

CAPTAIN SPEIRS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he will inform the House as to the source from which he intends to provide the promised additional Representation for Scotland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, it somewhat ungracious on the part of the Scotch Members that after the announcement which has been made by the Government as to the increased Representation for Scotland they should press also for information as to the means by which the supply is to be found. I would beg the hon. and gallant Gentleman to have confidence in the bounty of the Sovereign and the wisdom of Parliament.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—BOROUGH FRANCHISE.

QUESTIONS.

MR. WARNER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can furnish the House with any estimate as to the number of £10 Borough Voters which will be added to the present constituencies by the Clauses of his Bill relating to the distribution of seats only without reference to the alteration of the franchise; also, how many

County Voters will be disfranchised by the same process; and, whether he can say how many £10 Voters will be added to the constituency of the Tower Hamlets when incorporated with the parish of West Ham?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, as I have received no notice that the hon. Gentleman was about to put those Questions, and as they require a precise answer, it would, I think, be convenient that they should be put on the paper, in order that I may the more clearly understand them.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MANAGEMENT OF SCOTCH BUSINESS IN PARLIAMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If any changes are contemplated in the management of Scotch business in the House of Commons? It was not generally known by hon. Members in other parts of the United Kingdom that the Lord Advocate was not only the Attorney General for Scotland, having very important and varied legal duties to perform, but he was also expected to take charge of the general civil administration of that part of the Empire, with only a nominal responsibility to the Home Office. The Lord Advocate, in fact, was the political dictator of Scotland. What he wanted to lay before the House was, that there existed a very strong, reasonable, continual, and increasing feeling of dissatisfaction in Scotland with regard to political matters, that so much power, patronage, and legislative responsibility should be placed in the hands of a practising lawyer, whose ordinary duties were onerous enough and quite sufficient to occupy his whole time, without casting upon him other functions which he could not adequately perform. The Lord Advocate of Scotland was always one of the most distinguished members of the Scotch bar, with a large practice before the courts in Edinburgh, which rendered it quite impossible for him to be at all times present in London when those courts were sitting. Three years ago the hon. Member for Ayrshire truthfully described the duties of the Lord Advocate as being so diverse, so conflicting, and so complicated that no parallel to them could be found either in England or in Ireland. That hon. Gentleman then moved for a Select Committee to bring about a change. In 1858, he (Mr. Baxter) submitted a Resolution to the House that one Under Secretary of State should be appointed in the Home Office to perform the functions and the political duties of the Lord Advocate; but the matter was not understood by the House, and they would not accept the proposal though many Scotch Members had voted in its favour. The question, perhaps, was not then ripe for discussion; but circumstances had since occurred which might ensure a more favourable answer to his inquiry. In the year 1858 petitions and memorials had been sent up from all parts of Scotland advocating the proposed change. The people of that country generally were persuaded that no measure was more likely to prove beneficial to them than one of that character, which would have the effect of relieving them from the domination of a few Scotch lawyers. In 1858 he had ventured to say that the time might come when the Lord Advocate would not have a seat in that House. That statement was received with a smile of incredulity; but it was the fact that at the present moment the Lord Advocate had not a seat in the House of Commons, and the consequence was that Scotch business had come to an entire dead-lock in that House. He was aware that the Home Secretary was nominally responsible for the conduct of Scotch business; but the right hon. Gentleman, when asked a question on Scotch business, appeared perfectly helpless. This state of things could not be permitted to go on much longer. If he were rightly informed, the Government had a number of important Bills in readiness with reference to Scotland, but there was no one to take charge of them; and he believed that for the future there was less chance of the Lord Advocate obtaining a seat in that House. He knew that it was objected that a Scotch lawyer was needed to take charge of the Scotch Parliamentary business, because it was invariably of a technical nature connected with the peculiarities of Scotch law. He denied that that was the case, and during the twelve years he had sat in the House he had noticed that the great majority of the Scotch measures introduced had been of that nature that, had they related to England, no one would have thought of placing them in the hands of the Attorney General, as they would naturally have fallen to the province of the Home Secretary. The financial part of the question, as relating to the salary of the Under Secretary of State for Scotland, or by whatever title the new officer might be called, was comparatively of little importance. If the change could be made, the money necessary for it would be well expended; but, as the First Scotch Lord of the Treasury received £1,000 a year, and the Secretary to the Lord Advocate £350, he did not see the necessity for any great increase of expenditure. He hoped that the Government would take his suggestion into consideration, and he could assure them that the Scotch people would be grateful if the Government took the present opportunity of putting an end to a system which was most unpopular in Scotland.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he believed that the Lord Advocate, if he were present in the House, would admit that the amount of business he was called on to transact, both in London and Edinburgh, was of such a nature and extent that it was next to impossible that it could receive that attention which its importance demanded. The fact of the Lord Advocate having no seat in the House had at last brought the matter to a crisis, for it was impossible that the Home Secretary could be conversant with the details of Scotch business. It was not too much to expect that some Scotch Member might have the opportunity of taking part in the official transaction of Scotch business, and that that business should not be solely placed in the hands of the legal profession. He made these remarks in the most friendly spirit both towards the present and past Lords Advocate. He had no objection whatever to make to the present Lord Advocate; on the contrary, he entertained the highest respect for his character and abilities; but it was impossible that any man in his position could properly discharge the political duties committed to his hands.

MR. CUMMING-BRUCE said, he could entirely endorse the observations which had been made on this subject, and he most sincerely trusted that the Home Secretary would take the matter into serious consideration.

MR. DUNLOP said, he wished to express his concurrence in what had fallen from the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter.)

Mr. Baxter

COLONEL SYKES said, he could bear testimony to the great inconvenience incurred by Scotch Members in having to trot to the Lord Advocate's office in Spring Gardens if they had to ask a question about Scotch business. The absence from that House of the officer responsible for that business was an intolerable nuisance.

MR. HENRY BAILLIE said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consider the propriety of appointing an Under Secretary of State for Scotland. The fact was that the Scotch were the most lawyer-ridden and priest-ridden people in the world, and they were anxious to emancipate themselves at least from the dominion of the lawyers. Complaint was made on the score of the Lord Advocate not having a seat in the House; but he considered that if he had a seat he would be of very little use, inasmuch as the duties he had to perform in Edinburgh were such that he could not possibly, with satisfaction to Scotch Members, take charge of the Scotch business that came before the House.

MR. M'LAREN said, he believed that in Edinburgh the feeling in favour of the suggestion of the hon. Member for Montrose was as extensive as in any part of Scotland. About fifteen years ago a large public meeting was held in Edinburgh, at which the Lord Advocate presided, and a memorial to the Government was decided upon, which was subscribed by large numbers of the inhabitants. The Town Council, the Chamber of Commerce, and other public bodies also memorialized the Government on the subject. He was of opinion that the Home Secretary could not do a more popular act, as regarded all parties in Scotland, than accede to the suggestion made by his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department that in the great city of Glasgow, of which he was a citizen, and in the burgh which he had the honour to represent, but one feeling prevailed, and that was strongly in favour of the recommendation of his hon. Friend.

MINES AND MINERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. G. CLIVE said, he rose to call attention to the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the condition of all Mines in Great Britain, to which the Act 23 & 24 Vict. does not apply. He considered the condition of the mining population, particularly in Cornwall, Wales, and the North of England, as very unsatisfactory. The state of things was very serious; the men employed in the mines were prematurely old, and communicated their infirmities to their offspring. Through the indomitable perseverance of the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird), his right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), then Secretary of State for the Home Department, thought it desirable to issue a Royal Commission, the Members of which, at great personal risk and inconvenience, visited the various localities, and came to a most conclusive Report. They reported in 1864; their Report was unanimous and very strong; but hitherto nothing had been done on the subject. The conclusions at which they had arrived deserved the serious attention of the House and of the Government. They had found that in metalliferous mines the men in many cases lived twenty years less than the general mass of our population. That excessive mortality was caused, not by any sudden and violent accidents, such as often occurred in collieries, but by the generally unhealthy influences to which the men were exposed. Among the principal of those fatal agencies was imperfect ventilation, and that amidst circumstances which must in any case be unfavourable to the maintenance of health. The miners had frequently to work at a temperature of not less than 100, and they were further subject to the alternate visitations of foul air, and of bitter and sweeping draughts. The Commissioners had recommended the adoption of regulations for the removal or the mitigation of those evils, and it was manifestly desirable that those regulations should as speedily as possible be adopted.

MR. KINNAIRD said, the statement the hon. Gentleman had made relative to the lamentable occurrence that had lately taken place must satisfy the House that there was a great call for legislation upon this subject. But the necessity for legislation was not limited to coal mines. There the danger forced itself on public attention by the wholesale sacrifice of life that too frequently took place, but the metalliferous mines equally required attention. The Report of the Commissioners in 1864 demonstrated this fact; but if they wanted a proof of the necessity of Reform they had it here, for that Report for all practical purposes hitherto might as well not have been made. Let him call attention to the following Resolutions:—

“Resolution 1. That there is a great excess of sickness and mortality among metalliferous miners which is mainly attributable to the imperfect ventilation of the mines. 2. That several other causes, both general and local, largely contribute to impair the health of the miner—namely, exposure to cold and wet, and to sudden alternations of temperature, wearing wet clothes, inhalation of gritty particles, and the exertion of climbing ladders from great depths.”

And here he would remark that in metalliferous mines the danger arose, not from firedamp explosions, but from the ordinary state of the mine atmosphere, which was capable of remedy. The present system of ventilation only kept up a current of air; but what was needed was a second shaft, such as was in use in coal mines, to change the air completely. This would effectively secure a ventilation which would prolong the lives now prematurely and lamentably cut off by a slow process of poison. It had been proved that the real danger of the miner did not lie so much in the explosion of firedamp as in the vitiated and unwholesome atmosphere which he was compelled to breathe while pursuing his avocation. Sickness and loss of vital power were very common among them on this account, and as a general rule a miner at fifty years of age, instead of being in the full enjoyment of vigour, like ordinary men, was a decrepid old man. As an illustration, he would quote a small portion of the evidence given before the Commissioners?—

“Mr. Richard Burford Searle, M.R.C.S.: Are you well assured of that?—I was looking over my list to-day, and I came to that conclusion. It is remarkable how the children die off here.—Chairman; Is that conclusion drawn from the register, or from your own observation?—From my own observation.—Mr. Kendall: As far as your experience goes, do the children of the miners die more under three years of age than the children of the agriculturists?—Yes; most decidedly.—To what do you attribute that? Why should a miner's child be more subject to die under three years of age than the child of an agriculturist?—Because the father is generally in a more infirm state of health. The state of health of the miner tells upon the offspring decidedly. Mr. James Jago, M.D., Oxon, questioned by the Chairman: From your observations in the examination of miners, should you say that their illness was the effect of working in impure or poisonous air?—Looking at the anæmic and pasty colour of the miner, which is very peculiar, and other facts as to his breathing—and I have seen them come to me excessively weak, when I have been unable to detect any special cause to account for their want of breath and general weakness, excepting the mere absence of the red colour in their features—the unfavourable condition under which they work alone seems to me sufficient to account for the great deterioration in their strength, and very likely for their gradual decay, bringing on premature old age, and I think a loss of their vital power or force.”

The third Resolution of the Commissioners was to the following effect:—

“ That accidents are of frequent occurrence in metalliferous mines, and that they principally result from miners falling from ladders and stems, or from one level to another ; from falls of the rock or stuff ; from want of caution in blasting ; from defective gear and imperfect supervision of machinery ; from sudden eruptions of water or foul air, and from the bursting of boilers.”

And here he would suggest that the substitution of copper for iron tools in blasting, copper being confessedly not liable to explode, would be preferable, and would avoid one present great cause of danger, and that by a little expenditure the iron ladders now in use might be divested of their danger by the insertion of a slip of lead or of copper, like a sandwich, in the iron. What was, perhaps, wanted now for carrying out the Report of the Commission appointed in 1864 was a Commission to report as to the best means of immediately carrying out the Resolutions of that Commission. This was all he had to say as far as the metal mines were concerned.

With reference to the coal mines, a system of ventilation existed, but it was insufficient in many cases, as, for instance, in the Oaks colliery. There it was proved on evidence that for seventy miles of travelling way there was only one up-cast and one down-cast shaft. But at least two up and two down were necessary, and had they existed half the lives lately sacrificed might have been spared through that alone. The area of ventilation in all cases should be within defined limits. But this was not all—taking for granted that the men employed in mines would be often so unconscious of danger that they would frustrate the wisest regulations, he maintained that on that very account the risk they incurred ought to be reduced to the smallest minimum possible, and that if any indicator of risk existed the Legislature were bound to see that it was used. In the Barnsley pit the great loss of life would not have occurred if the state of the air of the pit had been registered. Mr. Ansell's fire damp indicator, he had reason to believe, supplied amply the means both of giving notice of any sudden outburst of firedamp and of marking its amount. The presence of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent of firedamp was enough to insure explosion if mixed with atmospheric air. He thought, then, that it would be a great improvement on the present law if it was definitely enacted that the presence of 5 per cent of that gas should be considered an offence against the Colliery Inspection Act, for at present the amount was left indefinite, being “ a dangerous amount,” and therefore liable to be overlooked altogether. Some effective test, together with a system of telegraphic communication, would remove the present danger arising from sudden explosions, while a more effective ventilation would give a greater chance of escape, and also prevent the accumulation of firedamp to so great a degree. And a regular system of registration, also, while it would not prevent men “ coming upon gas,” would prevent their going down into the pit when gas to a dangerous extent was in it. One more suggestion he had to make was that this country should follow the example of the French Government, who had offered a reward of £4,000 for the best system of protecting lives. Such an offer would call out the energies of practical men to help in the solution of our difficulties.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that a Bill upon this subject was in preparation when the late Government went out of office.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought that while thousands of lives were being sacrificed it was no answer to his appeal to that House for some speedy legislative enactment to protect the lives and the health of miners to be told that a Bill had been in preparation. What was wanted was immediate remedial measures. The noble Chairman of the Commission (Lord Kinnaird) had himself prepared and brought in a Bill which might have proved beneficial; but it was impeded, instead of assisted, by the late Government, and it was a Member of that Government who obliged him to withdraw it. When the present Government came into office an appeal was made to them to introduce a Bill, but the mass of business devolving on a new Government was some excuse for their not doing so ; but he hoped and trusted that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) would satisfy these poor men who were certainly some of the most industrious of Her Majesty's subjects. They were treated with considerable neglect when legislation was deferred from time to time, notwithstanding the presentation of a Report showing how their lives were sacrificed. No private Member could bring in a Bill on the subject, and these men felt they were not represented. Who were these men to look to for relief unless to the Government, after the Government had obtained the information contained in the Report? To the noble Chairman of the Commission it was a matter of the deepest regret that a Bill was not introduced, knowing as he did that the fatal consequences continued to this day from want of legislation on the subject. If a deaf ear was still turned to such an appeal he could only repeat what he began by saying, that the country had here a practical proof of the need of Reform. What he pleaded for would involve, doubtless, some expenditure of money; but if this were to be placed in the scale against the lives of a most deserving and industrious class of Her Majesty's subjects, then, he said, it was proved that the possessors of capital were more effectively represented in that House than the creators of capital. He trusted, however, that Her Majesty's Government would take this question into their most serious consideration.

MR. KENDALL said, he had had some experience in mining matters, and he, together with the other Commissioners, had endeavoured to prevent the noble Lord at the head of that Commission from bringing in a Bill upon the subject, showing him that the matter was one of extreme delicacy, and that great care was necessary. Contrary, however, to the wish of the Commissioners, his Lordship had brought in a Bill, which he undertook, as a practical man, to say was as unpractical and visionary a Bill as any ever brought into the House of Lords. The ventilation proposed would be most difficult and expensive. The noble Chairman, while in Cornwall, had endeared himself to every one, and, some short time since, would have been received with open arms. Now, however so great a change had taken place in the feelings of the people, that whereas he was formerly almost worshipped by the miners, he would now, if he went into Cornwall, stand a very good chance of a ducking. The fact was that the noble Chairman, by proposing his Bill, had greatly offended every one connected with the mining interests; and the lords and adventurers were so opposed to a measure introduced by one who pretended, and who I really believe, wished to be their friend, that they had of late evinced a reserve which made it difficult to approach them. About two years since mining operations, which had until then been in a flourishing condition, were in a terrible state, and the present moment, when mining interests were so depressed, was about the worst possible one to select for introducing a Bill which would tend to increase the expense of working the mines. One-half of the miners had left Cornwall, and of those remaining the half were unemployed. Great profits had been and might again be made by mining; but he hoped that, while mining was in its present depressed condition, no measure tending to increase the expense, and consequently to injure the interests of the poor miner, would be introduced into Parliament. He repudiated the assertion that the children of miners were less healthy than those of other people, and asserted on medical testimony that, though the father might be what is called consumptive, the children were as fine and as healthy as those of the healthiest man in the world.

MR. BRUCE said, he did not agree with the opinion that the question was one admitting of easy solution. On the contrary, there were great difficulties in the way, and these would require grave and mature consideration. The evils arising from the manner in which the mining operations were carried on had not been exaggerated by the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Clive). The evils were mainly caused by defective ventilation, the ascending and descending, and the early employment of children in the mines. It was admitted on all hands that the mortality amongst miners between the ages of thirty-five and fifty-five was almost double the mortality amongst other classes of the working population. In collieries, good ventilation was absolutely necessary for carrying on the works. Without a large stream of air it would be impossible to carry on colliery operations; but it was not so in the Cornish mines; but the Cornish miner was behind all other miners in understanding the rules of ventilation. He (Mr. Bruce) knew that from having descended into mines of considerable depth. The condition of the workmen was awful, and the surprise was how they could do their work. When added to that the miner had to ascend after his work the height of a mountain, it would be seen what heavy calls there were on the strength of the miners of Cornwall. It was well known that in collieries the air was carried down one shaft and up another; but the ventilation in the Cornish mines was different, and men exhausted by work might have to climb up, breathing vitiated air that had passed through the mine. It would be impossible to supply the Cornish mines at once with the necessary facilities for ventilation, and the operation would in many instances be attended with great expense. The question was, what remedy should be applied. The late Government had examined the matter carefully; and after communicating with the Cornish Members and other persons, they had made considerable progress towards the preparation of a measure. He should pay homage to the humanity of Lord Kinnaird. His Lordship had spent a week at the mines in examining and acquainting himself with all the circumstances of the case, in order that he might be able to conduct the examination more effectively. What the late Government proposed to do, and what they would have done if there had not been a change of Ministry was this—they would have laid on the table a Bill re-constituting the Court of Stannaries with power to improve the ventilation of mines. And if there were no other means of doing so, it was proposed that inspectors should be appointed to recommend some means of ventilation. He believed the matter was ripe for legislation, and he believed that ventilation would not be followed by the ruin which his hon. Friend (Mr. Kendall) feared. The late Government very carefully examined the subject, but finding that the Bill of Lord Kinnaird was too sweeping in its provisions they could not support it. If the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Walpole) would look into the archives of the Home Office he would there find material to enable him to proceed with this question.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the observations of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bruce) were extremely just and accurate as to the course which the late Government intended to pursue, and which they considered would have been the best mode of remedying the evils that now existed. The proposal amounted to this—that the metal mining districts should be divided into seven, and that each should be placed under the superintendence of three persons selected from a general body, composed of lords, adventurers, and mining workmen. He admitted that the numerous things which had fallen upon him to do had prevented him taking up the subject with that speed which it deserved; but he begged to assure the House that he had not lost sight of it, and after the appeal which had been made to him to-night he would do his best to take the matter in hand, and to see if some measure could not be framed so as to prevent the present disastrous and injurious effects in these mines. As regarded the question of Scotch business in Parliament, the hon. Member for Montrose had referred to a proposal which he made some years ago in this House for the better conduct of the Scotch business. He begged to say that he did not coincide with the conclusions at which the hon. Gentleman had arrived. He believed himself, from the ability which had characterized a number of Lord Advocates who had had seats in that House, and from their knowledge and acquaintance with the Scotch Members, there was no part of the business of this kingdom really better done than the Scotch business. At the same time, he could not close his eyes to the fact that a great change had for some years been coming over the minds of the Scotch people, and that they would prefer that some civilian in the shape of an assistant or Under Secretary should be the medium of communication with them instead of the Lord Advocate. When this matter was brought before the House some years ago, it was lost by a great majority. There was a discussion subsequently, and there was then considerable division of opinion even amongst the Scotch Members themselves; but he was bound to say, after listening to what had been said in the debate of to-night, that amongst the Scotch Members on both sides there seemed to be no difference of opinion now, and they all seemed to be agreed that some change in relation to the conduct of Scotch business in Parliament should be adopted. If he might venture to give an opinion, he would say that his own views more or less—he would say, more than less—coincided with the opinions which had been expressed by those Gentlemen—and seeing at the present moment the great inconvenience of not having the Lord Advocate in the House, he thought that it was a matter which deserved the consideration of the Government, and he promised that so far as he was concerned it should receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government. One word in reference to the present state of things. The hon. Gentleman had said that when these Scotch matters were brought under his attention, he (Mr. Walpole) was entirely in the hands of the Lord Advocate. On that point he wished to observe that there were three distinct matters which the Home Secretary had to look after in reference to Scotch affairs. In the first place he had to superintend in Scotland, as he did in England, the general criminal business of the country. Then he had Church patronage to a large extent, and in the third place he was supposed, and did, with the aid of the Lord Advocate, attend to the Scotch legislation which occurred in the House of Commons. Now, with regard to the first of these matters, the superintendence of the criminal business of Scotland, he thought he might say that he had paid and would continue to pay as much attention to that as he did to the criminal business of his own country. With regard to the patronage, it was not just to say that it was left entirely to the Lord Advocate. In the case of every one of the livings which were given away he had all the testimonials brought before him, and he examined them himself before any patronage was disposed of. Therefore, instead of a nomination or suggested name being taken as a matter of course, the reverse was the case. It had happened to him within the last six months that he had been in office that he had had to question the propriety of three appointments, and he did not sanction those appointments, which were recommended to him not only by the Lord Advocate but by others. He was thankful to say that the late Lord Advocate, before his promotion to the Bench, informed him that in two out of those three appointments he had ascertained that he (Mr. Walpole) was right and that the Lord Advocate was wrong. This would show that the business was not done in a perfunctory manner, but that it was carefully conducted. As to the Scotch legislation, without the aid of the Lord Advocate he could not conduct it. As regarded the business now before the House, the hon. Baronet the Member for Peeblesshire (Sir Graham Montgomery) would be considered in this House as the person with whom the Scotch Members could communicate on all subjects of Scotch legislation, and the Lord Advocate, out of the House, would also communicate with them, and by their joint assistance he hoped they would be able to get through some of the most important Scotch business which would be submitted to this House in the course of the present Session. He might here remark that there were two Bills already in the House of Lords. First there was the Hypothec Bill, which had passed through Committee, and the other was the Recovery of Debts Bill, which was on the point of going through Committee. Then there was the Justiciary Courts Bill, which he believed would come down to this House at no very distant day. Then, as regarded the House of Commons, the Lyon King at Arms Bill had gone through Committee, and the Consolidation of the Public Health Bill stood for Monday next. This was an important measure, and if the Scotch Members would give him their assistance he would do his best to facilitate Scotch business in the House. He thought there would be advantage in having a civilian Under Secretary, who could be the medium of communication between the Scotch Members and the Government as to what ought to be the transaction of Scotch business in and out of the House, and whether the Government could see their way or not to such an appointment, he would at least take care that it was brought under their notice.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he wished to confirm what had fallen from his right hon. Friend, not only as to the supervision by the Home Office of the affairs of Scotland, but also to the duties performed by the Home Secretary in reference to Scotch patronage. It was a mistake to suppose that the patronage was disposed of by the Lord Advocate. No doubt legal appointments were made after consultation with the Lord Advocate, and his recommendation was necessarily of great weight. As regarded the church patronage, the Home Secretary disposed of it on his own responsibility, as he did of the Professorships in the Universities, after obtaining the best information he could from every quarter. As to legislation, no doubt the Scotch Bills were framed with great care on the part of the Lord Advocate; but he understood that one complaint on the part of Scotch Members was, that during a large portion of the Session the Lord Advocate, if in extensive practice, was detained by legal business in Edinburgh. Another objection was, that under the present system Scotch Members, not belonging to the legal profession, had no opportunity of being brought forward to take charge of the Scotch business. He should be sorry to express a decided opinion as to whether an Under Secretary should be appointed for the Scotch business; but he doubted whether he would have sufficient employment either of an administrative or legislative kind. He would suggest whether, by a different arrangement of the duties of the present Under Secretaries, one of them conversant with Scotch business might not, in the absence of the Lord Advocate, with the aid of the hon. baronet the Member for Peeblesshire (Sir Graham Montgomery), take charge of the Parliamentary business relating to Scotland. That arrangement might, as a temporary measure at all events, be satisfactory.

MR. LIDDELL said, he was quite ready to go along with the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) in any reasonable legislation, having in view the important object of saving life in mines, as far as practicable. But some of the remarks of that hon. Gentleman were, he thought, not altogether reasonable. The hon. Member, referring to the recent deplorable catastrophe at the Oaks Colliery, stated that there was positive proof that if certain precautions had been adopted that accident would not have occurred. Now, when the inquest was held, and an inquiry conducted with the utmost care and skill had been brought to a close, the jury were absolutely unable to satisfy themselves as to the causes of the accident. It was therefore too bold an assertion to say that there was positive proof that the calamity would not have happened if certain precautions had been taken. The hon. Gentleman stated that if the indicator had been in use in that colliery the presence of explosive gases would have been ascertained, and the danger might have been averted. But it should be remembered that that instrument was a most delicate and complicated piece of machinery, and it was exceedingly doubtful whether, as at present constructed, it was adapted to the ordinary wear and tear of coal mines. Though, however, it was a comparatively novel invention, and as yet had been only tried on a small scale, there was no indisposition on the part of the coal owners to give it a fair trial. It was not quite fair when such a strong feeling had been excited in regard to that accident to say that if an instrument like that had been used it would not have occurred.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that he had not spoken upon his own authority on that subject. He understood from a gentleman of great experience in mining that the instrument in question was not so delicate as the hon. Gentleman supposed, and that where it had been tried it had been found effective.

LORD ELCHO said, he only wished to say one word upon the question brought forward by the hon. Member for Hereford. His (Lord Elcho's) attention had recently been drawn to this subject, and he would observe that the present state of inspection of coal mines was most unsatisfactory. They had twelve inspectors, but the inspection was practically null, for it appeared from a statement made by a deputation to the Home Secretary that one inspector had no less than 900 mines under his inspection, and therefore the House must see that it could not be well done. He had heard that the Oaks mine had not been inspected for six years, and Mr. Matthews, the chairman of the Mining Association, was of opinion that the two shafts at that colliery were quite insufficient. The upcast and downcast shafts were close together, and the air had to travel sixty miles through the works to supply ventilation. The men had to travel one-and-a-half to two miles each way through the works. Now, that was the case of a coal mine where there was the danger of an explosion. In the metalliferous mines there was not the same danger from explosion, but they were charged with deleterious gases most prejudicial to life; and though coal mines were nominally inspected, metalliferous were not inspected at all. There ought to be better arrangements for carrying off the noxious gases. It would be a wise economy, as well as to the interest of the miners, if there were a better inspection of all mines, in order to secure safety and proper ventilation. His hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) said that if miners were better represented in that House, these accidents would not happen; but he (Lord Elcho) had had an experience of twenty-six years in that House, and had always seen plenty of Members ready to take up such cases and to represent the views and interests of the working classes. With respect to the question raised by the hon. Member for Montrose, he had had some experience of the subject during the time that he was the Scotch Lord of the Treasury in the Government of Lord Aberdeen, and he must say that owing to the occasional pressure of legal business in Edinburgh rendering it impossible for the Lord Advocate to be in his place in Parliament,

he had himself to discharge duties which would have properly devolved on that learned Lord. He thought that Scotch business would not suffer, but rather gain, if some such suggestion as that of the hon. Member for Montrose were adopted.

IRELAND—INSPECTORS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. BRUBN said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the justice of a claim for compensation to the late Inspectors of Weights and Measures in Ireland for the loss of their offices. He thought it was unfair to employ men for the best years of their lives in offices which they had reason to believe would be permanent, and then, when it was found that their services could be dispensed with, to displace them without compensation, leaving them, as was in many instances the case, to die of starvation by the roadside. Many of those gentlemen who held these appointments had given up others in order to accept them. Almost all of the officers whose case he was bringing before the House had received testimonials of their efficiency, and resolutions recommending the grant of compensation to them had been passed by the grand juries of various counties and the municipal corporations of several boroughs. The Act of 1860 had been amended by a subsequent Act in 1862; but a proviso introduced into that Act had proved fatal to the measure. The to the performance of their public duties, and that they did not occupy a position similar to that of officers in whose case compensation for loss of office was usually given. Upon that point, however, he did not lay much stress, the real question for the consideration of the House being out of what fund the proposed compensation was to be paid. It was in 1862 suggested by the then hon. Member for Yonghal (Mr. Butt) that it should be paid out of the local rates; but that suggestion was received with general disfavour, in fact no one else supported it. The demand now made was that the compensation should come out of monies to be voted by Parliament; but with every disposition to relieve those officers, he could not see how a case could be made out for doing so out of the public funds. There was no recent precedent for the adoption of such a course, and he was sure that it would be resisted, not only by the present but by the late Secretary to the Treasury, on public grounds. It would therefore be simply deluding those officers to hold out to them false hopes by acceding to the Motion of his hon. Friend for inquiry. The more candid and straightforward course was to negative the proposal.

MR. SYNAN said, the late officers of weights and measures in Ireland were paid by fines and fees, a portion of which were now paid in aid of the salaries of the clerks of petty sessions. The Imperial Treasury, consequently, had the benefit to that extent of the fines and fees, for it would be the duty of the State, if the fines and fees were not so appropriated, to make up to the clerks of sessions any deficiency in their salaries. The principal portion of the time of these gentlemen was occupied in such a way as to keep them from other occupations, and they had a fair ground for coming to that House to ask how the funds were applied which might have been rendered available for their assistance. He thought that a fair ground had been shown for the appointment of a Committee.

MR. VANCE said, that the late inspectors of weights and measures in Ireland did not at the present moment ask for compensation, but only asked for inquiry. The noble Lord said that those officers were not appointed by the Crown, but by the grand juries. He had, however, known men in a good position, and having friends in that House, to obtain pensions, though they had received no appointment from the Crown—he alluded to the preceptors in the different Courts of Probate, and he trusted that the claims of the inspectors of weights and measures would not be disregarded, because they happened to be humble men without influence. He knew one case in which the whole of the officer's time had been employed, and that in many they had been reduced to great straits.

GENERAL DUNNE said, he thought it would be better for the late inspectors to submit their case to the Treasury, and to the justice of the House, than to have a Select Committee appointed. They had made out their case.

MR. PIM said, he did not see how justice could be done without the appointment of a Committee, whose business would be to ascertain whether compensation should be granted. The noble Lord had fully admitted the justice of the case, and the House ought to see that justice was done.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he thought that the noble Lord had taken the wisest, and even the kindest course, in declining to submit the case to a Select Committee. It was not to be expected that the result of inquiry by a Committee would induce the Government to pay the compensation asked for out of the public funds, for the fines and fees went to the relief of the local funds. He was sorry for the condition of the persons whose case was brought under consideration, but he should feel it his duty to vote against the appointment of a Committee.

DISTURBANCES IN IRELAND—REWARDS TO THE CONSTABULARY.—QUESTION.

MR. MONSELL said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to confer any special rewards on those members of the Irish Constabulary who have distinguished themselves by meritorious services during the late disturbances, and to call his attention to the defenceless state of many of the Irish police barracks. He wished to avoid all reference not absolutely necessary to the occurrences that had lately taken place in Ireland, for, although he felt it was the duty of Parliament, with the least possible delay, to inquire into the causes of disaffection in Ireland, he thought it perfectly obvious that the time for this would not come till those sterner duties had been discharged which, unfortunately, followed every unsuccessful insurrection. He wished to call attention to the courage and self-reliance exhibited, he believed, in every place in Ireland, where the police force came into collision with the insurgents during the late unhappy attempt at rebellion. It would be invidious to make any arbitrary selection of cases; but he might fairly refer to two instances, both of which occurred in the county he had the honour to represent. There was a small village called Ardagh, lying at the foot of the hills which divided the county of Kerry from the county of Limerick. The police barracks there had no means of defence in case of attack by an armed force. On the night of the 5th instant one constable and four sub-constables were attacked by a body of fifty men, a number of whom penetrated into the barracks. Within the barracks, in addition to the constabulary, were the wife and two infant children of the constable. The police knew well if they would only consent to give up their arms not a hair of their heads would be touched, and the woman and children would be uninjured. But those brave men drove out those who had effected an entrance at the point of the bayonet, and of the assailants twenty-two were now in custody. In the police barracks at Kilmallock, at the other end of the county, fourteen constables and sub-constables were attacked by 200 men, directed, he believed, by an officer who had served in the American Federal army. The attack lasted for three or four hours. Three women and eleven children were in the house; an attempt was made to burn it in order to effect an entrance; but still the police gallantly resisted till sub-inspector Miller arrived with ten men, who took the insurgents in flank, when the police in the barracks rushed out and completely defeated the assailants, of whom a considerable number were in custody. Although in those instances the numbers employed were not large, the results arrived at by the gallant conduct of the police were of the highest possible importance. Had the police yielded for an instant the insurrection would have spread throughout the country, and had to be put down by military force. Pecuniary rewards given for ordinary good conduct were not sufficient recompense in such a case. There was a precedent and he hoped it would be followed, whereby Her Majesty might be graciously pleased to bestow on these men the highest reward of bravery, the Victoria Cross. The second part of his question related to the bad construction of the police barracks in Ireland and their generally defenceless condition. There were 1,600 barracks in Ireland, of which only about thirty belonged to the Government. The remainder were rented at a charge of between £28,000 and £29,000 a year. They were nearly all utterly defenceless. They had large windows, and no means of protection for those inside, or of resistance in case of attack. In consequence of this state of things it had been found absolutely necessary in many places to call the men from the out-stations and to mass them at the larger stations—a proceeding which was most calculated to increase the panic which existed. It was absolutely necessary that Her Majesty's Government should take into consideration the defenceless state of the police barracks, which he had been informed could be put in a good state of defence for £150 each. Some difficulty might be raised with regard to the building of new barracks, in consequence of the Government having no power to take land for such a purpose; but that difficulty might easily be got over by the landowners consenting that such a power should be placed in the hands of Government. He left the matter with perfect confidence in the hands of the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland (Lord Naas), who had shown so admirable a determination to put down party feeling, and to rely upon the ordinary operation of the law during these trying times. The noble Lord had by his conduct won the gratitude of the people of Ireland.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he cordially concurred in what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman as to the gallant and patriotic conduct of the Irish constabulary during the late disturbances. His own experience of the demeanour of that body, and the high opinion entertained of the force by their able commander, Colonel Wood, had led him to believe that if, unfortunately, their services were required to quell disturbances such as had lately taken place, they would not be found wanting, and he was happy to find that that expectation had not been disappointed. He hoped such services would not be forgotten. It must be admitted on all hands that when small bodies of the Irish constabulary found themselves attacked in the darkness of the night by large masses of men, as was the case on the high road at Tallaght, they had acted most gallantly. It was impossible for the police to know at the time the amount of the force which they had to deal with, or how formidable might be the nature of the insurrection that was moving and gathering around them on that night. It was impossible to overrate the gallant conduct of the men under these circumstances. The Irish constabulary were drawn from the Irish people, to whom they were attached by every tie of fellowship and of religion, and therefore they deserved the greater admiration for having set their misguided fellow-countrymen so noble an example of loyalty and patriotism. Turning to the question of the improvement of the police barracks of Ireland, he scarcely thought that so large a sum as £150 per barrack would be required to put them into a sufficient state of defence. It would be more than the late enemy or any they were likely to encounter was worth. In most cases by merely opening a window or a loophole or two in the rear of the barracks they would be rendered perfectly capable of being vigorously defended. He wished to ask the noble Lord (Lord Naas) whether the Bill to improve the position and pay of the Irish constabulary, which had been prepared last year by the late Government, in accordance with a Report of a Commission appointed to inquire into this subject, and which had been carried through Parliament by the present Government, had worked successfully; and whether it had answered the expectations which had been formed of it by stimulating recruiting and keeping up the force to its proper numbers. He entirely concurred in the opinion which the right hon. Gentleman had expressed with regard to the firmness, the impartiality, and the moderation which the noble Lord had shown in putting down the late disturbances.

MR. HERBERT said, he could not forbear calling attention to one case which in his opinion was deserving of special attention, as it was the first of the kind that occurred. He came from that part of the country where these unfortunate occurrences first broke out, and it would be in the recollection of the House that the policeman (Duggan) going to Killington with despatches was met in the dark by about seventy or eighty armed men, who called upon him to surrender. He refused to do so, rode on, and would have got clear off with his despatches if he had not been shot in the back by a cowardly assassin. No compensation in money could reward that man, and if the Victoria Cross were not confined to the army he could conceive no more fitting reward for these men, as it would stimulate their bravery, though at the same time he did not think men could exert themselves more than these men had done. With regard to the question of the barracks, he thought a very little alteration in most cases would render them impregnable against attack by a mob. A door opened in a wall, a few loop-holes inserted, or even the raising of a window sill, would be all that was needed to put many of these places in a state of defence. But his main reason in rising was to express his hope that the Government would reward these men, not with money, but with something that they could wear on their breasts.

MR. BAGWELL said, he believed that an attempt at insurrection had been rendered abortive by the determination of the police, and that their conduct rebuked the mistrust too generally entertained respecting them. Irishmen would perform their trust to the letter; and in 1848 an almost purely Irish regiment, which had been wrongfully mistrusted, did its duty in acting against relatives and friends. Irish gentlemen were wont to say if any question of religion or politics disturbed the country the constabulary could not be trusted. The force ought to be treated as a civil force, and not a military one. Therefore, he objected to the proposal that the country should be studded with little forts called police barracks. He would suggest that an order of merit should be established for the constabulary forces. While favouring the punishment of the principal Fenian leaders from America, he would suggest leniency towards their humble Irish followers, who repented that they had allowed themselves to be misled.

GENERAL DUNNE said, he did not know what his hon. Friend meant by a civil force. If being armed to the teeth made a force military, then he thought that character applied to the Irish police. He quite agreed that the honour and fidelity of these men deserved a reward, and he thought it ought to be given in the shape of an order of merit and a pension. As to the repentance of the people he was rather sceptical on that matter, but he was certain that the country people took no part in the insurrection. The insurgents were composed of the people of the towns, not of the sons of farmers, and he believed the majority of them were tailors. Fenianism under another name existed in this country as well as in Ireland. As to the barracks, many of them were merely thatched and untenable; but if the Government would give a proper rent there would be no difficulty in obtaining proper barracks, which would be erected by the landowners. While he gave all praise to the police for the defence they made, he could not forget that the feebleness of the attack showed that the hearts of the assailants were not in the work. In other circumstances they would have shown no lack of bravery. But they had been duped by American filibusters.

LORD NAAS said, he was sure that there was no subject that could be brought under the consideration of the House that was more worthy of their consideration, or which would more fully command the sympathies of the House; and he was sure that not the House only, but the country—his own country in particular—were deeply indebted to his right hon. Friend for the eloquent tribute he had paid to the merits of the police force, to which not Ireland only, but the whole country was so much indebted. On the nights of the 5th and 6th of March these men were attacked in no fewer than thirteen different places by bodies of men of unknown numbers in the dead of the night, and without any time for preparation; for though, in some instances, scanty information had been given that an attack was meditated, yet that information had been so often received, and had so often proved false, that in most cases the men paid little attention to it. The attacks were all characterized by more or less of violence, but in every case they were repulsed by a force so inferior in numbers as to be almost incredible. Such success as the police obtained on that night, could only have been attained by the thorough reliance the men had on each other, and by the firm conviction they entertained, that they were doing their duty—the highest of all duties that could be imposed upon them, whether as men or as citizens—the duty of resisting the assaults of men who were in arms against their Sovereign. He begged the House to remember that this force consisted of about 11,000 men, scattered over the country at 1,600 stations, and that these stations were occupied by parties varying from five to twelve or thirteen men. The average number of men in each barrack was only seven. The House would see, therefore, what discipline, good conduct, and courage must exist in a force so detached and so removed from the control ordinarily considered by military men necessary for the maintenance of discipline. Since this unfortunate Fenian movement had afflicted the country, no efforts had been spared by the emissaries of the conspiracy to seduce the constabulary from their allegiance. The same attempts which had been made, though seldom successfully, on the army, had also been made on the constabulary; but he was proud to say that in hardly a single instance did any stain rest on the character of a member of the force. Every attempt to seduce them from their allegiance had been attended with signal failure, and indeed he might say that in that respect the force was at the present moment absolutely and entirely without taint. We must remember to what temptations these men are exposed. They were constantly mixing with the people, and at the same time were necessarily much withdrawn from the care and supervision of their officers. They had, however, not only evinced a determination to resist every attempt to draw them from their allegiance, but, as witnesses, policemen and soldiers had invariably shown their willingness to discharge their duty loyally and honestly in whatever position they had been placed. It must also be borne in mind that this force was entirely recruited from the Irish people. Its ranks, it was true, were filled from a class somewhat superior to that which joined the regular army, as there was a certain qualification required, that no one was admitted into the force who could not read and write. The religion of the men was as nearly as possible in the same proportion as existed between the two creeds in the country. Nearly two-thirds of them were Roman Catholics, the remaining third being Protestants. Therefore, both in their distinctions of religion and in their character, they fairly represented the great mass of the people from whom they were drawn. He entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend as to the impossibility of overrating the services rendered by the constabulary during the recent outbreak, and particularly on the night of the 5th. Every attack on a police-barrack and every attempt at armed insurrection had resulted in utter failure. It should be remembered that at the time these attacks were repelled the constabulary were ignorant as to the actual state of feeling in the country. They had been repeatedly told that a general rising was intended, and in almost every instance, when summoned to surrender and give up their arms and barracks, they were informed that the whole country was in arms, that the Irish Republic had been established, and that resistance would be useless. In the middle of the night the constables had no means of testing the accuracy of such statements or of ascertaining the number of their assailants, but there was no flinching. Every man did his duty, and defended to his utmost his post and his arms. Taking all these things into account, it was difficult to over-estimate the credit due to them for their courage, fidelity, and constancy. If the conspirators had succeeded even temporarily in one of their attempts, and had established themselves in a barrack or any place of strength, so as to form the nucleus of a disaffected force, it was impossible to say what disastrous consequences might have ensued. Therefore, it seemed to him that the country owed a lasting debt of gratitude to these men, who had defeated the conspirators whenever they had been brought in contact with them, and who had proved to the country and to the world how utterly futile and contemptible was this attempt of treason. With regard to the particular question put by his right hon. Friend, he begged to say that last week, with the concurrence of the Lord Lieutenant, he had addressed a letter to the Treasury on the subject, and a copy of that letter would at some subsequent period be laid upon the table. Before sending that letter he had communicated with the chief officers of the force as to the mode in which some token of approbation might be bestowed on those members of the force who had distinguished themselves. He was happy to say that Her Majesty's Government had assented to one of the two proposals which had been made. The second proposal was still under consideration. It was proposed that a small sum of money should be voted by the House as a special reward for those who took part in the late proceedings. It was intended not to submit that Vote in the ordinary way, among the civil contingencies, but to invite the House to pass a special Vote of £2,000, to be placed at the disposal of the Inspector General of Constabulary for the purpose of conferring special rewards on these men. A distinct Vote, brought forward as a Supplementary Estimate, would be most gratifying to the members of the force, who would value the reward much more than if it had been conferred in any other manner. The vote which the House would be invited to come to would be tantamount to a vote of thanks, as hon. Members would have an opportunity on that occasion of expressing their sense of the conduct of these men. With regard to honorary rewards, he ought to mention that it was customary in the force itself to give honorary marks, which were much prized by the men, and the Inspector General had informed him that these would be given, with a slight increase of pay, to all the men who, either individually or collectively, had particularly distinguished themselves during the late events. The question of barracks was one which required grave consideration. It ought to be considered whether it was more desirable to place every barrack in Ireland in a state of defence, or to select individual barracks, which might be made centres for four or five others, so that the men might retire from the outposts to the centre barrack in case of emergency. For his own part, he was in favour of making all the barracks, to a certain extent, defensible, as concentration, except under extreme circumstances, is objectionable, and it was most important that the men should remain in their stations as long as they could do so without danger to their lives. There would not be any great difficulty in carrying this out. Several plans had already been submitted to the Government; and Parliament, he felt assured, would not be unwilling to place at the disposal of the Government such a sum as would be necessary to place most of the stations in a reasonable state of defence. With regard to thatched police barracks, he did not think there were any left in the country, and he knew that all new barracks were built upon a certain plan. If, however, there were such a thing as a thatched barrack in Ireland, it ought to be done away with at once. There was also a question as to the arms of the men, and he was afraid this would involve considerable expense. The present arm of the constabulary was not at all fitted for the duty they were called upon to perform. The rifle was too long and too heavy, while the bayonet attached to it was a weapon which could hardly ever be used by a policeman. It had been suggested by the Inspector General that a short breech-loading rifle should be supplied to the men, which would not impede the rapidity of their movements, and he thought that would be a more efficient weapon than the long rifle now used. [Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that this was recommended by the Commission.] It had been so recommended, and he believed a particular weapon had been selected by the Inspector General. He hoped soon to be able to submit the matter to the Treasury. Before he sat down he wished to say a word with reference to a body which had not yet been mentioned—namely, the Dublin metropolitan police force. They had not had the same opportunity as the country constabulary of distinguishing themselves; but, from his knowledge of the way in which they had discharged their arduous and responsible duties, he felt confident that they would have exhibited the same zeal and the same courage had they been placed in the same circumstances. Since the commencement of this Fenian movement they had been repeatedly engaged in service of considerable danger, and they had always evinced qualities of the highest order, and several had lost their lives. He could not sit down without expressing his acknowledgment to the right hon. Gentlemen opposite for the testimony they had borne to the conduct of the Government during the past fortnight. He and his Colleagues had been anxious from the beginning of these unfortunate proceedings to show that the ordinary existing powers of the law were sufficient to enable them to cope with any active form of insurrectionary movement, and he believed that when excitement had subsided, it would be acknowledged that they had done right in resisting any pressure that might have been placed upon them, and in refusing to apply to Parliament for increased powers. Those who had advised, or who had thought of recommending such a course, had, he believed, formed a totally erroneous impression of the real state of feeling in Ireland. They (the Government) had determined to place their reliance on the loyalty, good feeling, and attachment of the majority of the people, and the result had shown that the course which they had adopted was the right one, for from all classes in the country they had received assurances of assistance and support. He believed it would be found that British law administered with firmness, impartiality and justice, would be quite sufficient for the punishment of all men who had incurred its penalties and for the restoration of confidence to the country. The spectacle that would have been afforded to the world by an application to Parliament for measures beyond those of the ordinary law, would have been most unfortunate, and would have given other nations an entirely erroneous impression as to the real state of feeling in Ireland. The Government wished to rely on the loyalty and attachment to the Constitution which prevailed among all classes and creeds in Ireland, and the result had shown that they were not mistaken in reposing confidence in the great mass of the people. The assurances they had received from every part of Ireland, and from all classes of persons, was sufficient to show that this conspiracy had taken root in the land only among the lowest ranks, and that all men of respectable character, of patriotism, and intelligence, had entirely refused to have anything to do with it. With regard to the measure which, although originating with the late Government, he had been instrumental in passing through Parliament at the end of last Session, its working had been most satisfactory. Not only had recruiting for the police during the past two months been found easier than before, but the men enlisting belonged to a better class than were usually attracted to the service. The House, therefore, might feel assured that the increased expenditure which it had sanctioned last Session for the improvement of the lower branch of the police force had been found in working to be attended by good results.

IRELAND—FISHERMEN ON THE LOWER SHANNON.—QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he rose for the purpose of asking the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, Whether a Memorial has been received by the Irish Government from Fishermen on the Lower Shannon, complaining "Of an outrage committed on them by the destruction of their nets by the Knight of Glin, or by parties acting under his authority, and with his approbation ;"

and, if so, whether the Government have directed any and what steps to be taken to investigate the complaint made, as well as to maintain to the public their common law right of fishing in the tidal waters of the Shannon, and to draw up and spread their nets and land their fish on any beach, strand, or waste adjoining the shore, as authorized by the third section of the Act to regulate the Irish Fisheries, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 106. It appeared that the Knight of Glin had a weir on the Lower Shannon called the Long Rock Weir, which had been ordered to be abated by the Fishery Commissioners; but on an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench this order was set aside, and the Knight of Glin proceeded to re-erect the weir. In order to prevent the drift and draft net fishermen casting their nets so near as to interfere with the weir he caused stones and other obstructions to be thrown into the river near it, in consequence of which the fishermen had to keep at a distance, which was very disadvantageous, to prevent injury being done to their boats and nets. The fishermen summoned the Knight of Glin, as they considered there was an obstruction of their common law right to fish; but after the case had been heard the magistrates declared that their jurisdiction was ousted, as the question of title had been raised, and thus the proceedings closed for the time. Soon after the decision of the magistrates the fishermen sent a memorial to the Lord Lieutenant, praying that steps should be taken to protect them, by directing the Board of Works, as conservators of the Shannon, to see to the matter of their right. To this memorial no reply had been received. Six days afterwards the fishermen heard that the Knight of Glin had ordered his tenants to attend with horses and cars to place further obstructions, and they thereon sent another memorial to the Lord Lieutenant praying for protection. The next day the fishermen, at about nine o'clock, were drying their nets on the strand when upwards of 100 of the Knight's tenants, with some fifty or sixty horses and cars, came on the strand laden with stones, walked over the nets, tearing them in pieces; some of the horses were thrown down by the nets, and several assaults were committed on the fishermen in the presence of Mr. Hartnell, J.P., who read the riot Act in order to quell the disturbance. Summonses and counter-summonses were issued for assault and malicious injury, and by consent of the legal advisers of both parties, when the case came before the magistrates, the whole question was referred to the quarter sessions at Rathkeale, which commence on the 29th instant. Probably the Solicitor General would say in reply that, as the case was about to be tried, the Government could not now interfere. But he begged to tell the hon. Gentleman that the Government ought to have interfered long before; even supposing that the Knight of Glin had a right to prevent the fishermen from using the shore he had no right to assault them, and thus assert his claim in an illegal manner. He had not the slightest doubt but that the public had, under the 5 & 6 Vict., a perfect right to use the shore for their fishing purposes. When the destruction of the nets took place the Government ought at once to have taken steps to satisfy themselves of the justice of the application, and if they were so satisfied they ought to have protected the fishermen and enforced the laws, instead of the fishermen being obliged, at great expense and at a great sacrifice, to assert their rights in a court of justice. The authorities in Dublin appeared not to have taken the slightest notice of the memorial. The Knight of Glin was a man of ancient and honourable lineage, and was held in high esteem and consideration in Ireland. He was possessed, as he (Mr. Blake) believed, of an ample fortune; but it would be both just and politic to make a man of his position feel, and to show the public also, that even in the assertion of his supposed rights he could not be suffered to do an illegal and arbitrary act. He hoped, in conclusion, that the Solicitor General would give an assurance that the matter would receive the attention of the Government.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) said, the memorials referred to by the hon. Member for Waterford had been received by the Irish Government, who had inquired into the circumstances, and had received replies to the memorials contradicting to a great extent the statements they contained. The conclusion that had been arrived at by the Government was that the question was purely one of private right of property, and not one of public right, as between the parties. It was stated that there was as much force used on the one side as had been used on the other. The Knight of Glin alleged that the complaining parties had themselves committed an outrage. Summonses and cross-summonses had been issued for the purpose of trying the question. A civil action also had been commenced, for the purpose of trying this question of private right. Under these circumstances, it was plain that this was

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'REILLY said, he rose to call attention to the circumstances under which a pension was granted to Mr. Robert Young, agricultural and historical poet. The question involved in this matter was not an Irish grievance, but one which equally concerned all parts of the country. This was not a solitary instance of an abuse of the Royal fund out of which pensions were accorded to literary and scientific men. He regretted to say that the fund had been too often abused and made the means, if not of rewarding incompetence, at any rate of bestowing eleemosynary aid on persons of mediocre ability, who had no other claim to that aid than their poverty, or perhaps their incompetence. There was, however, something worse than this, and that was when the recipient had no claim to literary merit or services rendered to his country; but if he had a claim at all it was one that ought not to be recognised—namely, party services, rendered, not to his country, but against his country. One distinguished instance of the abuse of the fund was that of the poet Close; but in that case the late Leader of that House (Viscount Palmerston), who was entrapped into granting the pension, had confessed his mistake, and retracted what he had done, though he compensated from his own purse the object of the misplaced public benefaction. The case to which he (Mr. O'Reilly) now wished to draw attention was also that of a poet—at least, of a man who wrote rhymes. It might be said that it was difficult to judge of poetic merit; but it would surely be expected that the noble Lord who had so ably translated Homer (the Earl of Derby) would at least have been able to decide upon the merits of poetical compositions, and that a pension would not have been granted by him to a wretched rhymester. Homer sometimes nodded; but in this case the noble translator not only dozed, but slept his sleep outright. He freely acquitted the noble Lord of anything but ignorance, and that was a serious fault to find. He believed that the noble Lord must have been ignorant of the circumstances under which the pension was granted; that he knew nothing of the true history of the poet, and never asked to look at his works. It was exceedingly difficult to get a copy of the poetical works of Mr. Young; and although the noble Lord the Member for Londonderry (Lord Claud Hamilton) and the Earl of Enniskillen had subscribed liberally for copies of the book, it was stated that no sooner was the pension granted than every single copy that could be got hold of was consigned to the flames. He (Mr. O'Reilly) knew a gentleman who had applied to every bookseller in the country to get a copy and found it impossible. He had procured two copies, one of them the real original edition, and certainly a valuable work it was. For a moment let him trace the history of this person before he received his pension. In early life he was a nailer. Nine-tenths of his poems commemorated different Orange festivals. They were addressed to the Orange body. The hon. Member for Peterborough had been frequently requested to favour the House with a poetical recitation, and he had apologized by saying that he was not able to comply with the request. Now this work exactly expressed his sentiments. These poems were exactly what he would write if he was a poet. He would make a present of one of the copies of the work to the hon. Member for Peterborough on the condition that he would favour the House with extracts from it in the course of his different speeches. If the hon. Member would not accept a copy on that condition, he (Mr. O'Reilly) would deposit it in the Library of the House for the improvement of hon. Members. For many years Mr. Young wrote songs for the Orangemen of the North of Ireland, and the time came when he looked for a reward of his literary and Orange loyalism in a pecuniary sense, but the Conservatives not being in office, his hope was long deferred. Either because the occupation was unprofitable or for other reasons, he had for many years ceased to write Orange songs. It was said that Mr. Robert Young had become an agricultural poet; but he (Mr. O'Reilly) could find very little about agriculture in this book. Probably the Secretary of the Treasury might favour them with the proofs that Mr. Robert Young had devoted himself to agricultural subjects. He would not disgust the House with the greater part of what the book contained. This writer contrasted himself throughout with the late Thomas Moore. He remarks that the late Thomas Moore wrote poetry of which he entirely disapproved—as not being loyal in the Fermanagh sense of the word—and he attached to the airs of some of Moore's songs words more suited to the tastes of the Orangemen. To the air of "The Exile of Erin" he attaches the following words:—

"In Munster assassins in league are invited,
The laws to resist and confusion create,
By priests of sedition to outrage excited,
To bring back the horrors of dark Ninety-eight."

He was aware that there was one hon. Gentleman in the House who would applaud the sentiment, but he did not think that the House would view it in the same way. To show that this was a man who had constantly libelled the great mass of his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, he (Mr. O'Reilly) begged to read the following words attached to Moore's air, "Oh, Erin, my country":—

"Thus maddened by Jesuit's poisonous chalice,
The Popesmen no longer contented remain;
But bigotry, fierce persecution, and malice
Inflame their dark bosoms and over them reign."

"The Scripture that tells of eternal salvation,
And man, erring man, in religion renews,
The prelates of Rome to their flocks ruination, Withhold or pervert them to suit their own views."

He (Mr. O'Reilly) need not say that there was throughout the book the most ribald abuse of the late Mr. O'Connell. There was a man of whom all Ireland was proud—a Roman Catholic bishop—a man celebrated as a writer—the friend of the late Duke of Wellington—"J. K. L.," the late Dr. Doyle, Bishop of Kildare. Here was the way in which he was mentioned by Mr. Robert Young—

"Hail, Erin! most delightful land
For strife and superstition, Where Lucifer to govern seems,
And to excite sedition."

"Of vows and murders almost sick,
Old Satan, discontented,
Of late a most surprising trick
For change of scene invented."

"Sure, none but he or J. K. L.,
Who does our isle enlighten,
Would propagate so strange a spell,
The cholera to frighten."

He could give a few more extracts if it would not weary the House. ["Hear!"] The title of the next extract—"Croppies lie down,"—required some explanation. By the word "croppies" the poet meant Roman Catholics.

"We'll fight for our country, our Queen, and Her crown,
And make all the traitors and Croppies lie down,
Down, down, Croppies lie down.
Our country's applauses our triumph will crown,
While low, with the French, brother Croppies lie down,
Down, down, Croppies lie down."

Perhaps the Secretary for Ireland would wish to have these poems re-published, to improve the spirit of loyalty throughout Ireland. Amongst the most unfortunate reminiscences of the North of Ireland were the memories of the contests between Roman Catholics and Orangemen. The following was a poem which Mr. Robert Young wrote on what he called the battle of Castle Wellan:—

"It was in the year of thirty, on July the first old style,
The Castle Wellan Orangemen and Clarkhill rank and file,
To Clough with flags and music sweet, marched off in grand array,
Where fifteen banners were displayed in honour of the day.
So let oringing politicians vile and Whig and Papist join, Still annually we'll celebrate the conquest of the Boyne.

"Thus may we still triumphant be and keep rebellion down, Maintain our just ascendancy and guard the British Crown."

The following was another beautiful extract:—

"Oh! could I Homer like, indite Sublime heroic lays,
My faculties should all unite
In singing Graham's praise;
Who, undismayed by threatening foes
Has faithfully revealed
The worth, the woes, and deeds of those Which time from us concealed.

"His pages true bring to our view
The actions of the brave,
Who fought of old like lions bold
Our liberty to save.

"Weak Statesmen may to Rome give way,
Expediency their guide,
Lest civil war should Erin mar
And spread through Britain wide,
Each passing year some through fear,
Give up to bigots base
Who Church and Crown would trample down
And cover with disgrace.

"Not so our sires, whose glory fires
The breast of Graham brave Behaved of old, but Rome controll'd
And fought our rights to save."

From a Conservative Government able to appreciate literary fame—with a noble poet at its head capable of rewarding loyalty like that of the Fermanagh true-blue—Mr. Robert Young received the pension which in his own opinion he had long deserved. In his preface he states—

"If a Moore, the author of seditious and licentious songs, has been considered deserving of a pension by our present Whig-Radical Administration, the humble man who exerts his talents in writing loyal and constitutional pieces, must surely have some claim on the patronage of those whose cause he advocates, although he cannot make pretensions to the expansive and highly cultivated genius of the celebrated Irish bard. Should he be assailed by critics of the Romish or Radical school, who scruple not in the present day at attempting to blacken by calumny—every man, no matter how eminent for virtue, who has the manliness to speak or write on behalf of the Protestant religion, he tells them beforehand that he despises their malignity, and can afford to treat their lucubrations with silent contempt."

He regretted that the noble Lord the Member for Londonderry was in Ireland, but a relative of his was in the House, and he (Mr. O'Reilly) had nothing to say but matter of fact. The reason assigned for the giving the pension was that Mr. Robert Young wrote four volumes of poems and songs of considerable merit, was connected with a newspaper, and sixty-seven years of age, old and infirm. To that he (Mr. O'Reilly) had nothing to say. He believed the man was old, infirm, and poor. If poverty were a claim upon the literary and scientific fund, he (Mr. O'Reilly) had not a word to say against the pension. But if Parliament voted the money to reward literary merit, he then would say that Mr. Robert Young had no claim to it. Attached to the memorial for the pension were the names of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Derry and of several Roman Catholic clergymen; but that did not justify the noble Lord the Member for Londonderry in not inquiring into the literary merits of Mr. Robert Young. For years this man had libelled the Roman Catholics, and had been noted as their enemy. It was said to the Roman Catholic Bishop and clergy "this poor, wretched, and old man will get a pension if you will not stand in his way, and will charitably put your name to the memorial." They did so, and he honoured their motive however mistaken they were in doing so. But that was no vindication of those having to administer the bounty of the nation on literary and scientific grounds. He had also been informed, on authority which he could not dispute, although he could not assert it from positive knowledge, that the noble Lord the Member for Londonderry recommended Mr. Young for a pension, stating as of his own knowledge that his songs were as free from any taint of Orangeism as of Ribbonism, and were as acceptable to Roman Catholics as to Protestants. If such were not the fact he hoped it would be denied on behalf of the noble Lord, who was now in Ireland, but who had received notice that the statement would be made. He (Mr. O'Reilly) might be asked, was it generous or right to make war against an old man of sixty-seven, who was poor, feeble, and infirm, for a wretched sum of £40? But he did not make war upon him. He protested as a matter of principle against a fund which should be devoted to the reward of literary and scientific attainments being applied to reward mediocrity, because it happened to be feeble and impoverished. If the pension were withdrawn, as it ought to be, and a subscription to aid Mr. Young entered into by his friends and patrons, he (Mr. O'Reilly) would be happy to subscribe. The granting of the pension he considered an abuse of the fund.

MR. HUNT said, his acquaintance with the works of Mr. Robert Young had only commenced that evening, and he thought it would probably end there. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that these pensions ought to be confined to persons of eminence in literature or science, and ought not to be granted to persons in Mr. Young's rank of life.

MR. O'REILLY: I said literary eminence, not grade of life. Robert Burns was in a humble position, but he was a man of genius.

MR. HUNT said, the hon. Gentleman had several times referred to Robert Young having commenced life as a "nailer," and seemed to think that he was thereby fastening an opprobrious epithet on him. He had supposed, therefore, his complaint was that a person of such humble origin had been selected for a pension. Now, it had for many years been the practice of Prime Ministers not only to give pensions of larger extent to persons of eminent literary and scientific attainments, but pensions of similar amount as that given to Mr. Young to persons of humble origin, who had so far educated themselves as to publish poems acceptable to their readers; and it seemed to him very desirable to encourage men who, without having had educational advantages, had devoted themselves to literary pursuits, even though their works were not such as to deserve world-wide fame. It was plain from the way in which the extracts that had been read had been received, that Mr. Young's poems were not appreciated by that House. Tastes, however, differed. The hon. Member had said it was difficult to obtain a copy of his books, the natural inference from which would be that they were valuable works, and were greedily bought up. The hon. Gentleman, however, said they had been burnt; but he did not say whether he stated this of his own knowledge. He held in his hand a volume, of which no less than twelve pages of small print were occupied with subscribers' names. ["Read!"] If he read them, the House would probably be none the wiser, for they were mostly those of persons unknown to him; but so long a list showed that many persons in Ireland were anxious to encourage Mr. Young in his poetical efforts. The memorial upon which Lord Derby granted the pension was signed by clergymen of various denominations, magistrates, members of corporations and others. It described him as the Irish historical and agricultural poet, and stated that he had published four volumes of different degrees of merit, which had been well received and widely circulated. It also stated that his writings were strictly moral, and that their tendency was to inculcate loyalty to the Throne, and to promote feelings of mutual goodwill among the people. It then went on to say that if the noble Lord made some provision for Mr. Young, it would afford great gratification not only to the people of Derry, but to the whole of Ulster. That was the memorial on which Lord Derby acted. It was quite clear the Prime Minister had not time to peruse the volumes of every poet whose claims were brought before him for a pension, but that he must necessarily be guided by the representations of others. He had pointed out that Mr. Young's poems were largely subscribed for, and from the number of signatures to the memorial it was quite clear that his poems created considerable interest in his neighbourhood. The hon. Gentleman assumed that Mr. Young's claim rested on political grounds, and that the adherents of Lord Derby were the only persons anxious to give him a pension. The hon. Gentleman spoke of Mr. Young as having passed his life in abusing persons of the Roman Catholic faith. If so, all he should say was that they must be of the most forgiving nature, because at the head of the list of signatures was the Roman Catholic Bishop of Derry. The Protestant Bishop of Derry likewise signed the me-memorial, together with three Roman Catholic priests, two Presbyterian ministers, one Congregational Minister, and one Dissenting minister. So that persons of all sects and denominations came forward to bear testimony to the merits of Mr. Young. The memorial was also signed by twelve justices of the peace. As a Prime Minister was obliged to be dependent upon the representations of others in such matters, and as out of all question Lord Derby had never read a line of Mr. Young's poems, what more complete testimony in favour of a man of that humble rank could he have than when such a body of persons, including ministers of all denominations and twelve justices of the peace, came forward and bore testimony to his merits? Under these circumstances, he asserted that Lord Derby was justified in granting a pension to Mr. Young, supposing that pensions of that kind were to be granted at all to persons of that class of life. It was suggested that his noble Friend the Member for Londonderry (Lord Claud Hamilton) had got up this testimonial as a sort of political weapon to strengthen his influence at elections; but he held in his hand letters from persons who could not be considered as political adherents of Lord Derby. Here was a letter addressed to the noble Lord the Member for Londonderry—

"I think that Mr. Young is well deserving of a small pension. I have always understood him to be a very respectable person, and that he has educated himself in a manner highly creditable to him."

This letter was signed "Dufferin." That noble Lord was a distinguished member of the late Government, and he had never heard that he was known for his Orange tendencies. On the principle of laudari a laudato viro he would next quote a letter signed by Lord Cremorne, now Earl Dartrey, a man whom Earl Russell delighted to honour:—

"Dear Claud Hamilton,—I shall be very glad if Mr. Young's well-known poetical abilities are rewarded by placing him on the Pension List, and I authorize you to attach my name to any memorial that may be presented on this subject to Earl Russell."

He read these letters to show that there was no foundation for saying that this was a mere Orange memorial, or that it was got up for electioneering purposes in Londonderry. Although the House might not appreciate Mr. Young's poems—and he confessed for himself that he would much rather read Lord Derby's translation of

Homer—yet he trusted that he had satisfied the House that Lord Derby had not in this matter acted in a hasty or hurried manner, because he had been fully supported by the representations made on behalf of Mr. Young. After the testimonials which had been addressed to the noble Earl it was clear that he was justified in granting that pension, if such allowances were ever to be made to poets in the humbler ranks of life.

MR. COGAN said, he considered that every one who had listened to the speech of his hon. Friend who had brought the subject forward must be convinced that Lord Derby had been shamefully imposed on in this matter, and that if his Lordship had exercised a little more care and caution the grant to Mr. Young would never have been made. The Government had carelessly prostituted—not to use too strong a word—a portion of the fund set apart to reward literature and art to the vilest purposes. The reply of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was most unsatisfactory, and though it had called forth the mirth of the House, the subject-matter was really too serious to be turned into a joke. It was a sad and lamentable reflection that the bounty of the Crown should be conferred on a man who had turned the little talents—and they were small enough—which he possessed to inflame and embitter the animosities which raged so fiercely in the North of Ireland. He held in his hand the volume containing the "poems" of the person thus marked out for the distinguishing favour of a pension, and they were so full of ribaldry, if not, indeed, of blasphemy, that he really did not dare to read them to the House. He would hand the book to the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he liked. [The Chancellor of the Exchequer dissented.] Well, if the right hon. Gentleman—whose fine literary taste the House was well acquainted with, and was justly proud of—would devote a short time to the perusal of the volume, he (Mr. Cogan) was convinced that before twenty-four hours had passed away the pension would be revoked. His hon. Friend, when he brought forward the subject, had not concluded with a Motion; because he never for a moment supposed that, after the light which he was prepared to throw on the appointment, the Government would try to vindicate or maintain it. He still hoped that before the debate closed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would rise in his place and announce that the Government would reconsider the matter ; but if this was not done, he begged to inform the House that his hon. Friend would feel it to be his duty, on another occasion, to bring forward a distinct Motion for the discontinuance of the pension ; and he believed that such a Motion would be carried by an overwhelmingly large majority.

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING-MAXWELL said, he would entreat the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remember the course pursued in a case similar to the present one by Lord Palmerston when Prime Minister. That noble Lord, when it was made plain to him that he had been led to confer a literary pension of that kind on a person who was unworthy of it, announced, after some consideration, that the pension would be withdrawn. That was a proceeding which commended itself to both sides of the House, and he thought it was an example which he might most respectfully beg to submit to the notice of the right hon. Gentleman and to Lord Derby. In the remarks which it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to offer to the House that evening they all knew that he had a very difficult task to perform. A pension had been granted, and it was that right hon. Gentleman's duty to rise at that table and defend it. ["No!"] Well, the Secretary to the Treasury was there, and it was his business to make a speech on the occasion. He could not, however, congratulate either that hon. Gentleman, or the unfortunate recipient of that pension, on the success of that speech. Every word which the hon. Gentleman had said proved either that that particular pension ought not to have been conferred, or, perhaps, that pensions of that kind ought not to be granted at all. The sum at Her Majesty's disposal for the reward of persons who distinguished themselves in literature, in art, or in the public service was, they knew, very limited ; but it was a sum which had been the means of promoting the comfort, and in some degree rewarding the talents and services, of many eminent persons. And he did say that the House which voted that sum had a right to see that those rewards, small as they were, and must be when bestowed upon persons of real merit, were not made ridiculous and contemptible by being conferred upon individuals like the poet whose works had now been brought before them. A memorial to the Government, as he understood, had been signed by many persons of distinction and position in the part of Ireland where that gentleman resided, and letters were written by them to their friends in the Cabinet. They got their friends to do the same ; and yet not one of those noble Lords or hon. Gentlemen had thought it right to come there and help the Secretary of the Treasury to defend what had been done. The question involved in the granting of those literary pensions was a very large one, and he should not enter into it on that occasion. He must, however, call the attention of the House to the example —if, indeed, example were wanting— which was furnished by the present discussion of the utter worthlessness of all memorials. Hon. Members knew that any person was ready to sign any paper which might be laid before him on any subject, provided he saw a certain number of names already attached to it. From what had that evening occurred they might learn that they could not depend even on private letters, for he could not pay his noble Friends whose letters had been read the poor compliment of saying that they were acquainted with Mr. Young's works. If they had been acquainted with them they would scarcely have desired to have been presented to the House as having displayed so remarkable a taste in literary criticism. He hoped that what had just passed would convince the Government that the granting of the pension to Mr. Young was a matter which ought to be re-considered. It was suggested that it had been granted out of charity to a person who was poor and old, and in bad health ; but he could not see how the House, although it might decide that he should be deprived of that pension, would be committing in the administration of the public funds the slightest injustice by handing him over to the charity of his acquaintances and friends, among whom it appeared he was respected, and who, he must say, owed him, he thought, considerable reparation for having been the means of dragging him and his works as they had been dragged before the House.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he considered that the hon. Gentleman opposite was hardly justified, considering the number and weight of the names attached to the recommendation to Lord Derby in favour of Mr. Young, in imputing to those gentlemen an attempt to impose upon the noble Earl. No such attempt had been made, and no grounds whatever for such an imputation existed. The hon. Baronet the Member for Perthshire had criticised the absence from the House of all the Gentlemen who had signed the recommendation. Now he (Sir Hervey Bruce) was one of those whose signatures were attached. He was prepared to justify the recommendation; and, though he was not in his seat when the debate commenced, it was because he did not expect that it would have come on so early. The absence of other gentlemen who had joined in the recommendation, and especially of the noble Lord (Lord Claud Hamilton), was explained by the assizes that were now being held and by other business; and, if the hon. Gentleman opposite had desired to have all information on the subject, it would have been better if he had put off the Motion for a week.

MR. O'REILLY said, that he had written to the noble Lord in question, and had had no reply; but he had been informed that his noble Relative in the House would represent the noble Lord.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he was not aware of this; but he trusted that he had explained the absence of the noble Lord, as well as that of many others of those who signed the recommendation. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cogan) had thought it his duty to attribute the pension of Mr. Young to party motives, and had suggested that he was indebted to it for the inflammatory tone of the poems.

MR. COGAN said, that he had conveyed no such imputation; but only expressed his regret that the writer of such a tendency should have been selected for the bounty of the Crown.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, that he had no desire to adopt the insignificant line of argument involved in retorting upon an opponent that he had been guilty of the very offence with which he charged you. But he warned the right hon. Gentleman opposite to beware before he brought forward a Motion for the discontinuance of the pension, for if that were done, he (Sir Hervey Bruce) could place this pension in a light of transcendent eminence compared with some that had been made on the other side of the House. He desired to mention no names; but he should be fully prepared to do so, if the threat of the right hon. Gentleman were carried out. When it was argued that Mr. Young was an insignificant poet, the House must remember that a pension of £40 a year was intended only for comparative insignificance, and that such a sum would be beneath the acceptance of any man of even moderate position in the intellectual world. A Milton or a Byron needed not the Queen's bounty. But it might very fairly be given as a reward to a poet in humble life, who had been able to write verses that were admired by those among whom he lived. He (Sir Hervey Bruce), knowing Mr. Young well, and the neighbourhood in which he resided, could say that this was the case in the present instance. The poems of Mr. Young were read by the poorer classes in the district with pleasure if with no particular benefit to their minds. He was therefore no unfit recipient of the Queen's bounty, which was intended for the benefit of poor men, not of rich ones. He thought this man had shown himself able in the sphere of life into which he had been born, and had written a certain kind of poetry which went down very well with the people for whom it was written. Under these circumstances, he did not think it was fair to challenge the pension. The hon. Member said his attack was not against the man but the principle. If so, it would have been fairer to have attacked the principle and let the man alone. He defended the grant upon the broad principle that it was a pension given out of Her Majesty's bounty, one of the objects of which was to give help to self-educated meritorious men in struggling circumstances.

MR. O'NEILL said, he did not happen to be in the House when the discussion commenced, and he had not therefore heard the charges which it seemed had been made as to the use of inflammatory language in the works of Mr. Young. All he could say was that when he signed the memorial to Lord Derby he did so after having seen some of the poetry in question, which, so far as he could judge, contained nothing inflammatory or objectionable. He thought, knowing as he did that Mr. Young was in distressed circumstances, that he was of good character, and in every way, so far as he was aware, deserving of the recognition which it was proposed to obtain for him, that his was a case in which a pension might properly be granted. That was the sole motive which had led him to attach his signature to the memorial.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to call attention to the present aspect of the Fenian conspiracy. In reference to a previous statement of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that he could afford no information as to the origin, nature, or extent of the conspiracy, he wished to know whether an inquiry had been instituted for the purpose of obtaining such information, and the nature thereof; and, if not, whether it was intended to institute such inquiry? He had visited Ireland on the 12th of July, and thought it only fair to a class which had been much maligned to bear his testimony to their admirable conduct. Positive orders had been given by the Lord Lieutenant that no public meeting of Orangemen should be held on that day; but under the advice of a magistrate, who held that the Lord Lieutenant had exceeded his duty, they did assemble to the number of some 20,000. An enormous number of dragoons and foot soldiers was sent to put them down; but the officers, in conversation with him, admitted that a more orderly or peaceable assembly they had never seen, and they greatly regretted that their orders were so peremptory. He told the officers that he was prepared to accept the responsibility of the proceedings. He should gladly have received a communication from the Lord Lieutenant or Lord Chancellor upon the point, but nothing ever came of it. The statements which had been made in the course of this debate were malicious and calumnious.

MR. O'REILLY said, he rose to order. Was it proper that statements made in the course of a debate should be designated as calumnious?

MR. SPEAKER: The words used were "malicious and calumnious," and I think those words should not have been used.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would leave the House to form its own opinion. For himself he withdrew entirely the words he had used. He would quote a passage which deserved almost to be written in letters of gold, commencing, "Justice to Ireland?—Do it," and describing the hatred of Irishmen to everything English. This passage he attributed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Young had obtained honour of all persons who could appreciate his sentiments, which he with great humility offered to him on that occasion. Before hon. Gentlemen presumed to express the feelings of England they must get repealed that part of our Constitution which required the Queen upon her oath to declare that the things which the poet Young has been engaged in denouncing are blasphemous fables and dangerous deceptions. As the House seemed for once inclined to afford him a hearing, he would state the most unusual and improper mode in which the noble Lord had answered his (Mr. Whalley's) questions about Father Maginn and Bishop Moriarty. He asked whether Father Maginn refused to be sworn against the men engaged in the affray where the police-constable Duggan was shot, saying he was acting as a priest; and whether he had the effrontery to say that he purposely put his handkerchief over his eyes that he might not see who were the parties engaged in the murderous affray; and whether Bishop Moriarty had approved the conduct of Father Maginn. The noble Lord said he had received no information upon the subject, and that no investigation had taken place; but the information contained in his (the hon. Member's) Question was communicated to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who suggested it should be forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant, and the Lord Lieutenant's secretary answered that communication. Notwithstanding this, the noble Lord had led the House to believe that there had been no investigation whatever. He submitted that this must be borne in mind in regard to any matters he might have to submit to the House to justify an inquiry into the present state of the Fenian conspiracy. Last Session he endeavoured to bring this subject before the House; but after an hour's attempt to be heard the Speaker intimated that he could not obtain for him a hearing, and that it would bring discredit upon that assembly if he proceeded further. In yielding on that occasion he thought he had entitled himself to some consideration on the present occasion, when the facts, as they had developed themselves from day to day, had tended very much to confirm the statement he then made, that this Fenian conspiracy was a very serious matter, that there was a very deep and extensive organization, and that the mistakes which had been made by the Government at that time ought to induce them to institute full inquiry. The mistakes and miscalculations had continued since, and there was therefore the more reason now for an investigation of the subject. It was with no hope of restoring peace to Ireland that he proposed this, because the disturbances of 1867, like those of 1848, 1798, and 1641, were due, not to political, but to religious causes. It was said there were religious wrongs in Ireland. Those wrongs were that persons differing from the Roman Catholics in religion were allowed to live, write poetry, speak, and act amongst them. It was a religious wrong that he should be allowed to speak, and the poet Young to write. When General Garibaldi was over here he purposed visiting Ireland, to point out to the people how they could relieve themselves from their troubles; but the most eminent men on both sides of that House, when they heard that such was his intention, hurried him out of the country. He had seen in the handwriting of Garibaldi that which amounted to a statement that he was sent away to prevent his expressing the sentiments which he (Mr. Whalley) was now endeavouring to express. He had lately visited Wolverhampton, Chester, and Liverpool, and found no difference of opinion on this point—that the danger to be apprehended from a Fenian rising was co-extensive with the cause which made the Roman Catholic quarters of those towns the scenes of constant squabbling. The outbreak of Fenianism was for the purpose of supporting an application contemporaneously made to the President of the United States, to declare the Irish republic belligerent, and he had seen a statement to the effect that several of the leading merchants of New York had subscribed 5,000,000 of dollars, to be employed, when England was engaged in civil or foreign war, in fitting out privateers under the flag of the enemy, whether that enemy should be Irish Republicans or foreign Powers. Another statement was, that during Smith O'Brien's rebellion in 1848 a subscription was organized on his behalf in America, some of the subscribers being leading statesmen of the day, including Mr. Seward and Mr. Horace Greely, and that when the rebellion was over 95,000 dollars of this money remained in hand, which sum the Fenians were now seeking to recover. It was said they could not restore permanent tranquillity to Ireland unless they redressed the religious wrongs of the country. No doubt it was a wrong that he was allowed to speak in that House, and it was a most grievous outrage that Mr. Young should be allowed to publish his poetry. According to these persons Ireland could not be relieved from her wrongs till persons of different opinions from the Roman Catholics consented to hold their tongues, and not in any way to interfere with the full exercise of the utmost authority of the papacy. If they could not throw off that yoke, if they must continue to subsidize their irreconcilable enemy, there should at all events be an inquiry into the origin of the rebellion. They would then have no more of those transparent falsehoods about the political wrongs of Ireland being the cause of the outbreak, and they would at all events be doing something to maintain the character of England, if they could not maintain her independence of this foreign power.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he was surprised, after the appeal of the hon. Member for Perthshire for the re-consideration of the question of the pension, that no Member of the Government had risen to give any reasons in its favour. The principle involved was a very serious one; and he was surprised to hear it said that anybody who endeavoured to educate himself, or who wrote a book that went down with a certain class of people, was eligible for a pension. This announcement had astonished him. In his country—Ireland—there were many humble men, self-educated men, who had illustrated the language, the history, and the antiquities of Ireland, who had received no pension. But here was a man pandering to the worst passions of our race, by writing, he would not call it poetry, but ribald trash, who was receiving a pension for literary services. If Lord Derby had been assured that the productions were not of a party character that matter should be explained. His own opinion was that Lord Derby had been imposed upon. This was a matter in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer might interfere. The right hon. Gentleman was a man himself of the highest literary character, and if he took up by chance this volume and read any page of it, would hardly endorse the exercised discretion which granted the pension in question for such wretched poetry. The Secretary of the Treasury had defended the granting of this pension. But he (Mr. Sullivan) said it was a scandal to the country that such a grant should have been made. It was a great injustice to those who had a claim to a share of the literary fund that a poetaster should be deemed worthy of a pension, and that the bestowal of it should be sustained.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It was my intention to have risen, Sir, when the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) caught your eye; but as he seemed anxious to speak on the general merits of the question, particularly as it related to the country in which this act of patronage has been exercised, I was unwilling to interpose. I would mention, in the first place, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just addressed the House labours under an error in thinking that this pension was granted from the Literary Fund. The Literary Fund is a private institution, presided over by Earl Stanhope.

MR. SULLIVAN said, what he meant was the fund at the disposal of the Crown for Literary pensions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: There is no such fund or bounty in existence, although the mistake is not one confined to the hon. and learned Gentleman. Her Majesty has the power, with the consent of Parliament, of distributing the sum of £1,500 annually in pensions; but that sum is not exclusively devoted to literary or scientific claims, and it is only by the gracious permission of Her Majesty that a portion of it has been devoted to these purposes. It has been distributed ever since Her Majesty's accession, and has not been considered to be a profuse amount; but it was not all destined to be devoted to the claims of literature and science. There is no doubt but that of late years a considerable portion has, by the gracious consideration of Her Majesty, been allotted to these purposes; and I think that, on the whole, the pensions that have been awarded to science and literature have been granted with great taste and discretion by whatever Government happened to be in power. There have been cases, certainly, more than one, in which, upon erroneous statements to persons in authority, pensions have been granted—one, a case of great notoriety, with which the House is familiar. These cases are to be regretted; but we must remember that in granting these pensions, in which the claims of literature are concerned, the Prime Minister cannot always act on his own personal experience. A man of great accomplishments, as Prime Ministers generally are, and as we must all admit Lord Derby to be, will have acquaintance with the merits of literary men of high eminence; but literature is so multifarious in its character, that it is hard for a Minister to know the merits of all who may prefer a claim to the Royal bounty. As a general rule, he must depend on the representation of others. In the case of a great poet, like Mr. Tennyson, or an accomplished scholar, like Mr. Southey, the reputation of the individuals would be a sure guide; but there are many other instances, perhaps a majority, in which pensions are granted without the previous knowledge on the part of the Minister who is responsible. On what, then, must he depend? I take the case of a poet—of a person whom the hon. and learned Gentleman calls a poetaster, or it may be a poet. It might be the case of the author of a Farmer's Boy, or some other work which is now looked upon as a rustic classic. How would it be possible in such a case for a Prime Minister of England to be familiar with the merits of a Bloomfield or a Clare? He must be guided by persons in the locality in which the writer had distinguished himself. Now what happened in the present case? We are told now that this writer is a poetaster, and that his writings are distinguished by very vindictive feelings and the worst passions of a violent political faction. This may be true, it may or it may not be true, and if the test is to depend on my reading this writer's works, I must say, with all respect to the distinguished persons interested, that I would not undertake to read them through. What is it Lord Derby sees? That wonderful and mysterious document which exercises such an influence in all the transactions of public life—a memorial. He sees that, with all that patriotism and liberality which has always distinguished the Irish people, the memorial in favour of this poetaster who had indulged in the worst rancour of Orange politics is signed by a Roman Catholic prelate of that part of the country. It was unjust thus to treat Lord Derby. It was not fair thus to throw him off his guard, to play off this hoax upon him. I am the last man who would reward a poetaster, whether he was an Orangeman or of opposite politics, who attempted by means of his power of versification to propagate opinions of a malevolent description; but I should myself be thrown off my guard if he came recommended by a Roman Catholic prelate, or vice versa by a Protestant prelate. It was no doubt actuated by the sublimest feelings of charity and patriotism, that the Roman Catholic prelate, in this case, recommended the writer who had attacked his creed and country. I know there is a Christian charity that may distinguish Roman Catholic prelates and Protestant prelates. There is a sublime feeling of forgiveness described by the hon. Member for Longford. And no doubt it was in consequence of this person's continuous attacks on his creed and worship that the Roman Catholic bishop was induced to recommend him for a pension. I think we should take a large and generous view of this case. Lord Derby is, perhaps, by natural temperament too apt to believe what people tell him, and when a man in the position of a Roman Catholic prelate makes an appeal he would naturally believe his statement. Who can believe that Lord Derby would refuse? If he were a cautious or suspicious character he might hesitate. He might think that the man was perhaps a strong political or religious partisan, and that representations had been made to him which the circumstances did not justify. But I look about—I look again at the memorial, and I find that one of the most accomplished men in Ireland, and a practical statesman of the Liberal school, has also signed it. I find attached to it the classic name of Dufferin, a nobleman who is not attached to the party of Lord Derby. I find also the name of a nobleman, a high Wig—the name of Lord Cremorne. Lord Cremorne is particularly anxious that this pension should be bestowed. I say, then, that all these circumstances must be taken into consideration; and when Roman Catholic prelates and Whig Peers and statesmen came forward and pressed upon Lord Derby the exercise of the patronage of the Crown, it is really too absurd to have strictures made in this House as if this was some villanous political job by which some reckless political partisan was to be rewarded. It is quite clear that Lord Derby—perhaps from some error in his education, was not acquainted with the writings of Mr. Young. But when this memorial came supported by Anglican and Roman Catholic prelates, countenanced by endless local potentates, by justices without end, and by the distinguished names of Dufferin and Cremorne—men well known for their acquaintance with literature and science, surely Lord Derby was justified in granting such an inconsiderable pittance. The moral which this case, as well as the whole experience of my life, teaches me is to beware of testimonials. Nobody ever acted on a testimonial who had not afterwards cause to regret it. I am sure that Lord Derby would be sorry to do an unkind or harsh act to any one; but he will notice in the spirit of a man of the world what has occurred in this House, and will do what is proper. In future, when asked to do a similar act by Protestant and Roman Catholic prelates and by Liberal Peers, he will, I am sure, if he possibly can, first read the works of the poet who is to receive the pension.

Whereupon Question again proposed,

“That 65,300 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services, for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1868, including 16,200 Royal Marines.”—(Mr. Childers.)

MR. LAIRD said, he hoped the Chairman would be allowed to report Progress. At that late hour it would be impossible to go on, as several hon. Members had intended to speak at some length on this Vote.

MR. CHILDERS said, he made a similar request on behalf of the hon. Member for Hertford. He knew that a considerable number of Members on both sides of the House intended to speak on the subject.

MR. CORRY said, he thought it very desirable to make progress with the Estimates, as only a Vote of £1,000,000 had been taken on account of the men and nothing on the other heads, and they were approaching the end of the financial year. But as he was informed that some six or eight Members intended to speak on this Vote, none of whom were likely to be very brief in their observations, he thought he had better at once postpone further progress till Thursday next after the Mutiny Bill.

MR. CHILDERS said, that if it were felt at all desirable a further Vote on Account might be taken.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that that would not be requisite.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 47.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. LAWSON said, that as this was the same Bill which the late Government had introduced, he had no objection to the House going into Committee on it ; but he wished first to know what Her Majesty's present Government intended to do with the subsequent or supplemental Reports of the same Commissioners upon whose first Report this Bill was based. Did they intend to introduce a second Bill ?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) said, that with regard to the second Report of the Commissioners, which dealt with the official staff of the Court of Chancery, it was considered better to deal with it in an independent Bill ; and he could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Bill was in preparation and would be introduced as early as possible.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Appointment of Vice Chancellor).

GENERAL DUNNE said, that as the Bill proposed the appointment of a Vice Chancellor in the place of three Masters, and as the duties of the latter were to be discharged by chief clerks, with authority and power nearly equal to the Masters, but certainly with not the same amount of legal knowledge, he wished to know if the proposed change would increase the expense to the suitors as well as to the country by the pensions to be granted to the retiring Masters ?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) said, the procedure of the court would not only be more effective but cheaper. The chief clerks were not intended to take the place of the Masters, but to take the non-judicial business and carry it out under the directions of the Vice Chancellor.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Appointment of Successors of Vice Chancellor).

MR. LAWSON said, there was now much unnecessary expense, attended with delay, owing to the needless multiplication of documents and meetings, which might be avoided by a single Judge taking a case throughout, and he would suggest that there should be two scales of costs—the lower one for cases involving sums below a certain amount.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 10, inclusive, agreed to.

VOL. CLXXXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Clause 11 (Appointment of Chief Clerks).

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he had to propose an Amendment, which had been formerly proposed by the present Attorney General for Ireland. Its object was to prevent the delegation of duties resulting in the creation of bastard Masters, men not qualified to discharge judicial duties. In form it was to omit certain words, and to insert others requiring that the chief clerk "shall assist the Judge in business not of a judicial character."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) said, he would accept the principle of the Amendment.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16 (Tenure of Office of Chief Clerk).

MR. CHILDERS said, that under the clause as it stood, a chief clerk appointed under this Act would be entitled to set up a claim to be compensated to the full amount of his salary in case of his office being abolished.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) said, the clause was like the clause in the Act relating to the officers of the English Court of Chancery.

MR. CHILDERS said, that was the very reason he objected to it. He suggested that if the words "shall hold his office on the same terms as a civil officer" were added, his objection would be removed.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) said, he consented to postpone the clause.

Clause 28 postponed.

Clauses 29 to 39, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 40.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

FACTORY ACTS EXTENSION BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord John Manners, Sir John Pakington.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WALPOLE moved the second reading of this Bill. He said, that it should be set down for Committee on an open evening, perhaps the 29th April, of which hon. Members should have due notice. If the hon. Member for Manchester desired then to move that the Bill be sent to a Select Committee, he should have an opportunity of doing so.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Walpole.)

MR. FAWCETT said, he hoped that the second reading would be postponed, as the measure was of so important a character that it would be better to afford an opportunity for discussing it upon the second reading. He suggested that the second reading should be postponed and fixed for some other day before Easter. He should take an opportunity of moving a Resolution on Tuesday which would have the effect of raising the whole question, which was exciting the greatest interest throughout the country.

MR. WALPOLE said, he should have been glad to follow that course; but there was no Government night between now and Easter on which he could be sure to bring the measure forward again. If, however, the second reading were agreed to, there would be ample opportunity for discussing the provisions of the Bill in Committee.

MR. AYRTON said, the hon. Member for Brighton could not do as he proposed, and suggested that the Motion for reading the Bill the second time should be put down for Tuesday.

MR. SPEAKER said, that if the Bill were read a second time now, and its further consideration were postponed to a distant day, it would not be in accordance with the rules of the House to discuss it in the interval, as proposed by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett).

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to ask whether the Government contemplated introducing a measure embodying the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Agricultural Gangs, the touching disclosures of whose Report he had read with much pain.

MR. POWELL said, he apprehended that there would be the greatest difficulty in the way of this being done; and if the hours of labour of these children were to be limited, the only consequence would be to expose them to greater temptations to vice. He hoped the Government would bring other trades under the provisions of the Bill besides those it dealt with.

Mr. Walpole

MR. DILLWYN said, he should move the adjournment of the debate, as he thought it most important that the Bill should be properly discussed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. AYRTON said, he should support the Motion for adjournment, because he thought it useless to discuss a Bill on the Motion for going into Committee unless the Committee itself was postponed. It was most important that the Bill should be thoroughly discussed, in order that the country might understand its provisions.

MR. FAWCETT said, that the second reading should be adjourned for the present, but still be fixed for a day before Easter.

MR. WALPOLE said, every Government night between now and Easter was filled up; but if the House would consent to the second reading, he would not go into Committee until the Bill had been fully discussed.

MR. CANDLISH said, he thought they ought to read the Bill a second time that night.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Walpole.)

MR. CANDLISH said, he trusted that the proposed limitation of hours would not be applied to the glass trade, as that trade could not be carried on within the limits as to time imposed by the Bill. The necessary skill could only be acquired by practice from a very early age.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday, 29th April.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS (DESPATCH OF BUSINESS) BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in laying on the table a Bill to relieve the Judges of a portion of their business in Chambers, said, at present the principal part of the practice of the Superior Courts was transacted in Chambers, and a great portion of these duties might just as well be performed by the Masters of the Courts. Last Session, when the salaries of the Masters were increased, he caused a letter to be written to them, informing them that a proposal would be made that additional duties of this kind should be imposed upon them, and giving them to understand that no additional remuneration would be granted on that account. At present, some one Judge was obliged to rise at one o'clock, in order to attend Chambers, and thus half the day was lost. He proposed that the Judges should have the power of making rules and regulations for the purpose of transferring to the Masters such of the business of Chambers as they might think desirable. The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving the first reading of the Bill.

LORD CRANWORTH thought that the measure would be very useful.

PENSION TO MR. YOUNG, AGRICULTURAL AND HISTORICAL POET.

EXPLANATION.

LORD DUFFERIN said, he desired to offer an explanation of the part which he had taken in recommending Mr. Young to the First Minister for a pension, as it appeared to have been alluded to in "another place" on Friday night. To the best of his recollection he did not sign the memorial, but he wrote a letter in support of it. Having recently paid a visit to Derry he had naturally taken an interest in the historical associations of the town, and in that way he became acquainted with Mr. Young, who had published a very interesting volume of poems, the greater portion of which were not original; but which he had collected, edited, and annotated with considerable care. There were pieces in this volume of great interest to the historian and antiquary. In the same volume were other poems written by Mr. Young, of no very considerable merit, but inoffensive and evincing a certain amount of intelligence, which was the more worthy of notice as he had been a working artisan, and had raised himself by his own exertions. Upon his return home he received a letter from Mr. Young stating that he was in distressed circumstances, and that owing to his advanced years he was no longer able to support himself by manual labour. He (Lord Dufferin) retained so pleasing a recollection of Mr. Young's book, and of the real and bond fide value of his contribution to the literature of the Province, that he was induced to afford him some pecuniary assistance—a circumstance to which he might appeal for the purpose, showing the sincerity of his opinion. It was afterwards represented to him that Mr. Young's friends were anxious to present to the Treasury a memorial requesting that a pension of moderate amount might be granted to Mr. Young, so as to keep him out of the poorhouse. It had been said that unless a person felt himself justified in contributing individually to the assistance of an indigent man, he had no right to recommend that the State should do so. He, however, was perfectly convinced in his own mind that Mr. Young had in his humble sphere made a very tangible and valuable addition to the literature of the North of Ireland, and it was this ground that disposed him to accede to the request which was made to him. That disposition, moreover, was confirmed by the fact that the memorial contained the signatures not only of Protestant magistrates and citizens of Derry, but of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Derry, and of a great number of Roman Catholic magistrates and citizens of the district. Anyone acquainted with the North of Ireland must be aware that it was not a common occurrence for those two classes to act in concert; and the natural inference would be that works which had obtained the commendation of both of them must possess considerable merit. It was on that account, as well as on account of the personal consideration in which he was held by his fellow-citizens, and of the literary character of the book, that he had felt himself justified in recommending Mr. Young for a pension. He should be inclined to urge upon the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) the propriety of persisting in the course which, as he understood, had been adopted, were it not for a circumstance which, he was sorry to say, had been brought under the notice of the other House, but which had not come within his own knowledge—namely, that immediately after the pension was granted Mr. Young's friends adopted the extraordinary proceeding of destroying his works. If that were true, it was a very ill-advised act, and reflected great discredit on those who advised it; but if it were not true, it certainly ought to be contradicted.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The noble Lord opposite has an advantage, if it be so considered, over me, inasmuch as he is acquainted with Mr. Young's works, whereas I have not read a single line of them, with the exception of some quotations which have been read elsewhere, and which have certainly not impressed me with a very high opinion of his poetical genius. It is perfectly true, as has been stated by the noble Lord, that I received various memorials in favour of this gentleman, stating that he was originally in very humble life, and that he had made a valuable contribution to the literature of the North of Ireland. I found that he was in pecuniary difficulties, and I had recommendations from both Roman Catholics and Protestants stating that the tendency of his works was to inculcate obedience to the law and good feeling between all classes of the community, and that there was considerable merit in many of his productions. Indeed, there could not have been a stronger testimonial. I may here take the opportunity of stating that the amount of the fund at the disposal of the Crown has been rather exaggerated in the discussion which has taken place elsewhere, inasmuch as the whole sum which can be granted in any one year is not £1,500, but £1,200; and I can assure your Lordships that there is no more painful task than to have to decide on the various claims which are made, it being in many cases impossible to make an adequate grant. No doubt, claims are occasionally made in which the persons concerned have not sufficient merit to deserve a pension; but in the present case I cannot accuse myself of any want of caution. Considering the recommendations which were given by the Roman Catholic Bishop, the Protestant Bishop, and by gentlemen of the highest character of every party and persuasion, I cannot think that I acted incautiously in assigning him the small pension of £40 to save him from the workhouse. It has been said, indeed, elsewhere that those who have to dispense these pensions ought to make themselves personally acquainted with the works on behalf of which they are claimed. I can only say that such an examination of works by various authors on various subjects—philosophical, chymical, historical, political, and literary—would occupy very much more time than, in the situation which I have the honour to hold, I have to dispose of; and, if I did not grant a pension without making myself personally acquainted with the works of the claimants, the result would be to leave a considerable surplus even in the small sum of £1,200 which is at my disposal. I can only do the best in my power, by acting on what appears to be the trustworthy evidence of persons who have the means of knowing the character and merits of those whose cases are recommended to my consideration.

noble Earl open to censure, considering the strong terms of the memorials which he received from persons of various persuasions and parties; but he could not help thinking that those who signed the memorial were not wholly free from blame, and the noble Lord opposite (Lord Dufferin) would excuse him if he did not regard his explanation as on all points satisfactory. The noble Lord had stated that the volume which he read was not written, but simply edited and annotated by Mr. Young, and he could not think that such a volume was sufficient to entitle him to a pension. It must be remembered that only a limited amount was available, so that if grants were improperly made, an injustice was inflicted on those whose claims were well founded. He thought the signatures to the memorial had been attached without sufficient consideration, and such a laxity was neither just to the Government nor to the public.

LORD DUFFERIN, in explanation, said, that Mr. Young's labours had not been confined to the particular volume alluded to by the noble Earl. That volume, however, contained some of the most spirited ballads he had ever read, which otherwise might have perished or would not have been accessible to the public; and very often a greater service was rendered by such labours than by the publication of original works. He quite agreed that great care ought to be exercised in signing memorials, for not a week elapsed without his being asked to affix his name to such documents; but he had been careful not to mislead the Government or to overstate Mr. Young's merits, and in the letter which he wrote he simply stated that he thought Mr. Young deserving of a small pension, having always understood him to be a very respectable person, and that he had conducted himself in a highly creditable manner.

EMPLOYMENT OF VOLUNTEERS IN CIVIL DISTURBANCES.

THE INSTRUCTIONS.

LORD VIVIAN said, that a short time ago Her Majesty's Government promised that Instructions should be issued relative to the employment of the Volunteer Force, and he wished to know when they would be presented.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD regretted that some delay had occurred, in consequence of the necessity of consulting the Law Officers of the Crown. The Instructions which were in preparation would not be confined to the Volunteer Force—what was required was the preparation of Instructions which should be clearly understood by the Volunteers, the civil authorities, and the public, and which should be in exact accordance with the law. Great care was therefore necessary; but he hoped that the circular would be issued in a few days.

THE EARL OF CARDIGAN said, that when this question was raised in the House on a former occasion it was distinctly laid down that the Volunteers could be called out only in one case, and that was when an invasion of the country took place. Then arose another question, which was whether, as the Volunteers, like other citizens, might aid in the suppression of civil disturbance, they might make use of their military arms, taken out of the magazine in which they were placed. Now, that was a point which ought to be clearly and positively determined. In his opinion nothing could be more dangerous or objectionable than at a time of civil disturbance the Volunteers, not called out under their officers or acting under military command, should be permitted to go to the store and make use of the arms which they had taken thence. He trusted that the law on this point would be clearly and unmistakably laid down.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that he hoped that the Instructions on the subject would be very clear, so that the Volunteers might be freed from their present state of uncertainty.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE considered that, under any circumstances, the Volunteers should be empowered to defend their arms.

CONSTABULARY (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD, in moving for Returns relating to the conduct of the Constabulary during the recent disturbances in Ireland, said, that his object was not only to obtain information which ought to be in the hands of every Irishman, but also to have some record of the curious circumstances of the late attempt at insurrection in Ireland. These circumstances possessed a significance beyond the mere facts. Any one who had observed this Fenian movement for the last five years, who had watched the bragging boasts which had been uttered, the absurdity of the objects aimed at, the dishonesty which had accompanied the handling of money, the speculation which had almost universally existed—as was proved not only by the statements of persons in America, but also by the miserable arms provided for the dupes of the late attempt—and, above all, how hundreds ran away like sheep before a few policemen, must be ashamed almost of the very name of Irishman, were it not for two circumstances connected with the affair. In the first place, there was an extraordinary absence of personal outrage—a thing unparalleled in any popular rising—and he trusted that circumstance would be taken into account by-and-by, except where murder or an attempt at murder had taken place; and he feared there would be quite enough of instances of parties being accomplices in these crimes to make the punishment that would be inflicted sufficiently exemplary. The other most remarkable circumstance was the conduct of the police. The Irish police might be taken as a type of the Irish people. They were not sprung from the middle class; but were chiefly the sons of the small farmers—by far the most numerous class in Ireland—and had been brought up with all the feelings and prepossessions of that class. During the late insurrection, however, they had behaved with a gallant loyalty which had covered them with honour, and which, in his opinion, could not be surpassed. Now, looking at these people as a fair type of their fellow-countrymen, what was the inference? It was this, that though there might be disloyalty in Ireland, it could not be very deep when a few years of discipline and generous treatment had effectually eradicated it; and, at the same time, that the grievances could not be very sore which could be so easily borne. He was one of those who maintained that Ireland had no real grievances; but she has many sores—sores kept open for the basest and most selfish objects. He was one of those who approved the policy of Mr. Pitt, and would put the churches in Ireland on an equality. He would also allow to the tenant farmer in Ireland security in the enjoyment of all that he had invested in improvements undertaken with the landlord's consent. But although Ireland had sores which were continually kept open by persons whose interest it was to do so, she had no deep grievances, and the late events for the most part proved it. They were accustomed to hear statements from the Continent and from America magnifying the grievances and the wrongs of Ireland, and the usual strain of a popular orator in addressing Irishmen was—“Hereditary bondsmen, know ye not Who would be free themselves must strike

the blow.”

Well, but how had the “hereditary bondsmen” struck the blow this time? Why, with the exception of a few of the worst characters—and setting aside a few miserable shopboys—the whole rural population remained quiet in their houses. Even the boys employed in farm service, who were, he firmly believed, members of the conspiracy, slept out in the hedges, lest they should be taken out by their Fenian commanders; and one unfortunate youth, who naturally preferred his breakfast to a campaign in the field, was actually shot through the leg by one of those commanders, he supposed pour encourager les autres. That was the way the Irish people had behaved. But how about the Irish police—the six-foot high men—the sons of the Irish small farmers—of whom he remembered the late Duke of Norfolk, who had seen all the best troops of Europe, saying that they were the finest troops he had seen in Europe? Well, as for these men, stationed at outposts, scattered here and there, few in number, often apart from their officers, how did they behave? Why, the blow they struck, which was for the United Kingdom as well as for Ireland itself, they struck in such a way as to cover themselves with glory, and to do honour to the country which they protected. In one case, the wives of the policemen supplied them with ammunition, and cheered at every volley they fired at the hundreds who attacked them. There was a great lesson to be elicited from this affair, and it was this. He quite agreed with the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) in the remarks which he had made on this subject. He believed that the entire population sympathized with the Fenians, and that the small farmers, who had always been taught for political purposes that they had a right to the fee simple of their land, would not object to take possession of it if offered to them by a successful Fenian commander, if that commander should be so unwise as to give it to them instead of his own followers. But when the time for action came, and they saw what little chance of success there was, they then de-elined to strike a blow on account of the grievance of a Church which they did not maintain, and a Government which extended equal protection to them and to other classes of the community. Was it the case that Ireland was in a state of misery and oppression unparalleled in the world, except in the case of Poland, as was continually represented by American and foreign papers? Not at all. He had lately seen in a paper published abroad that every Fenian was shot as soon as taken, and the other stories of Irish grievances were about as well founded.

Moved, That there be laid before this House,

Return of the Names of the Police Stations in Ireland attacked during the late attempt at Insurrection, and successfully defended: Also,

The Numbers of Police Constables engaged in each such Defence; the Name of the Inspector, Sub-Inspector, Head Constable, or other commanding in each such Defence; and the supposed Number of Insurgents attacking in each case: Also,

The Names of the Police Stations to which the different Parties of Police belonged who met and successfully engaged the Insurgents in Places other than Police Stations; the Numbers of Police Constables so engaged in each such Place; the Name of the Inspector, Sub-Inspector, Head Constable, or other commanding in each such Case; and the supposed Number of Insurgents so met in each Place: And also,

The Names of any Officers or Police Constables killed or wounded during the late Attempt at Insurrection.—(The Viscount Lifford.)

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I think that the noble Lord has only done an act of justice in calling your Lordships' attention to the subject of these Returns. I shall be happy to consent to their production, for I entirely concur with the noble Lord that it is very desirable that there should be a permanent record of the services—the most valuable services—rendered during the insurrection by that admirable body of men, the Irish police, and more especially those who so signally distinguished themselves in suppressing the late rising. My noble Friend has referred to the circumstance—and I quite concur with him—that this body of police are sprung from a class among whom, if may say they were, from the people, and being habitually placed in circumstances under which, I venture to say, no regiment in Her Majesty's service could have been placed, even for a very short time, without becoming absolutely and entirely demoralized—scattered about in all parts of the country, without support, without the control of any superior officer, exposed to every possible temptation to disloyalty offered by persons, many of whose feelings and prejudices they must largely share—I must say it is in the highest degree creditable to the constabulary that they should not have shown the slightest manifestation of swerving from their duty; but that they should, on the contrary, have performed it in a way which surpasses all my powers of language to express. I have thought it due to them to say these few words in reference to their conduct; and I think it quite right that the individuals who have discharged their duty so meritoriously and with such fidelity and honour, should be placed before the country. I am sure, also, that your Lordships will concur in the propriety of the course the Government propose to adopt, in asking the House of Commons to vote a sum of money to be distributed among those who have chiefly distinguished themselves, and also to distribute among them badges of honour which will be permanent memorials of their courage and devotion.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: I must observe that all the facts brought to our knowledge in connection with the insurrection are totally inconsistent with the supposition, suggested by the noble Lord (Viscount Lifford), that the insurgents had the general sympathy of the people.

THE EARL OF CORK said, he desired to bear his testimony to the great courage shown by the Irish constabulary whenever they had been brought into contact with the misguided men who had vainly endeavoured to destroy the British Government. Where all had behaved so well it was difficult to make any particular distinction; but he could not help referring to the gallant stand made at a place not far from his property by fourteen policemen, who had bravely resisted some 300 insurgents for more than three hours. He had heard with great pleasure that it was the intention of the Government to reward those who had behaved so well; and he ventured to call attention to a recommendation made by a Royal Commission that, as an encouragement to the force, a certain degree of promotion should take place within it; so that the more deserving men might have the prospect of rising to the more lucrative position of sub-inspectors. The Government could not have a better opportunity than the present of carrying out this recommendation.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I am glad of this occasion to bear my testimony to the admirable conduct of the Irish constabulary. I have had the opportunity of seeing the reports from the various detachments of troops employed in the disturbed districts, and on every occasion they report that the conduct of the police was marked with the greatest possible loyalty and bravery, and that not in one single instance had they failed to do their duty. The position in which those men were placed was a most trying one. They were scattered in very small bodies all over the country, many of them were of the same class as the misguided people who have violated the law; these people had every facility for tempting the constabulary to swerve from their loyalty, and yet in not one single instance was that loyalty shaken. I rejoice to hear that the Government intend publicly to mark their sense of the conduct of the constabulary; and I am satisfied that the remarks made in this House, and the rewards they will now receive, will have the best possible effect and will induce them to continue the loyalty and bravery which they have recently displayed, and which, during my own residence in Ireland, always distinguished them.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I should be sorry to let this opportunity pass without bearing my testimony to the admirable manner in which the Irish constabulary behaved during the late outbreak. Having had full opportunity of observing the conduct of the constabulary during the time when I was Lord Lieutenant, I can say most positively that there was scarcely an instance in which the smallest sympathy with disaffection was observed among them. The same testimony, I believe, will be borne by the present Government of the entire absence of disaffection among the force. The behaviour of the constabulary upon recent occasions is such that, as the noble Earl opposite has said, it is entirely beyond any words of mine to express the honour due to them. It must be remembered—and I must repeat what has been said

already—that these men are scattered throughout the country in singularly small detachments; that the nature of their duties requires them to be in the closest contact with all classes of the population; and that they are consequently exposed to much greater temptation than can be brought to bear upon a military force. It is therefore not entirely just to ascribe their freedom from disaffection to force of discipline; because, although the force of discipline has great effect upon them, yet, from their scattered position, it is impossible that discipline can be so stringent and so effectual for this purpose as in the case of a military force. This fact enhances the merit of the constabulary, and enhances also what is exceedingly important—the confidence we may place in the force for the future. I may also remark that the force represents fairly the population of the country, being drawn from Roman Catholics and Protestants in much the same proportion which these bear to the general population. There is no special selection of the constabulary from any class of the population who may be supposed to be more loyal than the other; they are fair samples of the population of Ireland—except, of course, that great care is taken only to engage men of good character. I am exceedingly glad that I was, to some extent, the cause of the consideration by Her Majesty's late Government of a plan for raising the pay of the force. That rate of pay was fixed many years ago and was very insufficient; and the loss of men was so large, and the difficulty of recruiting so great, that we had considerable apprehension as to the efficiency of the force. The plan was prepared and assented to by the late Treasury, and was carried into effect by the present Government. I think the First Lord of the Treasury will confirm my statement that that plan has been found effectual to a very considerable extent; that the same difficulty has not been experienced in recruiting during the last few months; and that a very good class of men has been joining the constabulary. I should be the last person to advocate extravagance in any branch of Her Majesty's service; but I emphatically say that I do not believe there is any force at the disposal of Her Majesty, as this may be said to be, which deserves more liberal treatment than the constabulary of Ireland. I hope that every reasonable request of theirs will be fairly and generously considered, and that no opportunity will be lost of strengthening their loyalty and showing that their courage and trustworthiness are thoroughly appreciated by this country. This is a matter of great importance to all classes in the country; and I rejoice that the Government intend to bestow some special marks of honour on all the members of the force who have distinguished themselves.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: Perhaps I may be allowed to add a word on a subject of importance—the conduct of the troops during the outbreak. I am most desirous to state that their conduct, under most trying circumstances, has been most exemplary. The elements were much against them; they suffered much exposure to the worst weather; yet they marched long distances—I may say, not only without the slightest murmur, but with the greatest anxiety to perform their duty. I am persuaded that, whatever may be said to the contrary, if it came to the test, you would find among the troops no feeling except of the right sort, and that they would discharge their duty with the greatest gallantry.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

THE EARL OF DEVON moved the third reading of this Bill. On a former occasion some remarks were made by a noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) with reference to the authority under which persons of unsound mind were detained in work-houses. He had received a communication which conveyed an assurance that the best means of solving the question involved should be duly considered.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY expressed himself satisfied with the assurance, and added, to save himself from the appearance of discourtesy to the head of the Poor Law Board in delaying so long his Notice of Motion on the subject, that he had had an interview with the right hon. Gentleman, who, he supposed, had forgotten the suggestions that were made in the extreme pressure of business.

FLOGGING IN THE ARMY.—NOTICE.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I wish, Sir, to give Notice that in Committee on the Mutiny Bill, on Thursday next, I propose to move a new clause instead of the clause which now stands in the Mutiny Act, relating to corporal punishment. The clause which I propose to move will have two objects. The first will be to restrict the infliction of corporal punishment in times of peace to three offences—namely, mutiny, aggravated insubordination, and disgraceful conduct of an indecent character. The second object of the clause will be to provide upon the face of the Mutiny Act that which is now only arranged under the Queen's Regulations—namely, the division of soldiers into two classes; and I propose to enact that, under no circumstances, shall a soldier of the first-class be subject to corporal punishment. I will lay upon the table of the House to-night or to-morrow the clause which I mean to introduce.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS— REMOVAL OF MAGISTRATES— CERTAIN MEMBERS OF THIS HOUSE.

ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

Answer to Address [19th March] reported as follows:—

"I have received your Address, praying that I will give directions for the removal of all persons in the Commission of the Peace of any County, City, or Borough who have been found, either by Committees of the House of Commons or by Royal Commission, guilty of, or privy, or assenting to Corrupt Practices at Parliamentary Elections.

"Concurring with you in the propriety of discountenancing all such Corrupt Practices, I will take into my serious consideration how that object may best be accomplished."

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
BILL—SUFFRAGE TO WOMEN.

QUESTION.

MR. DENMAN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, having regard to the Act 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 4, which enacts, "That in all Acts words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed and taken to include females," it is intended by the use of the word "man," instead of the words "male person" in Clause 3 of the Bill to amend the Representation of the People, to confer the suffrage on women qualified according to the requirements of that Clause?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It appears to me, Sir, that this is a Question which the hon. and learned Gentleman might have reserved for the Committee on the Bill, when the opinion of Gentlemen of the long robe might be taken with respect to it. I am scarcely competent to offer one; but I have considered this subject, and it appears to me that if he had studied it more attentively he would have found it unnecessary to put his Question. It is laid down in the Act to which he refers that in all Acts the words importing the masculine gender shall be taken to include females unless the contrary is provided. But that is, I believe, provided in this instance.

ARMY—COLOUR SERJEANT T. CONNELL.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the Paymaster General, By what legal authority the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital suspended the pension of Colour Sergeant T. Connell, late of the 78th Highlanders, to the amount of £9, for alleged insubordination as a clerk in the office of the Adjutant of a Militia Artillery Regiment, he having completed, with an unsullied character, his contract of twenty-one years' service with the State, and having thus acquired by right the enjoyment of his pension for the rest of his days?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, the circumstances under which Thomas Connell's pension was suspended were these:—He was sentenced by a regimental court martial on the 28th of June last year to reduction to the ranks, and ten days' imprisonment in Forfar Gaol "for conduct highly insubordinate, and to the prejudice of good order and military discipline." His commanding officer, Colonel Laird, reported on the 30th of the same month to the Secretary of State for War that, after his sentence had been read, "his conduct was scandalous in the extreme;" that he tried to excite the men to mutiny on parade, fought and struggled with the escort on the road to the station, and harangued the passengers in the train during the journey. Colonel Laird says—

"If he be allowed to go unpunished for these crimes in addition to that he was convicted of, it is impossible that I can maintain order and discipline in the regiment."

This report having been referred by the Secretary of State for War to the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital, they decided that the suspension of Connell's pension for three months was the lightest punishment they could inflict, after giving every consideration to his previous long service and good conduct. The legal authority under which the Commissioners acted in such matters was the Act 7 Geo. IV. c. 16, s. 13, which enacted—

"That it should be lawful for the Commissioners, and they are thereby authorized and empowered, upon complaint and proof to their satisfaction being made to them of any fraud . . . or of other misconduct attempted or practised by any person being a pensioner, to suspend or take away the pension."

This Act was confirmed by the Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 10. The last part of the question was somewhat ambiguous. By "right" the hon. and gallant Member meant legal right, he had shown that the law under which the pension was granted provided for their contingency of suspension and forfeiture. If the hon. and gallant Member meant that in his opinion the law ought not to contain such a provision, it was obvious that he had entered upon a field of argument far beyond the limits of a simple question and answer.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—WEST BROMWICH.

QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering that West Bromwich, if united to Wednesbury and Tipton as proposed, would form a Borough, the population of which would be 92,000, with 18,000 houses, he will take into his consideration the question of creating West Bromwich a separate Borough with one Member, instead of giving, as is proposed, an additional Member to the County?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, if the hon. Gentleman will refer to the Act for amending the Representation of the People, he will find that he is under an erroneous impression in supposing that we propose to give an additional Member to South Staffordshire. What we propose is to divide the county, and to give it two Members. It will therefore not be in our power to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member.

CASE OF THE "VICTORIA."

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House, the Correspondence between the British Government and that of Spain relative to the capture of the Victoria?

LORD STANLEY: I have, Sir, no objection to produce the Papers. They will be laid upon the table as soon as they can be prepared.

QUESTION.

MR. WARNER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can furnish the House with my estimate of the probable number of new £10 Borough Voters who would be added to the Constituencies by that part of his Reform Bill which provides for the re-distribution of Seats, irrespectively of the proposed alterations of the Franchise?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the population of the new Boroughs is 438,000, and the occupiers, estimated at the same ratio as in the case of England and Wales, would be—above £10, 32,000; and below £10, 36,000; making a total of 68,000.

IRELAND—SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, previous to the meeting of Parliament, any communications were made to or addressed by the Irish Government to the Lieutenants of Counties in Ireland, the Commissioners of Police in Dublin, the Inspector General of Constabulary, or the Justices and Resident Magistrates in Ireland, as to the expediency of a further continuance of the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act beyond the 26th February 1867, or of allowing it to expire on that day; and if any such communications were made, whether he will lay the original inquiries, and replies thereto, upon the table of the House?

LORD NAAS: In answer, Sir, to my hon. Friend, I have to say that the Irish Government are not in the habit of consulting the Lieutenants of Counties in Ireland, the Commissioners of Police in Dublin, the Inspector General of Constabulary, or the Justices and Resident Magistrates, before they come to a decision on a matter of such importance as the proposal to renew the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. I can only say that that recommendation was made on the responsibility of the Irish Government, and I am prepared to defend it. Of course, as no such communications were made, no replies were received.

MR. OSBORNE: Then, Sir, I beg leave to give notice that on an early day I will draw attention to the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and to the state of Ireland generally.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—THE WORKING CLASSES AND THE BOROUGH REGISTER.

QUESTION.

MR. LOWTHER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can form any estimate of what would be the probable percentage of the Working Classes upon the Borough Register if the proposed Reform Bill became Law?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: There are no data, Sir, on which to form an estimate of what the number of working classes purely on the register would be. No doubt those who would come under the provisions of the new Act would form portions of very various classes.

UNITED STATES—THE "ALABAMA" CLAIMS.—QUESTION.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the renewed Correspondence with the United States Government on the subject of the Alabama claims has been concluded; and, if so, whether he will lay the Papers upon the table of the House?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, the Correspondence with the United States Government on the subject of the Alabama claims—or, I should rather say, on the subject of the claims on both sides, arising out of the events of the late war—is not at present concluded. Under these circumstances, I think it would be better to defer the publication of the papers. I may, however, perhaps take this opportunity of contradicting a report which has gone the rounds of the newspapers to the effect that communications stated to be of a very unfriendly character had been received from the Government at Washington. There is no truth whatever in such a report.

DISTURBANCES IN IRELAND—CASE OF CONSTABLE DUGGAN.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has received any further information in reference to the shooting of Police Constable Duggan, and the alleged conduct of Priest Maginn and Bishop Moriarty in connection with it?

LORD NAAS, in reply, stated, that he adhered to the statement he made last Friday, that no formal inquiry was instituted into the circumstances of the case alluded to by the hon. Member. No doubt informations were taken in the usual way.

CASE OF MR. CHURCHWARD.

QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE: Now, Sir, that we have the gracious Reply of Her Majesty to the Address of the House, I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Lord Chancellor, since finding out the circumstances relative to Mr. Churchward, has rescinded his appointment as a Magistrate of Dover?

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, the Lord Chancellor is taking all these cases into consideration.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—PROGRESS.—QUESTION.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether there is any truth in the statements that have been lately published—that it is the intention of the Government, if the Representation of the People Bill be read a second time, that the Committee shall be postponed till after Easter; or, whether, pursuant to the impression he gave the House, as to sitting in Committee from day to day, he will move for the Bill going into Committee on the very first opportunity after the Second Reading?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am not aware of the existence of the reports referred to by the hon. Member. They may, perhaps, have emanated from some journal with which the hon. Member is more familiar than myself. [Mr. BRIGHT: The Morning Post.] There is no authority, however, for such a statement. The time has not yet come for considering the question as to when we shall go into Committee on a Bill which has not yet been read a second time. In due time I shall make a proper announcement as to the course which the Government will adopt.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM— REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—[BILL 79.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord Stanley.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hunt.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I think that if the question now put were not upon the second reading, but upon the third reading of the Bill which I hold in my hand, in the terms and to the effect with which it is framed, that it would be negatived by a majority, and, perhaps, even by a large majority, of the House. I think, further, that if we were now considering the question whether the House should resolve into

Committee on the Bill there would be many among us, possibly a majority—and I among the number—who would entertain the opinion that unless we entered the Committee, armed and assisted by some declarations, and even engagements from the Government different from those yet given to us, the task of considering the Bill would be a hopeless one; and such an attempt, instead of tending to save time, would be the most certain means of losing time and postponing a settlement of this question. But, Sir, the rules of the House, wisely framed as they are, give us two ordinary and usual opportunities of questioning the principle of any Bill proposed for our consideration; and what I would presume to suggest to the House is that we should endeavour to make use of this occasion of the vote and the discussion upon the second reading of the Bill in order to ascertain, with greater precision than we now do, what are the views of Her Majesty's Government, so that before we come to the question of your leaving the Chair, we may have fuller means of judgment upon the point to be then considered by us—namely, the important question whether we ought to undertake the task of dealing with this Bill in detail. I therefore Sir, for one, propose, if I assent to the second reading, to assent to it as a measure for extending and reducing the suffrage, for the re-distribution of seats, and for certain other purposes either in themselves desirable, or, at all events, entitled, when proposed by the Government, to be the Bill, and in particular the conditions of that liberal enfranchisement, should be so devised that the Bill may carry with it a fair and reasonable promise, if not of finality in the strictest sense of the term, yet of that kind of fixedness which is all that the nature of public legislation permits us in such a matter to expect or even to desire. Now, Sir, it appears to me that in order to realize the third of these conditions, two rules especially and far beyond all others must be observed. We must have no exclusions from the franchise that are arbitrary in their character, or that are otherwise than founded upon broad and intelligible grounds. So much as to exclusions from the franchise; but I add this second principle, that within the pale of the franchise we must have no distinctions drawn by legislation which are of either a vexatious or needless character; because these distinctions—at least so it appears to me—would go more directly than any other form of defect in a Reform Bill to destroy the hope of that fixedness which we all conscientiously desire.

Now, Sir, I desire to examine the provisions of the present Bill in the light of these propositions. Yet, before doing so, I cannot help uttering a word of regret for the loss of a production that nobody else has as yet audibly regretted—I mean the £8 Rating Bill. I know not, indeed, whether I must speak of it as a Bill, or whether I must only speak of it as a measure sketched in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but this I must say—repeating what I have ventured to state before—that that Bill did afford, in my opinion, a basis upon which a settlement might have proceeded. There were points on which I conceive that those who sit on this side of the House, and possibly on the other side, would have been at issue with the Government; but the issues were of a simple, straightforward, intelligible character; and I am persuaded that if the Government had refused to make reasonable changes, or if we on this side had demanded unreasonable changes, the public mind, perfectly possessed of the question, would have been directed to the merits of the controversy, and would by moral force have compelled either one side or other, or both, to arrive at an agreement on the basis of the provisions of that measure. I therefore regret its brief-lived existence—

It is gone and cannot be revived. We must make the best of the measure before us; and I wish to-night to inquire how that best can be made.

Sir, it appears to me nothing can be more discouraging than the prospect, when we survey the main heads connected with the settlement of the question. Sketching them lightly, and not attempting artificially to multiply those difficulties, I find they amount to these ten:—A Bill on this subject must, I think, to be satisfactory, contain a lodger franchise; but this Bill contains no lodger franchise. It seems to me that a Bill of this kind, professing largely to enfranchise downwards, must provide some means of preventing the traffic in votes that would infallibly arise in a large scheme affecting the lowest class of householders. This Bill contains no such provisions. It seems to me we must do away with the vexatious distinctions that now exist between compound-householders in a condition of life and society that are recognised by law as fitting them for the franchise, and those persons of the very same condition not being compound-householders. This Bill does not do away with these distinctions; on the contrary, it introduces new ones. I think that the taxing franchise must be omitted. I think that the dual vote must be abandoned. I apprehend there is no doubt that the re-distribution of seats proposed by this Bill must be considerably enlarged. I also venture to take it for granted that the county franchise proposed by the Bill must be reduced. I doubt whether the feeling of the majority of the House will allow the Government to entertain the important provision for the optional use of voting-papers. And finally, with respect to the collateral or bye-franchises or special franchises—that, perhaps, is the best term for them—my opinion, I confess, is that, although on principle no objection can be made to those franchises, or some of them, yet, when we come to examine we shall find, as we obtain acquaintance with the conditions of each proposal, that the advantages continually dwindle, that the obstacles and difficulties continually multiply, and that there will remain finally either a thin and sterile residuum, or else they will altogether disappear. These are the ten main heads to which I referred. But in the discussion I shall confine myself to the subject of the borough franchise, and for this reason:—It is a subject which appears to me to be involved in the greatest—nay, I will say, by the provisions of the Bill as they now stand in hopeless intricacy and difficulty; and it must depend on the assurance which may be given us by the Government with respect to the borough franchise in the course of this debate whether, when we come to the question of your leaving the Chair, there will be any prospect of really gaining ground by going into Committee on the Bill.

Now, if I look at the 3rd clause of this Bill—the great enfranchising clause—I find that it presents to me these prominent features. In the first place, it appears to convey an impression that we are now going to abandon all attempts to distinguish between class and class—to recognise the universal fitness of all classes of the community; and I must confess it appears to me, with great submission, if we do recognise that universal fitness it is not so very important—as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks it is—whether we recognise it under the name of "popular privileges" or "democratic rights." The clause begins with a statement, as if to give the public the impression that we were going to confer what is called "household suffrage." Now, without attempting to commit any man in the House, and certainly without having any exaggerated apprehension of the evil consequences that might result even from an error that we might commit in this direction—because I believe the good sense of the country and the strength of its institutions and traditions would effectually qualify and restrain the evil consequence of such an error—I must say, it does not appear to me that we are required either by the state of the population, by the wishes of the country at large, by the opinion of this House, by previous pledges, or by any single consideration that can be brought to bear on the question to assent to that very broad principle. Treating that assent as an assent that is needless, and as one that might produce in several particulars inconvenient consequences, the fact that I do not apprehend ruin and destruction from it is no reason at all for my adopting the proposal, if I thought that a better proposal could be devised. Therefore, for the present, I merely demur to that proposal—not as being one under all circumstances undesirable, but as being at the present moment needless, and therefore unwise. But when I go on further in the clause, I find that this immense concession is so qualified by restraints that they absolutely stultify the concession itself. The House is asked to enfranchise, by adopting this proposal, 750,000 people, in order immediately afterwards to introduce a condition which cuts off two-thirds, or as I think I can show more, of that number. But this disqualification is itself qualified; because in this barrier of personal rating which is set up by the clause, and which prima facie shuts out this 500,000, is introduced a little wicket through which, by a process which we will presently examine, it will be in the power of individuals to introduce themselves into the franchise. I think I shall be able to show that that portion of the clause which introduces this restraint is thereby rendered almost entirely nugatory. In this case you have household suffrage to deal with. It may be entirely nullified by the restraint, or it may be that the restraint itself is nugatory, and that the 500,000 persons apparently shut out will be brought into the qualification. But that which will be also easily shown is this, that if this Bill were to become law, it would depend upon the accidental political leanings of local authorities, or upon the exertions of registration agents, to determine whether we were or were not to be landed on the broad principle of household suffrage, or were to be restricted to the narrow ground by which only one-third of the householders below £10 are to be enfranchised.

Now, Sir, whether we are to take household suffrage as our broad basis, or our basis is to be narrowed to that adopted by Her Majesty's Government, let us, at least, take one basis or the other; let us keep in our hands the power of determining what shall be the limits of the constituencies, and do not let us hand that power over to local authorities, or to the registering agents of the several political boroughs of the country. When I examine more at large the operation of this Bill, I find that it arranges the borough constituencies in what I venture to term a hierarchy of five classes. At the head of the list stand those favoured children of fortune—those select human beings made of a finer clay than the rest of their fellow-subjects—who are to be endowed with dual votes. Upon that dual vote I shall not trouble the House, for I think that my doing so would be a waste of time. Next to these dual voters, before whose eyes this glittering falsity has dangled—although I am afraid they can have but little hope of grasping it—come the old £10 householders of 1832. The position of the latter is nominally entirely unchanged by the Bill. But while nominally unchanged, their position is really changed most materially; because a considerable number, stated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite to be 750,000 at the most, or 250,000 at the least. At any rate, a very considerable number of what I may call minor voters is to be introduced by this Bill into the franchise. Thus the privileges of the old £10 householders will be seriously attacked from below; while, on the other hand, from above they will be swamped by the admission of some 300,000 dual voters. Therefore, the position of the old £10 householder of 1832, although nominally untouched by the Bill, will be considerably affected by its provisions. The third class to which I will refer is that which includes the £9 householders, by which I mean all persons inhabiting a house under the £10 rental who are to be admitted to the franchise. The difference between the £9 and the £10 householder is that two years' residence is required from the former and only one year's residence from the latter; that the former is qualified only in respect of the dwelling-house, while the latter is qualified in respect of the dwelling-house, warehouse, shop, or other building; and finally, that the former must live in an entire house, and cannot qualify in respect of part of a house, as is the case of the £10 householders. But this is not one of the most important portions of the subject. The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to sustain his proposal by saying—if I understood him rightly—that this proposal was contained in the Bill of 1854. But the right hon. Gentleman is inaccurate in his reference to Lord Aberdeen's Bill. If he will have the kindness to examine that Bill, he will find that it was prepared with the idea that a very simple measure of dealing with the Parliamentary franchise would be sufficient—namely, to cut off what I may call the upper slice of the municipal constituency, and to endow those forming it with a vote, the object being to avoid as far as possible the creation of new conditions in the constituencies. For that reason the Bill of 1854 required a residence of two years and eight months. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: It only required a residence of two years.] Is that so? Well, it is not a very important point. At any rate, further experience showed that this provision in Lord Aberdeen's Bill was very defective and unwise, and therefore it was omitted from the Bills of 1860 and 1866. I merely urge that point against the Bill without endeavouring to attach to it any capital importance. But what is of far more importance is the point to which I now come—namely, the distinction that is drawn between the compound-householders who do not pay their own rates and the ratepaying-householders. The former fall into two classes. First of all, there are the compound-householders who already exist, and who inhabit houses of the value of £10 per annum and upwards. With regard to them it is perfectly true that their position is not made worse by the Bill than it is under the existing law. The right hon. Gentleman, indeed, told me the other day that the compound-householder if he could get it was to have the dual vote. That statement of the right hon. Gentleman appears to me to be inconsistent with the 7th clause of the Bill; because it there appears that the dual vote is to be limited to those who are registered as voters for the borough in respect of any franchise involving the occupation of premises and the payment of rates. Now, the present legal position of the compound-householder does not at all involve the payment of rates, and consequently he cannot in any event become entitled to the dual vote.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The right hon. Gentleman must have entirely misapprehended me. What I said was, that if the compound-householder, having already one vote under another franchise, qualified himself for the dual franchise by paying his rates he would enjoy the second vote.

MR. GLADSTONE: I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether the compound-householder would have the dual vote? He replied that the compound-householder would have the second vote if he qualified himself by paying his rates—that is to say, if he ceased to be a compound-householder.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If he pays his rates, he will have the second vote.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, but there are no rates for him to pay. There is no provision in the Bill which enables him to pay his own rates.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, there is.

MR. GLADSTONE: He is to be allowed to pay his own rates in the extremely rare cases where his landlord has neglected to pay them and they are in arrear. I regard this dual vote as a mere phantom; but at any rate, I say the compound-householder is excluded from it. It is said that the compound-householder is left in his present position by the Bill. But the present position of the compound-householder is one of the greatest blots on the existing system, and is one of the strongest reasons for Reform. I venture to say that it will be totally impossible to pass any Reform Bill which does not improve the position of the compound-householder. Therefore, in leaving the position of the compound-householder unimproved, the right hon. Gentleman has been Conservative on a point in which it was desirable that some innovation or improvement should be introduced; because, as the matter stands under the present Bill, the compound-householder is kept in a position of inferiority, and whether he is or is not to have a vote depends on the sympathies of the parochial officers or on the well-paid vigilance of the registering agents. But the right hon. Gentleman might say with truth that the compound-householders occupying houses over £10 in annual value, if enfranchised, would form but a small proportion of the ratepaying-householders of this country; and here I am at the threshold of a portion of the case to which I am most anxious to draw the attention of the House. The fifth class of voters who are supposed to be enfranchised by this Bill are, indeed, in a deplorable condition. There are 500,000 of them, and they were told by the right hon. Gentleman in his speech of last Monday that, perhaps, they were just as good men as those who were above them, and that he would give them every facility for obtaining the franchise.

I will now examine the Bill, and see how these promises of the right hon. Gentleman are fulfilled. What is his idea of giving the compound-householder every facility for obtaining the franchise? What are these compound-householders? They are persons who, under the authority of Parliament, pay rates only in the form of rent; they are persons whom we have allowed to be excluded, and who, by the joint action of local authorities and the assessors, are excluded from the actual and ordinary payment of rates; without their own consent, and without, indeed, their hearing anything about the matter. I do not at all mean to say that any injury is inflicted upon them by this course; it is even probable that they greatly benefit by the fact, but still they are excluded. Under these circumstances we promise them the franchise, and we say we will give them every facility, and how do we begin? Why, in the first place, we impose upon them every restraint borne by the present compound-householders; and I have already pointed out in general terms—I have not been able to count up the units, and therefore I do not pretend to give them with exactitude—but I have already pointed out what I believe to be perfectly undeniable, that so far as regards the personal action of the voter the present restraints upon compound-householders are an effectual bar. I call that an effectual bar which excludes 99 or 98 per cent; for I do not believe it is less than 98 of all persons it operates on. So the right hon. Gentleman, in his desire to give the compound-householder every facility for obtaining the franchise, begins with this restraint, but he does not stop there. In this memorable clause—the 34th clause—he introduces this proviso—

“Provided the rates to be paid by such occupier in order to entitle him to the franchise, shall be rates calculated on the full rateable value of the premises.”

I believe I may fairly take that clause as referring only to the new compound-householders below £10.

Now, Sir, I do not wish to take any polemical advantage. I speak the strict and literal truth, and I will proceed to vindicate it, when I say that by that clause you fine the new compound-householder below £10 if he attempts to obtain the franchise. I do not ask you to accept that proposition without further examination and proof, for it is a grave one, and it goes to the very root of the Bill. It affects 500,000 out of the 700,000 who, according to the right hon. Gentleman, are to be enfranchised. The House will observe, after setting aside the extremely rare cases—cases, indeed, never heard of, I believe—when the landlord's rate is in arrear, that the compound-householder of £10 and upwards is to be amerced in point of time and trouble only in endeavouring to obtain his enfranchisement; because the construction of the law is, that if the 75 per cent, or the composition, whatever it is, has been paid by the landlord the rate has then been paid in full, and consequently there remains nothing for the compound-householder to pay. But when we come to the new compound-householder below £10, he has to pay his rates in full. Let us see what is the meaning of that phrase. I have received information which I have not had time to test, but which appears to be given in a form so distinct that it can easily be tested, and it certainly is of great importance. The case of Dodd, in the parish of Bilston, was heard in the Queen's Bench on the 8th of November, 1865, and the report is to be found in 13 Law Times, 589. The parish officer had taken in the case of compound-householders fifty-two times the weekly rent as a basis or first quantity for estimating, under the Parochial Assessment Act, the gross estimated rental free and clear from rates and taxes. The question was—to make this quantity free from rates, must you deduct the full or only the compound rate? The Court held that you must deduct the full rate. The Court held that the full rate had already been paid. The Court then held that the compound-householder had already paid the full rate. We shall not, I suppose, be told—indeed, we cannot be told—that the owners of compound houses obtain higher rents than the owners of non-compound houses, but that they are satisfied with a less profit. Therefore, according to the dictum of the Court, the compound-householder had already paid his rate, and that which he has already paid once you call upon him to pay over again before he is entitled to the franchise. [“No, no!”] Wait a moment; I have not done yet. I should have been more strictly accurate if I had said a part of what he has already paid, you call upon him to pay over again before he can be enfranchised. And what is that part? Perhaps you think it amounts to 25 per cent. Well, Sir, even if it were 25 per cent it is an extremely hard case—hard in principle and hard in practice—that he should have to pay over again one-quarter of what he has paid already in order to get the franchise. But what is the real case with regard to a large portion of the compositions of the country? It is stated that the deduction made to the landlord amounts in many cases not to 25 but to 50 per cent, and the deduction of 50 per cent is made upon the principle that the composition money is intended to cover full and empty houses alike. So that when the compound-householder comes before the parochial officer or the revising barister to make his claim, he has to pay 50 per cent more, 50 per cent having been already paid. He has to pay the full rate, according to the decision of the Court, over again; and consequently he has to pay not only for his own house, but also for the house inhabited, or which may be inhabited, by his neighbour, and in which he possesses no interest whatever. ["No, no!"] That is the strict and literal truth. ["No, no!"] What part of it is not true? There can be no doubt these compositions in many cases amount to 50 per cent; nor can there be any doubt that the rate is calculated so as to include full and empty houses alike. Is there, then, any doubt that the compound-householder would be called upon to pay the full rateable value of the premises, which would be exactly twice that which had been paid? There can be no doubt whatever; and consequently in every one of those cases, which would be numbered by tens, and twenties, and fifties of thousands throughout the country, the compound-householder would have to make double his accustomed payment. ["No, no!"] Perhaps the hon. Gentleman who disputes this statement will explain in what respect it is untrue?

MR. GREENE said, he had no objection to explain, if he was allowed to do so. It was evident that in making the composition the proprietor of cottages, having to pay rates on empty and full houses alike, took this fact into consideration, and in the shape of actual rent charged his tenant more than he would otherwise have done if the occupier paid the rates himself.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN said, he rose to order.

MR. GLADSTONE: The proposition is one of extreme importance, and I thought the hon. Gentleman who called "No, no!" would point out to me some error which I had committed. I will not, however, dwell any longer upon this point. I am content if my statement is intelligible to the House. What I say is, that in cases where the composition is 50 per cent it is calculated on empty and full houses alike, and that the householder in attempting to obtain the franchise will be fined to the extent of 50 per cent for so doing. And before leaving this point

I wish it to be understood that I do not mean to say that in all cases this composition amounts to 50 per cent, although it does amount to that percentage in a great many cases. In many cases it is 25 per cent, in some 33, in general it varies between 25 and 50. In 50, I say, it amounts to the doubling of the rate, in 25 to less, but the principle of fine is the same—a man is in every case, according to the judgment of the law, called upon to pay over again that which he has paid already. In answer to an inquiry from me the other evening, the right hon. Gentleman said that he could not deal with exceptional cases. But what, then, is the rule, and what is the exception? The exceptional cases are twice as many as the cases under the rule according to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman himself. By his statement there are between 400,000 and 500,000 of these compound-householders below £10, and between 200,000 and 300,000 of those above £10; and now he tells me he provides for the rule—that is to say, for the 300,000—and he cannot provide for the exception, the 500,000, or about double the number.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I never said any such thing.

MR. GLADSTONE: He said, I think, he would not undertake to provide for exceptional cases.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have no recollection of having said so.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman says that he does not remember having made such a statement; but I listened to him very attentively, and I must say that I think his memory deceives him. Whether he said so or not, however, the fact still remains that the compound-householders below £10 upon whom this restraint and this fine are placed, are two-thirds of the whole body, while it is only the one-third above £10 to whom he shows the slightest indulgence. The Government, I think, has been led into a great error in dealing with compound-householders. They know very well that compound-householders living in houses above £10 rent are, with certain exceptions, at present excluded from the franchise, and I think the Government must have felt it would be safe to deal with compound-householders who pay less than £10 rent in a somewhat similar manner; but permit me to say that proportions ought to be taken into account.

I have already shown that the Government desire to introduce the element of pecuniary amercement to stop the way of householders below £10.

Now, let us look at the question of proportion. At present, in constituencies where compounders of £10 or £20 rental are to be found, discontent at their position with reference to the franchise largely prevails. It is a festering sore, though it is true the country is not actually disturbed by their discontent, because such constituencies are few in number and the compounders form a very small proportion of the electors. At present, perhaps, not more than 50,000 compounders are excluded, and they are distributed over a very small number of boroughs; thus the proportion of compound-householders now excluded is very small compared with the body of electors, whereas the proportion of compound-householders below £10 is very great. I ask, then, whether you can say to the 750,000 compound-householders who pay less than £10 rent, "We will arbitrarily take one in every three of you, and arbitrarily exclude two in every three of you," and whether you can then be under the delusion that you are settling the question of Parliamentary Reform? What I contend upon this subject is, that not the payment of rates, but the condition of a man in life, his presumable character, his presumable amount of education, and his presumable amount of independence, are the criteria which you should employ in order to ascertain who should have the franchise.

And now, Sir, I may venture to explain more clearly than I did upon a former evening a suggestion which I ventured to throw out, and respecting which I am very desirous not to be misunderstood, as I fear I then was by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley). I think the Government has committed a fundamental error—even assuming the test of personal rating to be the true test—in adopting our present system of law in relation to personal rating for the basis of their measure. Our rating laws are infinitely various in different districts, and the results would be contradictory in the extreme. They were never intended to be placed in contact with the question of political franchises. In the case of local Acts they represent nothing but the will and view of the local community, and in cases where the Small Tenement Act is in force—and it is in force in the large majority of instances—it can be brought into a parish or turned out by the simple will of the parishioners. I do not wish to use strong expressions; but I say it is impossible to find anything more unfitted than personal payment of rates for the basis and limiting boundary of a Parliamentary franchise when you say, and say justly, that the limiting boundary ought to be a firm and solid one—such a one as you hope will endure. It seems to me that if you employ the condition of personal rating—and I do not deny that its employment would give great satisfaction to many, and be very useful—you must employ it quite apart from this power of voluntary legislation. If you permit this voluntary legislation to exist I defy you to calculate the effect of your franchise, or build it on anything approaching a sure basis. If I use the term "defy" it is merely to express how positive I am of the conclusions I have arrived at. I have stated to many persons during the past ten days that the personal rating clauses, as announced by the Government, cannot stand. You may go into Committee upon them, but it is impossible to accept them. This you may do, however. Leaving the rating Acts to operate precisely as they stand, you might fix a certain figure of rateable value, not touching personal rates at all, but leaving them as they stand. You might adopt a figure of rateable value, and by an enactment uniform and running through the whole country, say that below that figure no occupier shall be liable to the payment of rates; that below that figure no man shall enjoy the franchise, but that above that figure every man shall enjoy it. I am very desirous of being understood by the right hon. Gentleman, because if I am not I fear I shall have little chance of being understood by any other hon. Member.

MR. HENLEY: Does your proposition include payment of rates, as well as being rated?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have spoken with regard to the question of personal rating; the question of payment of rates I take to be quite a separate question, and not of the same degree of importance; I am not quite sure what importance to attach to the question of payment of rates with regard to a compound-householder, of, say, £15 value. If the right hon. Gentleman asks me whether the compounder should be subject to the payment of rates, I say, No, certainly not. If he asks me whether the ratepaying-householder should be subject to the payment of rates as he is now, I say that is not of primary importance. I was a party to the proposal to abolish the ratepaying clauses, not considering it of primary importance. The suggestion I have made, however, is of the very greatest importance. If it were adopted we should be really erecting personal rating into something that might be called a principle. But if I made personal rating a principle I must say that I would not, to gain popularity, appear to promise the franchise, and then, by regulations proceeding from my mere will and pleasure, put obstacles in the way of the newly enfranchised to such an extent as by insuperable barriers to prevent its attainment. If a man be fit to have the franchise, give it him so that he can use it in the easiest and simplest manner. If he be not fit to have the franchise do not pretend to give it to him absolutely, while you secretly hope he will be unable to use it from the restrictions with which it is encumbered. If you undertake the obligation fulfil it. If all are not to be enfranchised, the proper division of the population into electors and non-electors is between class and class. Some classes have more independence; others, unhappily, have less. Some classes have more education; others, unhappily, have less. Some of us may live to see the day when want of education will no longer be a reproach to any class in this country, or a legitimate bar to the enjoyment of the franchise. But in the present state of society, while some are dependent and some ignorant, it is right to make some distinction; and not invest all with the title to the political franchise. But let us be upright in our dealings; let us understand the lines we draw; and let us especially renounce large nominal franchises, which by our regulations and restrictions we so encumber that we actually take back again.

It has been said in this House, and out of it, that the £6 or £8 compounder cannot be a very good elector unless he is willing to pay a few shillings for the franchise. But, in the first place, I am afraid he would have to pay those few shillings every year. In the second place, in the case of electors whose payment would be 50 per cent of the rate, the shillings would not be so very few. In the third place, we must not forget what happened at the time of the Reform Act.

The Reform Act, which dealt with none who paid less than £10 in boroughs and £50 in counties, exacted a payment of a shilling from enfranchised persons before they could be placed on the register. The country morally rose in arms against that payment, and you were obliged to repeal the clause enacting it within a short time after passing the Act. Yet you now propose to require a far heavier payment from householders who pay less even than £10 rent. And your argument in support of the proposition is, that if they will not pay this fee they cannot be very anxious to have the franchise. I think I can see the idea of the Government, and if it were not confuted by facts, I should be far from saying it is a very bad idea. They want legislative difficulties to perform an office something like what Mr. Darwin calls "natural selection." The finest specimen of the British citizen in the humbler orders of society is to be admitted, and he is to be tested by difficulty. We have heard from our school-days upwards that difficulty is the nurse of excellence. The struggles to overcome difficulties form the most interesting biographies, and it is thought we can apply this test to the community, and say to those 500,000 householders below £10, who have unfortunately been compelled to compound for their rates, "The good are to be selected from among you by ascertaining who can overcome the difficulties with which we have surrounded you. If you are inclined to give up the state of the law, and willing to go before the parish collector or overseer, and you are content to pay to the extent of 25 or 50 per cent of your two years' back rates, then you will have proved yourself the select of the lower orders, fit for the franchise, and a testimony to the excellence of the system of selection by difficulties." I am myself inclined to say that such a man is worthy of the franchise, and worthy of a great deal more than the franchise. But that, Sir, is not the stuff of which human nature at large is made. It is too severe to require the spirit of a hero and a martyr from a man earning 4s. or 5s. a day as the condition of his obtaining the privileges of the suffrage. It is too much to ask of him. But is that the practical operation of the present law? No; you do not effect this natural selection or anything of the kind. But what you do is this—You allow your parish officers to take up the matter by hundreds and thousands. You allow the registration agents to come down and pay the fine to which I have adverted. I know that the Government, with a commendable intention, have said that the payment of rates for a man shall be bribery. Why, Sir, a more well intended, but at the same time more nugatory, provision than that was never introduced into an Act of Parliament. How are you to establish a corrupt intention in respect to the payment of a man's rates? You find it difficult enough now, when a man gives his vote for a bribe, to establish a corrupt intention, and even when it is established you very rarely get the penalty enforced. But to imagine that you can put a stop to a practice of this kind by calling it bribery to pay a man's rates to enable him to vote, why, you might just as well think of putting a stop to petty larceny by enacting capital punishment against it. The thing is totally impossible. Let me give the House an illustration of how the law works at present, and the House will judge how it will work when this pecuniary fine is superadded. It is the case of the parish of All Saints, Poplar, in the borough of the Tower Hamlets. It is given in the blue book of last year. In that parish there are 4,052 houses, for which the owners are rated, and it is estimated that one-fifth of them are occupied by women. Only twenty-three of the occupiers of these houses are on the register. I gave an allowance of 1 or 2 per cent as a maximum of the compound houses that got on the register; but the proportion of compound-householders who have got on the register in this case is about  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The vestry clerk of the parish states that the average annual number of claims to be put upon the register under Sir William Clay's Act has not, during the last ten years, exceeded twenty. Let us see what becomes of these claims. There was not a single claim in 1865; and when persons have claimed to be put on the register they have failed to appear before the Revising Barrister to support their claims. The vestry clerk adds—

"I am of opinion that if all the persons who are entitled (under Sir William Clay's Act) to be put upon the register were to make their claim and attend to establish it, the numbers on the register would be increased threefold—namely, from 1,450 to 4,350; but the usual reply I receive when I inform the claimants that they will have to attend the Revising Barrister's Court is, 'Oh! I am not going to lose my time to go there. If you can't put me on the register I shall not trouble myself any further.'"

That is the way in which the law works; and I have taken that body of 4,000 persons because it will afford, after all, a very fair average from which to judge. Those heroic persons whom we might, by an effort of imagination, conceive going through all the pains and labour and charge which I have described do not get upon the register at all. Sometimes a benevolent parish officer, sometimes an active registration agent, performs these functions for them. And therefore what we come to is this—that, as a general rule, these people will be excluded. In particular instances they will be admitted. But whether they are excluded, or whether they are admitted, they will be admitted or excluded wholesale, and not by the principle of selection which you have in view. Now, I want to know what is the answer to this case, derived from the facts, and from the facts of our experience as they stand. Sir, all this appears to me to be grave matter for the consideration of the House. The point which I am most anxious to bring to the minds of hon. Members is this—the utter hopelessness of any idea of settling and fixing this question by such a measure as the present. You may attain a settlement, you may attain a fixity, by drawing a line between class and class if it be reasonably drawn. But if you choose to say that you will reject all such bases of proceeding, and that you will make selections as arbitrary as if they were made by lot between members of the same class, is it not plain what will happen? The excluded, if they are strong enough, will never cease to agitate until they have broken down the artificial wall of separation, and can rush in en masse.

And now let us consider the light that is thrown upon this important question by the Returns printed on Saturday last; and I hope I shall not again have misapprehended the words of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer). About a fortnight or ten days ago I asked for this Return, and I have to thank two of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite for the diligence used in preparing and producing it. It is a most important Return—a Return which, unless I am much mistaken, contains facts and figures which may leave it open to Her Majesty's Government to choose some other method for proceeding on the basis of personal rating, but which renders this class of their proposals totally and absolutely hopeless. The knowledge of what is contained in this Return was not on last Friday week in possession of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when I asked him, said he thought it could be given; but that his right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) doubted if it could be so given.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I said I would inquire of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) whether they could be given. I thought they might be given in the aggregate.

MR. GLADSTONE: I knew the aggregates could be given, and that they were in the right hon. Gentleman's possession; but that was not what I wanted. "Dolus latet in generalibus." I may say "dolus latet in 'totalibus.'" Error lurks in totals, and it is upon the exhibition of the minute particulars and practical working of this plan that I venture—I may be bold, I may be rash in saying so—to think that it cannot become law or receive the sanction of this House. I go, then, to particulars; and those particulars which, in my judgment, are so decisive of the case, were not in the possession of Her Majesty's Government on Friday week, when I put my Question to the right hon. Gentleman. Now, from this Return, in the first place, that appears which might have been made out by hon. Members for themselves with considerable difficulty from previous Returns—namely, that as regards London, with its 3,000,000 of people—London containing one-third of the entire borough population of the country—this Bill is a nullity. I do not count the enfranchisement of a few tens or even of a few hundreds among the 3,000,000 of this metropolis as worthy of notice. I will not enter into the details of the case as respects the metropolitan constituencies. That I shall leave to others who may follow me. But as regards London, I repeat, this Bill is practically a nullity, and that for two reasons. If you wish to enfranchise people living in London, first of all it may be asked, is there good ground for doing it? It is sometimes said by those who see that the metropolitan constituencies now count their voters by many thousands, that after all there is no great object in increasing such constituencies. But that is not quite a correct way of looking at the subject. The people who inhabit this metropolis are certainly not inferior in intelligence to the average of the rest of the country. London contains the flower of the working men of England, for when a good workman in the provinces wishes to rise in his calling, where does he go? To London. And here, where all these persons are associated and collected together, you have at this moment, I believe, not a larger, but a smaller, proportion of the aggregate population enfranchised than you have on an average of the boroughs in the rest of the kingdom. But if you do not intend to pass over all these 3,000,000 of inhabitants of this metropolis, how are you to proceed? There are two great barriers which prevent the enfranchisement of the population of London. The one is the state of the law as regards lodgers; the other is the state of the law as regards compound-householders. But these barriers you intend to leave without the smallest attempt at removal. This Bill entirely passes over the metropolis with its 3,000,000 out of the whole 9,000,000 of our borough population. I ask seriously any hon. Gentleman in this House, be his party what it may—any hon. Gentleman who coincides in that view which I ventured to describe at the outset of my remarks as the general opinion—namely, that there ought to be a settlement of this question by a liberal enfranchisement—I ask, is it possible to have a settlement by a liberal enfranchisement if you begin by practically excluding from the scope of your proposed enfranchisement the whole of this metropolis?

Now, after having commended this Return of Saturday last, I am going to impeach it, and to warn hon. Members that it represents the figures of the case in a manner much too favourable to the proposals of the Government. By too favourable, I mean that it greatly overstates the numbers to be enfranchised—not from any fault of the Government, or from the fault of any officer of the Government, but from this fact, that I believe there is a class of cases, more than one class, and they are very important classes of cases, where the rates of the occupiers are paid by the owners, but which do not appear in the Return.

I am exceedingly obliged to the House for its patience, and I will not trespass upon it by again going over the wearisome subject of the compound-householders. I have done with them. But I wish to point out that there is a very important supplement to that very loose body of compound-householders, of which no notice has been taken in these debates. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Monday last said that there are 237,000 householders under £10 who are rated and who pay their own rates, and who would at once be qualified under this Bill. Prima facie from this paper it is so; but I can show you that in some important respects that is not accurate. It was my business last year to pay some attention to this matter; and I confess I wish it had been the business of the Government to do the same. We are in this position. We are now making a piece of political furniture which we want to be steady and firm, and we have to adapt it to a great number of local inequalities, which inequalities, I believe, there is not a man in the House thoroughly aware of. Take the case of Liverpool. If you look to No. 2 of those Returns issued on Saturday, you will find that Liverpool figures for a very respectable amount of the number of constituents. There are 16,347 persons who are represented by this Return as being within the beneficent scope of the enfranchising provisions of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. But what is the fact? That in Liverpool there are scarcely any such persons. I will not say there are not a mere handful, but I will say that this 16,347 is a figure totally and absolutely delusive. The Members for Liverpool are here. My hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire is here. He knows the facts as well as any man living, and he will be able to correct me if I am wrong. The practice in Liverpool is this. With regard to houses under £15 rental the rates are habitually paid by the owners—I speak of the parish of Liverpool—not by direct provision of law, but by arrangement between the owners and the parish authorities. There is not one of the occupiers of those houses who would not be in the position of a compound-householder, and therefore prevented from getting the benefit of the proposed franchise; or they would be in a still worse position, because I very much doubt if any of them could legally acquire a vote even if they were willing to take all the steps and go through all the process provided for compound-householders. The case of Liverpool is the largest, but there are many others. There are many other towns in which a voluntary arrangement of that character exists, and in which the occupier would be ousted from the franchise. Will the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, abide by the declaration that 237,000 persons would be enfranchised by this portion of the Bill?

Now I want to call attention to another class. I wrote to one of the rural parishes to know what is the practice there; because I suspected that in those parishes the Bill would be extremely likely to establish something very near universal suffrage in the most inexpedient form that could be suggested. The answer was to this effect—and really I am rather surprised that I should not myself have known what it would be in consequence of the arrangements which exist throughout the country. The custom is that when a farm is let the cottages on the farm are also let to the farmer, and there is but one rating for farm land, farm house, and farm cottages. Now, the persons who live in these cottages are among the male occupiers included in the numbers whom the right hon. Gentleman promises to enfranchise. They are not even compound-householders. In their case there is no composition at all. That implies previous rating; but here there is no previous rating of the small houses. They are thrown in a lump with the farm and farmhouse into one rating. It is clear that all this class of occupiers must be deducted from the estimate of the right hon. Gentleman. I beg to assure the House, and I think I am as conversant as most men with these figures, that by this household suffrage scheme, you would enfranchise only about 100,000 or 120,000 persons. It was the veriest mouthful beyond what was offered by that £6 Franchise Bill which nobody seems to have any sympathy with, or care a farthing about, except myself. The distinction you seek to draw between composition ratepayers below £10 and ratepaying occupiers cannot be maintained; and if you want to bring in all personal ratepayers it must be by some other method. Passing to another point, I wish to point out to the House how astonishingly, I might say how ludicrously, the Bill would operate. There are fifty-seven towns put down as under the operation of the Small Tenements Act, and I want to show what its operation would be in those fifty-seven towns.

Now, remember, if we look for a settlement of this question it can only be on the basis of a liberal franchise. An extravagant franchise, flooding some towns with thousands and hundreds of thousands of voters, and only adding a few in other towns, will not settle it. If we want to do it we must have such an enfranchisement as will be felt to be liberal throughout the boroughs of the country generally—I do not say in every borough. This I think is a moderate proposition. I say, if you want a settlement of the Reform question, you cannot settle it by a measure which floods here and floods there while it dries up in other places. But this is how the Bill of the Government will act in towns under the Small Tenements Act. I will compare the number of ratepaying householders under £10 who will have the franchise with the number of non-ratepaying householders who will be excluded, unless some benevolent angel in the shape of an electioneering agent or a parish officer gives him a chance. In Abingdon, 35 would be qualified; 574 excluded. In Calne, 25 qualified; 695 excluded. In Carlisle, 406 qualified; 3,571 excluded. In Chippenham, 20 qualified; 727 excluded. In Christchurch, 41 qualified; 523 excluded. In Devizes, 55 qualified; 487 excluded. In Dudley, a large town, in which there are many men of mental as well as of commercial activity, 232 qualified; 6,315 excluded. In Evesham, 40 qualified; 464 excluded. In Gateshead, 173 qualified; 557 excluded. I need not go through the whole of the towns; but the total number qualified in all the Parliamentary boroughs in which the Small Tenements Act is in operation will be 25,064, while the number excluded will be 139,377. You see the effect is that where a few scores would be qualified, thousands would be disqualified. Now, that would be a state of things which could not continue to exist even if you were to make it law. I will not go further. I have taken the most remarkable instances from the earlier letters of the alphabet, and these show how the plan works, the result for all the towns in which the Small Tenements Act is in operation being that by a ludicrous operation the Bill qualifies 25,064, while it excludes 139,377. Will the question be settled in this way? Will it be settled by admitting a few scores to the franchise while the thousands are excluded? I now come to the towns in which the Small Tenements Act is in partial operation. There are 98 boroughs in which this is the case; and if we take the totals they are not so unreasonable. The number admitted will be 106,467, while the number excluded will be 249,472. But when we come to the particulars what do we find? That the 16,347 to whom I have already referred as being put down for Liverpool, but who, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire knows, have no real existence, form no small proportion of the entire number which are to be admitted in those boroughs. In Andover, the number admitted will be 40; the number excluded, 623. In Aylesbury, admitted, 446; excluded, 3,514. In Barnstaple, admitted, 151; excluded, 1,047. In Bridgewater, admitted, 56; excluded, 1,234. In Frome, 38 will be qualified, while 1,363 will be excluded. But let me call the attention of the House to the case of Kingston-upon-Hull. Under the provisions of this Bill the gross number of 64 will become qualified there; while the number excluded as being compound-householders will be 12,026. Is it possible that any one on the Treasury Bench can get up in his place and recommend these clauses relating to the compound-householders with all their anomalies? These clauses are postponed. Why, I know not. I presume there must be some strong argument for their being so postponed; but I now ask whether any Gentleman on the Treasury Bench will get up and recommend the adoption of such provisions as the settlement of this question.

And, Sir, here arises a point of the utmost importance which I have not yet touched, but which I believe is of itself a conclusive objection to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. I am certain he never can have taken the pains to inquire into the particulars on which his estimate is based. I have now been dealing with the 98 boroughs in which the Small Tenements Act is in operation, and the towns where it is in partial operation, or where there are local Acts of an analogous nature; and my objection to the Bill is that, owing to its ludicrously small effects in qualifying as compared with its operation in excluding, it cannot be called a settlement of the question. You cannot expect the people in 50 or 60 of these boroughs to admit that it is settled, seeing its inappreciable effect as regards them.

But I now come to the examination of another question. In Greenwich, which is one of those 98 boroughs, 3,497 would be admissible, while 2,069 would be excluded. In this case the numbers are in more equal proportion, and there is prima facie no case against the scheme. But now, as we have been looking into the anatomy of the country, town by town, let us look into the anatomy of each town; and, I ask, how are these numbers, in Greenwich, 3,500 in round numbers, distributed? Is it an equal distribution? Not at all. It is a distribution in parishes. It is a distribution divided by one side of the street from the other. On one side of a street, according to the plan of the Government, you are to have what is very nearly manhood suffrage; and on the other side of a street you are going to have an £8 rental franchise. I use that term because, speaking generally, the limit of the Small Tenements Act is as nearly as possible identical with an £8 franchise. Taking the whole country over, the operation of the Small Tenements Act, which is a £6 rating, is as nearly as possible identical in its effects with an £8 rental franchise; because that Act does not apply solely to tenements under £6, but likewise includes tenements which are rated at the figure of £6. In every one, therefore, of these 98 towns, half the boroughs in the country, there will be a considerable number enfranchised and a considerable number not enfranchised. You must not for a moment suppose that that shows the fair and equal operation of the Act in those towns. On the contrary, it is in those towns that the operation of the Bill will be most unequal, and that the inequality will be almost intolerable. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), is about to follow me, I ask him this distinct question—whether he believes that you can divide 98 towns in this country parish by parish, and in one set of parishes establish household suffrage, coming near to manhood suffrage, and in the other set of parishes, in the very same towns, establish an £8 rental suffrage, and can have that accepted by the country as a settlement of the question?

Sir, I am sorry to say I have not quite done yet, for I must still look at the towns which have local Acts. The list is a very short one, but it is not unimportant, for those towns contain 329,000 male occupiers, or very nearly one-fourth of the whole, and how does the case stand with respect to these towns? In Bewdley you will enfranchise six persons as ratepaying householders, and you will exclude 1,080. In Birmingham the number you will enfranchise will be 2,300; the number you will exclude will be 36,177. In Brighton you will exclude 2,553, and you will en-franchise 14. Is that a settlement of the question of Reform? In Kidderminster you will exclude 2,343; you will enfranchise 24. I really do not know how to argue upon such figures. If they do not of themselves carry conviction with them when they are stated, it is totally impossible to dwell upon them with the view of showing how impossible it is to entertain proposals of a nature so extraordinary. I am bound to give Her Majesty's Government credit for having been in ignorance of these facts at the time when they adopted their plan, because it is really otherwise impossible that such proposals could have been submitted to the House. What appears as a whole, taking the towns with local Acts, is, that under this Bill for granting household suffrage the number of persons who are ratepayers, and who prima facie would be entitled to the suffrage, is 10,638, while those who are excluded as non-ratepayers is 87,744, and the expectation is that those 87,744 will sit contentedly down, and accept as a settlement of the question a measure which admits only the handful who happen to be ratepayers.

Then comes the case of the open towns, where there is no restriction whatever in the shape of compounding Acts. These ought, by rights, to be the most virtuous towns, for these are the towns in which the maxim that "England expects every man to do his duty" is literally acted upon. Now, if we look at these towns the result is very different indeed. I will show the House that, in a vast number of towns, of all the persons renting houses of under £10 clear annual value, not one-fifth, not one-tenth, and, in many cases, not one-twentieth, will be admitted to the suffrage as ratepaying householders. Take Oldham. I find that the present number qualified is 3,300, and you will add 11,800. In Rochdale the present number is 1,858, and there will be added 5,500. At Sheffield there are 10,000, and there will be added 28,000. [MR. HADFIELD: Hear, hear!] I have no doubt my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield is in a state of rapture at the prospect of shaking hands with 28,000 additional voters every time he makes a canvass of the town. But I believe his generous nature will recoil from such a boon so long as his neighbours are excluded from the franchise. In Stockport, to the present number of 1,695, there will be added 7,257. The large figures which I have been quoting are precisely the same classes of men as those which make up the numbers of compound-householders. Of course if the vestry, influenced by the persons of property who command it, choose to bring in the Small Tenements Act all these thousands will disappear, the proportion of new voters assuming the same scanty and meagre dimensions as in the other case. Then comes, lastly, Stoke-upon-Trent, where to the present 3,419 are added 15,000.

What the House has with the greatest possible kindness allowed me to state in detail is briefly this—In the first place, when I look at this Bill with regard to the enfranchising part of it, it appears to me to profess to admit a principle of needless breadth. But, in admitting that principle, I must be content, like other hon. Members, to abide by the full, honest, equal, impartial, unrestrained application of that principle. I then find that principle defeated in its application by these provisions, the nature of which I have endeavoured to explain, which cut off more than two-thirds of the whole number that we have seemingly promised to enfranchise, and, not only cutting off more than two-thirds, but distributing that proportion through the various towns in a manner that aggravates the inequality tenfold, makes it utterly intolerable, and lays the certain foundations of a new agitation. It is therefore utterly at variance with the faintest idea of settling and adjusting this long-contested question. I am bound to say that I think the quantity of enfranchisement proposed by Her Majesty's Government insufficient—I mean the enfranchisement under £10. I do not think the enfranchisement of 120,000 persons is such an enfranchisement as can settle this question, or ought to settle it. We proposed last year a measure which would have enfranchised 200,000, and I think that was a moderate proposal. I do not advocate sweeping and violent measures, but I think that that proposal was moderate; and I, for one, cannot accede to what is proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I am aware that he calls it an enfranchisement of 237,000; but he must know that the introduction of new modes of statement in the statistics makes it exceedingly incomplete, because if we change the basis of our computations the means of comparison are lost. From the right hon. Gentleman's 237,000 I make all the reductions that are required, and I am persuaded that 120,000 is a sufficient estimate of those whom his Bill will enfranchise as rate-paying-householders, setting aside those whom he excludes by the barriers that are placed in the way of non-ratepaying householders getting upon the register. Moreover, I must own I have not only an objection to the quantity of the enfranchisement as insufficient; but I think the quality is defective. I do not wish to give any offence to my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Beresford Hope)—for I believe there are few portions of the labouring class more intelligent than those whom he represents, and they have shown their intelligence, as far as they have the power, by returning him to this House—but in the lower strata of the 15,000 who are to be enfranchised in that constituency there will surely be a considerable number of persons who have had but limited educational advantages, who earn but small wages, and who are exceedingly dependent upon their employers.

Now, if I am to make a choice between person and person for enfranchisement, I say give me the best, the most intelligent, the most independent that I can discover among the working classes, and do not go in this indiscriminate manner and gather up whole masses of the population, and then when people are alarmed say, "Oh! we only do that in a few towns; in the mass you will see that we enfranchise only a small number." Above all, we ought not to establish artificial distinctions among men belonging to the same class. That is a practice wholly new to the British Constitution. I admit that in the present constituencies you have a distinction; because, since 1832, the practice of compounding for rates has grown up, and consequently a distinction has arisen which it is our business to recognise and adjust, but not to establish into a law. I admit that the old Constitution of the country, before 1832, recognised many rights of franchise in different towns, but nowhere did it make the smallest difference as to facility and amount of enfranchisement between those who were called upon in common to discharge a common duty in returning a representative to Parliament. That was the old principle of the Constitution. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has himself enshrined it in an expressive phrase where he says—"There was a noble equality, not of the man, but of the citizen, when called upon to discharge public duties." I ask the right hon. Gentleman to maintain that equality within the limits of the Constitution as the old principle, the safe principle, and the wise principle. I feel confident this House will not depart from it. But even if that principle were not old, and if it were not in other respects safe and wise, yet I should still think there was an absolute necessity of dealing equally with men in equal circumstances, if you wish to arrive at a settlement of this question, and not to give a premium to continued agitation. If, however, there be any man who desires to avert that settlement, and to secure the continuance of agitation, I would ask him whether his imagination could possibly suggest a more effectual means of attaining it than the introduction of this artificial inequality, and the distinguishing man from man, and separating man from man in regard to the enjoyment of the franchise, not by any of those differences caused by circumstances and education, which he might look upon as a dispensation of Providence, but by enactments adopted at the arbitrary will of Parliament, and which are as worthless as the paper upon which they are written?

Now, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman what assurances he can give us upon this subject, and first of all I will beg of him to be very explicit in his answer. ["Oh!"] I hope that he will be as explicit in his answer as his sense of public duty will permit. I mean to convey no taunt whatever by the use of these words. If it is thought that I do, hon. Gentlemen do not perceive my meaning, which is this—We have arrived at a stage when it is common and customary to decide the principle of a measure. We have been promised further explanations on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

Sir, I feel—and I feel very deeply—the responsibility of every Member of this House, and particularly my own responsibility. I know that we are bound to labour to obtain a speedy measure and a good measure. I know that the rejection of this Bill, or the setting up of another plan in lieu of it—unless such a course should be absolutely necessary—would be a great evil, because it would tend to retard that settlement which we all so much desire. I am therefore anxious to exhaust to the utmost the means of knowing whether, when in Committee on the Bill, we shall have any hope of bringing it to a satisfactory conclusion. It is merely on that ground that I address, or—if I may use the word—petition the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly entitled, if he pleases, to rise in his place and to say, "I decline, until we are in Committee on the Bill, to tell you what I intend to do with regard even to the leading principles of the Bill." But the right hon. Gentleman would leave us in a very painful position with regard to the condition in which the question would then present itself; because I think I am not very far wrong in stating that a large proportion of Members of this House are of opinion that in every leading provision this Bill must undergo total, or at least substantial, alteration. Therefore, it is not the least by way of taunt that I ask the right hon. Gentleman to be explicit. It is that we may have our duty and our position clearly before us that I express earnestly and respectfully the hope that Her Majesty's Government may be disposed to give us, at all events on the most important and most difficult questions, a clear intimation of their intentions. The right hon. Gentleman was asked a Question to-night as to the time when he would propose that the House should go into Committee on the Bill, and he gave an answer which I heard with much satisfaction—to the effect that it was quite a mistake to suppose that the Government intended the material postponement of the Committee on the Bill. I presume that, even to-night, possibly, or at any rate within easy and moderate limits, this debate will be likely to terminate; and, if that be so, I venture to express a hope that we should go into Committee, or approach the main subject on the question that you do leave the Chair, some time in the course of next week, or one of the days at the disposal of the Government. If not, we, perhaps, should not be able to approach the subject satisfactorily till after Easter; and if we did not approach it till after Easter our difficulties would be most seriously aggravated, and the choice between proceeding with this Bill, or with a new Bill, would be greatly narrowed and restricted. I venture, therefore, to hope that we shall be informed by the Government whether, in the event of an early termination of this debate, their intention is to propose on Monday next, or on Thursday week—one of the two—that you, Sir, do leave the Chair for the purpose of our going into Committee on this Bill.

With regard to the enacting clauses, I hope it will not be thought that I have been very unreasonable in the proposal I have made that the Government should give us some satisfactory assurance. I shall make no request to the Government in respect to many other matters. Though I regard those matters as being perfectly essential to legislation, yet, under the circumstances, even without previous assurances from the Government, I do not wholly despair of settling them in Committee. Nor will I ask the right hon. Gentleman any question as to what he will do with respect to the county franchise or the enlargement—which he must see will be necessary—of his scheme of re-distribution. But I will venture to ask three things. In the first place, do the Government intend to introduce a lodger franchise into the Bill? Without a lodger franchise it is idle to legislate. I, for one, am not willing to place myself in this position—that we should go into Committee on the Bill, that we should spend very nearly the whole of the remainder of the Session—and I cannot put it nearer than the month of July—in getting through the Bill, and that somebody, in defiance of the Government, should then bring up a clause for a lodger franchise, that the Government should be beaten, and that the Government should at that period of the Session leave the Bill, and postpone the subject till another year. I do not wish to be drawn into that difficulty. I want to know whether a lodger franchise is to be introduced into the Bill, and, if it is to be introduced, to what extent it will correspond with the general scope of the franchise we may adopt? I wish also to know, secondly, what the Government propose to do with respect to the votes of the very poor and dependent persons who are indeed householders, and who are nominally ratepaying-householders, but who are on the line or fringe between those who pay rates and those who are excused from payment of rates. I wish to know how, practically, the traffic in these votes by the registration agents is to be prevented, for I confess I do not see how that is to be done unless some limit be introduced similar to that which I myself recently suggested and explained to the House? In the third place, and above all, I ask the right hon. Gentleman—and this, in my view, is the key to what is artificial and intricate in the Bill—whether he will proceed on the principle of asking Parliament to define the outward limit of the constituency? I do not go into details. With those we can deal in Committee. But will the Government undertake to remove from the Bill and from the present law all artificial distinctions—all distinctions resting upon enactment alone—between persons in the same condition of life and the same circumstances as to education, independence, and all that constitutes fitness for the franchise? If the right hon. Gentleman will accept that principle; if he will ask Parliament to determine the classes, numbers, and persons, be they many or be they few, to be enfranchised; if he will remove the artificial obstacles which now exist in the Bill; if he will strike out of the Bill the artificial distinctions which he proposes to introduce; if he will establish for the future the old constitutional principle which comes to us from the past, of the equality of all voters in the eye of the law—then, although we shall have a heavy task before us, we may hope to be able to go into Committee on this Bill. The dual vote will then, of course, disappear. The fine of the compound-householder will disappear, and the restraint already placed in their way will disappear. We shall then enfranchise those classes who are fit to exercise the franchise. We shall admit them within the pale of the Constitution upon that footing of equality by which alone we can hope to make our legislation effectual for the purpose either of improving the constitution of this House, and attaining the ends of legislation, or for the purpose of producing that content in the country without which, although we may legislate, and debate, and divide, it is vain to call ourselves the Parliament of England, vain to regard ourselves as the masters of England's destinies, and vain to suppose that we give to the work, which we send forth as our act, those hopes and prospects of duration by means of which alone it can have value in itself or draw respect upon ourselves.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I feel very deeply the disadvantages under which I labour in following the right hon. Gentleman through those points of which he has so complete a mastery, and which he has discussed with such ability, and I feel also how little able I am, like him, to attract or to maintain the attention of the House on these difficult and abstruse questions. There is, Sir, so much that is painful in this matter to me; it is so painful to me to see men sitting in this House, with whom it was my pride and pleasure to act, severed from myself and my friends on account of this Bill, that I could well wish to be silent on this occasion. But knowing the part which I took in the preparation of this Bill, and that I have my share of responsibility in bringing it before the House, I should not be doing my duty if I were now to shrink from defending it by argument. It might be supposed from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that the bringing in and carrying a Reform Bill was a somewhat easy task. But the right hon. Gentleman was last year in the favourable position of having a Parliament elected under the auspices of his own Government, and of having a majority of at least 70 at his back. He also proposed a Bill, considered—and, I suppose, carefully considered—by his Government; but did he find, when he brought it before the House of Commons, that a £7 rental franchise was easily rendered acceptable to the House? In 1852, a £5 rating franchise failed. In 1854, a £6 rating franchise failed. In 1859, the non-lowering by any amount of the borough franchise failed. In 1860, a franchise of the yearly value of £6 failed. In 1866, a franchise of the yearly value of £7 failed. In 1867, a scheme, which was a short time before the House, failed to obtain that cordial reception from the right hon. Gentleman which might have been expected from the affectionate manner in which he has spoken of it to-night.

In what I have now to say to the House, I will take care in one respect to answer the demands of the right hon. Gentleman. The position which the right hon. Gentleman so worthily occupies as Leader of the Opposition of this House I do not think is a more commanding one than the position which he occupied last year, and I do not understand that the right hon. Gentleman is entitled to speak on behalf of the whole Opposition. I must decline to be called upon by the right hon. Gentleman to give answers which upon the second reading of this Bill shall pledge the Government to any particular course. ["Oh, oh!"] I told the House I would be explicit in what I did say. This Bill has not hitherto been under discussion. This Bill was introduced to the House originally in the form of Resolutions inviting the attention of the House to the principles on which the Government proposed to act. They were not received with favour. We were told that they were vague and unsatisfactory. Those Resolutions, however, contained the principles which are contained in the four corners of the Bill. ["Oh, oh!"] An hon. Member says "Oh, oh!" but I venture to say that, with respect to personal rating and certain other points, these Resolutions did lay down the principles of the Bill now before the House.

On coming to the preparation of the Bill now before Parliament the Government of Lord Derby was necessarily placed under very great difficulties. I will frankly own that nothing but the sense of public duty would have induced me to join in bringing it forward. I, for one, had no wish to be the medium of bringing a Reform Bill before the House; but the Government of Lord Derby were placed in power by circumstances over which they had no control. ["Oh, oh!"] I say so still. I can only say that when taunts are thrown out by hon. Members opposite, and others outside the House, as to the pleasures of office—I can quite understand the pleasure of being in office when you have a great majority at your back, and are able to carry out your own principles. But I do not see the pleasure of being dictated to by an Opposition, however strong, or of receiving lectures from the opposite side of the House as to the principles upon which the Government ought to act—I trust that I shall never look elsewhere than to those who sit behind me for the support of those measures which I advocate as embodying the principles under which I consent to act. There are, however, many hon. Members opposite who are most anxious that a Bill should be passed, and that this disquieting subject should be removed from discussion, and who will rejoice when the time comes for various great social and important political questions to be taken in hand, which are now impeded by the necessity of dealing with the subject of Reform.

I say we are entitled, having brought this Bill to its second reading, to hear the opinion of the House upon it. I quite agree with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he said, on the night when it was introduced, that no Bill can be carried in this House without mutual concession and mutual good feeling. I entertain that opinion entirely, and so far as is consistent with my principles, I would readily consent to any alterations. But there are, no doubt, leading principles in the Bill; and if, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite has said, it be true that every one of those principles must undergo alteration, then I say, distinctly and decidedly, that the division ought to be taken now. For to such alterations as involve the leading principles of the Bill I, for one, am not at all prepared to agree. The right hon. Gentleman has given the Government credit for ignorance, for he says that if we had known its effect we never could have introduced the Bill. I am prepared, taking the figures, which are from documents already before the House, to advocate the Bill in its present form. The right hon. Gentleman has said that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated on a former occasion that 236,000 persons would be added to the franchise. If the figures of the right hon. Gentleman opposite were correct, so far from 236,000 being added, the real addition would be nearly double that amount, because the right hon. Gentleman, in dealing with those figures, never made any of those reductions which are necessary to be made. He says—but I hardly know what I am to meet on this occasion. On one side I am told that I am a party to a revolutionary measure; and, on the other hand, I am told that the enfranchisement which we offer is entirely insufficient. We are told that the £7 rental franchise of last year, without the payment of rates, would have brought in men of an entirely different quality from those we now seek to bring in, and that we should give up our Bill at once on that statement. But I venture to say that if any hon. Member will take the trouble to look he will find that the £7 rental franchise would bring in men inferior in quality to those we seek to introduce by the personal payment of rates. The right hon. Gentleman says that we have no resting-place, and recommended the course he had proposed of dividing the voters into classes. But that is a principle which has been suggested over and over again, and it is because those measures which contained it have always failed that we have been obliged to look out for some new standing-place upon which a surer footing might be obtained. That standing-place has not been founded upon household suffrage, first given and then taken away, as assumed by the right hon. Gentleman. It never has been stated on this side of the House as household suffrage at all, but as a rating suffrage, accompanied by certain requirements as to residence. It is as different a thing as possible. It is not a household suffrage pure and simple, but a household suffrage based upon rating—the direct payment of rates. It is a franchise given in one shape and adhering together on one system. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the five different classes appearing in the Return, and first to the householders in towns where the Small Tenements Act is in operation. Some of these he says you admit, and some of them you exclude. But we do not exclude—that is a fallacy. In the column in which he says we admit them, he has not made the necessary deductions. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I did.] I did not understand the right hon. Gentleman to say so. But that is, in fact, the answer to the whole of the argument founded on this Return. The answer to the whole of this is that we propose a certain franchise which is open to everybody occupying a house and paying his own rates. Every person who chooses to pay his own rates and does pay them, and who resides long enough, is entitled to be put on the register. The right hon. Gentleman then says, “Oh yes; but how is he to get on the register? Look at the burden which is imposed upon him; look at the difficulties under which he is placed.” If that is so, let the right hon. Gentleman in Committee propose that the claim shall be more readily received, and a means established by which he should be more easily put upon the register. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the parish of All Saints, Poplar, where he says a large number would be excluded. But why did he not also refer to another parish in the neighbourhood, where nearly 4,000 persons had got themselves put upon the rate book? The right hon. Gentleman says that by this Bill there would be only about 120,000 persons admitted to the franchise. Now, I am content to take the figures of the right hon. Gentleman; but there would ultimately be a considerably greater number than that. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Under £10?] Yes; under £10. Hon. Members are aware that there are numbers of persons rated over £10 who do not qualify for the franchise. Of course, there would be a still greater number of persons rated under £10 who would not entitle themselves to the privilege, inasmuch as it would be accompanied by a longer period of residence and the payment of rates. The right hon. Gentleman declares that, under what we call household suffrage, only 120,000 persons would be admitted. I must reply to that observation that we never called our proposal household suffrage, and never intended that it should be so called. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to compare a place like Liverpool with a country borough. Now, as I understood his objection the other day in respect to country boroughs, it was that we were going to admit to the franchise persons who were perfectly unfit for it, and who, living on small rural properties, were not in a position of independence. But the objection taken to-day is in the opposite direction; and the right hon. Gentleman says that he finds on inquiry that there are numbers of persons absolutely excluded because cottages are let with farms. That objection only applies to boroughs having a large margin of country district. Again, the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Bill would introduce nearly household suffrage in those boroughs were it not that there are certain checks preventing that result arising out of the mode in which property is dealt with. The answer to that statement is, that if the persons in those boroughs choose to avail themselves of the right to be placed on the rate book they will be entitled to the franchise, and if they do not place themselves on the rate book they will not be entitled to the franchise. That provision will act as a very considerable check in many cases, and it was meant so to act. Let me not be misunderstood. It was meant to find out the persons fitted for the franchise by their participation in the burdens borne by their fellow-citizens. That would be the class of persons selected, and not without reason. A man living from hand to mouth, and who neglects to put by something for the purpose of paying his rates, will be excluded; but the man who puts by money for the purpose of meeting the demand for the payment of rates, the careful, the saving, the truly independent man, will be admitted to the most important privilege of the Constitution. But the right hon. Gentlemen, contradicting his previous arguments, complains that we are going to bring in the lowest class of the population as voters. Here, I think, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) may congratulate himself on finding a supporter of that dictum of his which has of late been so much paraded throughout the country; because the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) says now that the lowest class are to be admitted to this franchise—a class which would be peculiarly open to corrupt influences, and which had no real claim to such a favour.

MR. GLADSTONE: I said no such thing.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The right hon. Gentleman declares that he said no such thing. But he stated towards the close of his speech, as well as in other parts of it, that we made no provision for preventing that traffic in votes which would naturally take place with the lowest class of voters.

MR. GLADSTONE: With the lowest class of householders.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: With the lowest class of householders. I used the word "voters," and the right hon. Gentleman the word "householders." I really think that is a distinction without a difference. The right hon. Gentleman imputed to us that we were bringing in a Bill for the establishment of household suffrage, although no doubt, he also said, that it would not confer household suffrage; and he added that the lowest class of householders would be very much subject to corrupt influences, and that this Bill made no provision to prevent the abuses which would naturally ensue. Now, I do not know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne ever said anything more than that. But the right hon. Gentleman tells us that he has a plan by which all these difficulties would be avoided. He says, "Make persons rateable down to a certain figure; let all below that figure be excused from the payment of rates, and let all above it be liable to that payment."

MR. GLADSTONE: I never said anything of the kind.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I do not wish to misstate what the right hon. Gentleman said. I have endeavoured to take down his words as well as I could. I understood him to say that it was impossible to pass the clauses which we have introduced into this Bill, because of the Small Tenements Act and of other local Acts. But he wished that we should fix upon some figure, whether £5 or £6, or any other sum below which no one should be called upon to pay rates, and above which everybody should be rated.

MR. GLADSTONE: So much public interest is felt upon this point that I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will excuse me for endeavouring to set him right. I never said that persons above the line were all to be personally rated. What I said was that persons above the line should all be treated in the same manner with respect to the franchise.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY : The right hon. Gentleman's explanation does not seem to me really to differ from the statement which I attributed to him. What it comes to is this—That there should be a line drawn below which no one was to pay his own rates, while above that line all persons should be liable to be rated. But upon that my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) asked the very pertinent question whether the right hon. Gentleman meant that those persons above the line should merely be rated, or that they should pay their rates? The right hon. Gentleman says now that he does not think there is much in the payment of rates; but last year he argued against the necessity of the personal payment of rates, and he sought to alter the law upon that subject. That was my understanding of the language which fell from the right hon. Gentleman. But whether you repeal the Small Tenements Act or not such a proceeding would be diametrically opposed to the principle of this Bill, which attaches the franchise to the personal payment of rates accompanied by a certain period of residence. The right hon. Gentleman says that what we should look to is the condition of the man, and not the payment of rates.

We have now been fourteen or fifteen years considering the question, and have not yet been able to ascertain the condition of the man. I must say that the mode in which the question has hitherto been treated has not been satisfactory to the country. It has not led to any settlement. You have tried it in every aspect. A rating franchise and a gross estimated rental franchise have been proposed; but, whatever test was suggested, still the House of Commons has not passed any Bill on the subject, and now we have arrived at a point when it is necessary to see whether the House can pass a measure or not. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that under the 34th clause of the Bill the compound-householder would be fined. Now, if it can be said that he is fined by paying his full rates, it might be rejoined that he would be bribed by being permitted to pay less than the full amount; but why should one man be put on a more favourable footing with respect to the exercise of the franchise than another? Let every man stand on the same basis. The right hon. Gentleman said that the 34th clause would require the full payment of rates, and in that statement he was perfectly correct. Why should the compound-householder, whose dwelling may be worth £10 or £20, or even £30 a year, be exempted from the full payment of rates which you exact from the man who occupies in the ordinary way a tenement that is often of smaller value? I can, for my part, see no reason in such a proposal. The right hon. Gentleman says that a man will have in consequence of the provision in the Bill to pay for his vote, and he puts it on the footing of the 1s. which used to be paid for registration. But that 1s. was paid by a man for the purpose of being put on the registry, whereas the rates are paid because they are due from the man. I must also remind the House that the right hon. Gentleman has entirely omitted from his consideration that provision in the Bill under which the compound-householder, who paid his rate in full, would have a right to recover from his landlord the extra sum he had thus advanced. By that permission the compound-householder would have a right on the payment of his next rate to deduct the additional charge he had incurred; and therefore he would not in reality be subject to any fine whatever. By the 40th clause of this Bill the right hon. Gentleman will see the provisions of the different Acts relating to this subject are referred to. By the 7th section of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 81, he will also see that any occupier paying any rate or rates in respect of any tenement where the owner is rated to the same, shall be entitled to deduct from his rent, or to recover from the owner himself the amount so paid.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: The provisions of that Act are not included in the 40th clause.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I can only say that they were meant to be, and that a man shall be entitled to recover from his landlord the amount he has paid. It is obvious justice requires that it should be so. Nobody will suppose that the Bill meant to make both the landlord and the tenant pay the rate. Then would there, indeed, be a fine. The provision of this Bill is, that where the occupier claims to be rated he shall be entitled to recover from the landlord the amount of rates he has paid in the rent. Let hon. Gentlemen look the fact of what is proposed fairly in the face.

Provision is made that any man may claim to be rated for such rates as are paid in respect of his house. We assume that those who so claim to be rated have, in almost all these cases, tenancies of a very short description, in many cases merely weekly; and the contract between landlord and tenant would be immediately altered by such proceedings. Let it not be supposed that there will be any necessity for a new claim to be made from year to year. When a man is once placed upon the rate book and so on the register, his name will be kept there as long as he continues to pay his rates. As to some of those proposals which the right hon. Gentleman spoke of as fancy franchises, we are told that many obstacles can be found in registration and other matters. Surely that also applies to the lodger franchise, to which the right hon. Gentleman has adverted more than once. The lodger franchise would involve claims year by year under any system that can be adopted; and the difficulties and annoyances to which persons may be subjected in that way would make such a franchise, however good it might be in itself, most difficult to be effectively worked. But the lodgers who seek to be enfranchised have the opportunity by the savings bank franchise, by the franchise connected with funded property, and by the payment of direct taxes, of coming upon the register. The same observation applies to a great number of the high class workmen earning from £2 to £3 a week who live in lodgings and pay income tax. All these franchises are open not to the higher classes only, but to all classes, and are not open to the difficulties of the lodger franchise. Thus will be met much of the objection which the right hon. Gentleman has founded upon the want of a lodger franchise. A lodger franchise was introduced in the Bill of 1859, and in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman last year, but in a somewhat different form. The difficulty with respect to it was that they had to make their claim from year to year. With regard to the question of the payment of rates, it must not be supposed that the Government are introducing anything new, or that cannot for a moment stand. The ratepaying clauses of the original Reform Bill, which were attacked at first, have gradually obtained stability. For thirty-five years the country has had confidence in the good sense and reasonableness of the principle. This measure only continues that principle. In giving the lower franchise we are only adopting that which the right hon. Gentleman and his Government adopted long ago. The right hon. Gentleman says we have become wiser; but that is the principle of the Bill of 1854. To a certain extent the effect of that Bill has been misapprehended, for a three years' residence was imposed in addition to a £5 rating, and the restriction, therefore, was enormous; because as we descend in amount we find the people much more migratory, changing their residences much more frequently than the classes above them.

Under the present system a deduction has to be made of 28 to 30 per cent in order to come at the number who are placed upon the register; but if we go, as in this Bill, to the lower classes, and include those who are travelling from place to place for the purposes of their employment, we shall at least have to make a deduction of 50 per cent. [Mr. BRIGHT: Hear!] I am glad that the hon. Member for Birmingham at least gives me credit for speaking frankly upon the subject. [Mr. BRIGHT: Hear!] I quite admit that these things are limitations. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that the payment of rates and residence were meant as limitations, and I think they are such limitations as this House will not readily part with. The right hon. Gentleman says that they are provisions which it will be impossible to carry. I differ from the right hon. Gentleman in that respect. I think they will commend themselves to all who look carefully at the question, and the checks of long residence and payment of rates will keep only the best of the ratepayers upon the register. I am quite aware that in all measures of this kind criticism is much more easy than the construction of a Bill. The right hon. Gentleman experienced that himself last year, and no doubt the present Government will experience it this. It is, however, most desirable that we should know—that which we do not yet know—what is the view taken of different parts of the Bill by hon. Members on this side of the House, from whom the present Government have had almost unlimited support for a number of years. To them we owe much for their constant and faithful allegiance. Some hon. Members, I have no doubt, entertain different views from those of the Government on this question. Some, I regret to say, have parted from us, though I trust only for the moment, in consequence of it. But I believe that the noble Lord (Viscount Cranbourne) and the gallant General (General Peel), and the noble Lord in "another place" (the Earl of Carnarvon), if they had had time to consider this question more thoroughly, would never have separated from their Colleagues. I think that upon the figures as they stand, and as they have been reviewed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, coupled with the checks introduced in the Bill, the measure is a perfectly safe one. If it differs in different boroughs, I can only say that one of the chief arguments adopted last year, on both sides of the House, against the right hon. Gentleman's measure, was that there was a disgusting monotony in all boroughs. Well, here we have, according to him, something like household suffrage in one and something else in another.

There is one point to which I am bound to advert, and which no doubt will be considerably argued on this occasion—I mean the question of an additional vote. If I thought that that was an absurd, an unjust, an invidious, or a mischievous thing, I certainly should have been no party to having it placed in the Bill. But I am at a loss to conceive upon what ground that opinion can be entertained. There have been a great many philosophers as well as practical statesmen of all kinds who have made efforts to reduce in some way or other the powers of some great class which it was wished to admit to the franchise. One person has proposed that we should have the representation of minorities. Another that the voter should have only one vote, while a third thought that we should have cumulative votes in one person. And all sorts of schemes have been proposed. The hon. Member for East Surrey has not been afraid to publish in a pamphlet the Liberal dilemma, which was to admit as many as possible to the franchise, but still to check the measure with the old Sturges Bourne principle. Why, then, does every person turn round upon us, as if we had brought forward something inconceivably unjust in itself, and which will not bear a moment's scrutiny? I invite scrutiny for our proposal. Let it receive the scrutiny of the House, and let us know what hon. Members have to say upon it. The right hon. Gentleman has asked us on the second reading to abandon parts of the Bill, and to say that we have introduced provisions which we do not mean to maintain. But let us hear what the House has to say upon it. We are reasonable men, and if we cannot support a particular provision with effect, I have no doubt it will not be pressed upon the consideration of the House. But, at the same time, let us look at the question and consider why it is more unfair to give a man who pays direct taxation in addition to rates for his house a second vote, than to draw the line at a certain figure, and to give no vote below it. Other hon. Gentlemen have proposed other compensations and other balances against the classes to be admitted. Let us hear and discuss them; but I most distinctly object to sacrificing a part of the Bill upon the second reading, and when only one speaker has addressed the House upon the subject. If there is chaff mixed with the wheat let it be blown to the winds; but let us see that those to be admitted to the franchise are qualified for the duties of citizens—that they are persons who can be found, who are not flitting from place to place, and that they have sufficient interest in the franchise to claim it and secure it for themselves. The 40s. freeholder has to claim his vote, and if objected to has to appear before the barrister. When you talk of appearing before the revising barrister, and the right hon. Gentleman speaks of the dangers of registration agents, I ask, does the right hon. Gentleman think that there are no registration agents who appear now without expense, in lieu of the men whose votes are objected to? These things are easily managed, if people wish to manage them. The fact is there are great bodies of men in this country who do not now care for the franchise; but there are also among them some whom it would be most desirable to see placed upon the register. I believe that by one of the provisions of this Bill, enabling these harmless, inoffensive, and often well-educated persons who now abstain from going on the register to vote by voting-papers, as is proposed by this Bill, a great number of them will give their votes.

The right hon. Gentleman tells us there are certain things which must be given up. Well, Sir, with the greatest respect to the right hon. Gentleman, I must decline to accept his dictum on the subject. When this Bill has been discussed we shall see. The Government are as anxious as the right hon. Gentleman to pass the measure this year. We are anxious to give a liberal but not an indiscriminate franchise. We do not think we have introduced provisions which tend to prevent this from being a fixed if not a final measure. We believe it has as good a basis to stand upon as any measure that has been introduced, and we believe it has a better one. It is a basis on what may be called a household residential rating, with personal payment and continued residence. It is a basis which, I think, those above the £10 limit will accept without any fear of being overwhelmed by new voters. I think them of these new voters as of a class capable of exercising the franchise. I know there are many below the gangway who were consistent in opposing the rate-paying qualification under the Reform Act, who will, no doubt, strongly oppose the payment of rates under this Bill. We must meet that opposition. We are not bringing in a Bill to meet the wishes of one section of the community; but we are bringing in a Bill to meet the wishes of the enlightened and quiet and well-disposed portion of the community of this country. We are told we have to dread agitation. I do not wish to say a word about agitation, either in its favour or to its discredit. But it is because that agitation is represented by so large a party in this House, and has been carried so far, that the settlement of this question is imperative if it can possibly be obtained, and that we with reluctance—at least, I speak for myself—but not giving up any principle which we hold—have been parties to bringing in this great measure. I only ask hon. Gentlemen opposite for a fair and candid consideration of this question. If they think there are difficulties as to the mode in which persons would claim to be put on the register, that is a question for the Committee. I feel bound to say that the cavils of the right hon. Gentleman on different portions of this Bill, relate to matters which can neither be discussed on the second reading nor on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair. They can only be discussed properly in Committee, when Members ing it to be unlimited and without discrimination.

Mr. HEADLAM said, he rose to answer the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, and to assure him that he would give a fair, candid, and impartial consideration to the measure of the Government. He regarded the extension of the borough franchise as the most important principle of the Bill; for it could not be denied that had it not been for the defects and shortcomings in that franchise, and the admission of leading statesmen of the necessity for an alteration, the subject of Reform would not press for an immediate consideration. He would therefore make one or two remarks on the proposed new borough franchise. It had been said that the Bill proposed household suffrage subject to two checks—namely, duality of votes, and personal payment of rates. This did not appear to him an accurate statement. Judging from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in proposing the Bill, and the manner in which the clauses were drawn, he inferred that the whole franchise rested upon the personal payment of rates, and that this was not a check upon something else, but the very franchise itself, so that if it were struck out, the very substance, life, and essence of the Bill would be gone. In that case it would be right to consider how far the personal payment of rates had entered into the past constitution of this country, and how far it ought to be adopted for future practice. This personal payment of rates was identical with the old "scot-and-lot" franchise which was one of many franchises that existed before the Reform Act. Our ancestors dealt with this subject not unwisely. They gave votes not to individuals, but to localities, and allowed the localities to choose in what manner they should send representatives to the House of Commons. In this way the personal payment of rates came into existence, and once existing as a custom it became clothed with the authority of the common law. The Reform Bill entirely swept away all these franchises and substituted one general franchise in lieu of them. That general franchise consisted of two qualifications—first, the occupation of a house of £10 value, and next the personal payment of rates; and it cannot be said that either of these qualifications was more important or essential than the other. At the time of the Reform Act these compound-householders existed, and had existed long before, and whatever difficulties were now experienced were also felt at that time. In the correspondence of Earl Grey with William IV., it would be found that the subject was discussed, and that Earl Grey held many conversations with persons conversant with the Tower Hamlets, in which this particular form of vote at that time prevailed. A clause accordingly was inserted in the Reform Act of 1832 enabling compound-householders to get their names placed on the list of ratepayers, and to pay their rates themselves, and thus to become qualified for the franchise if their rental exceeded £10 per annum. Difficulties, however, occurred on the part of these compound-householders in consequence of the rule imposed upon them that they should make an annual claim, and to meet this difficulty Sir William Clay introduced a Bill to enable them to claim once for all. Earl Russell, in speaking on the Motion for the second reading of that Bill, said he should vote for it because a remedy was required; but that care should be taken that the person claiming to vote was made personally liable for the payment of the rates, and that unless he had paid the rates up to the requisite period he should not be entitled to vote. With regard to the Bill now under discussion, the first observation he had to make was that while it dealt most liberally with ratepayers, it entirely ignored the whole class of non-ratepaying occupiers. He thought this was a great defect in the Bill, since the latter class was becoming more numerous and of greater importance every day, and could not be disregarded. If the franchise was to be based upon the sole principle of ratepaying, he thought it would give rise to fresh agitation on the part of those who were unjustly excluded from the suffrage merely on the ground that the rates of the houses occupied by them were paid by the landlords for the convenience of the parish. If the House were to adopt a compulsory enactment that up to £5 or £6 the landlord should be in all cases liable for the rate, it would be nearly identical with the scheme shadowed forth by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and would get rid of many difficulties besetting the question. There should then be a clause which should include within it all non-ratepaying occupiers, whether lodgers or compound-householders, and the definition of tenure and duration of residence with respect to this class would, of course, have to be settled. In that clause some figure would have to be inserted, and he would recommend that such a clause, while very precise, should also be liberal, and should include as few restrictions as possible. It was important that there should be a clear distinction between the two classes of ratepayers and non-ratepayers, and that the ratepayers' list should be occupied only by those who paid rates, for with respect to them there was no necessity for any figure or value of their residence, whereas with respect to non-ratepaying occupiers, some figures would be necessary. He believed a measure of that kind would be acceptable to both sides of the House, and that it would be a permanent settlement of the question. With regard to the re-distribution of seats he agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that unless the electoral map could be re-constructed the extent of re-distribution which the Bill proposed was sufficient—that any further alteration might create difficulties in any future re-construction. He was, however, in favour of such a re-construction of the electoral map, and he would state to the House the nature of the plan he would himself recommend. In the first place, he thought that the present distinction between the county and borough franchise was a great anomaly. If a foreigner were shown a map of England in which the area of each borough was coloured red, the rest being left white, and were told that every householder within those small red spots enjoyed the suffrage, while in the expanse of country coloured white not one in twenty possessed that privilege, he would naturally inquire whether the residents in those small areas had superior qualifications, or what ground there was for so marked a distinction. An answer might probably have been given to the effect that although the distinction seemed an unreasonable one, it had come down from past times; that we changed our institutions slowly; and that the people inhabiting those spots having exercised their privileges fairly, we were not inclined without absolute necessity to make any material alteration. Should, however, it then be asked why, in 1867, when we revised our Constitution, we did not remove such an anomaly, we should be forced to confess that, instead of so doing, we made the distinction more marked than before; for the present Bill, while lowering the franchise within the boroughs, did not enlarge the privileges of the rest of the country to any corresponding extent, and it thus increased the harshness and injustice of the distinction. Why should such a distinction be retained when, with the present facilities of locomotion, the inhabitants of the counties were becoming equally intelligent and enlightened with those of the boroughs. By a proper re-distribution of seats this distinction might be abolished—the occupation or household suffrage might prevail generally through the country, and this might be accomplished without any violent or undue alteration of our present institutions. In order to effect what he proposed, it did not appear necessary to make any change in respect to the counties and the larger cities and boroughs. The county Members at present fully represented the property of the country. With respect to the smaller and middle-sized boroughs, he would not altogether disfranchise them; but he would merge them in the surrounding districts. So that to continue the illustration he had before used, the electoral map would become one uniform colour, instead of being white covered with red spots. By way of illustration he would take the county with which he was himself familiar—namely, the North Riding of Yorkshire. No alteration would be made with respect to the Members for the county, nor with respect to the Members for the city of York; but there were several small boroughs within the county, and what he proposed was to expand the area of each of these small boroughs until they touched each other, and occupied the whole surface of the county. In all probability the same Gentlemen who now represented these small boroughs would come back after the proposed change representing districts with large constituencies, called by the name of the borough they now represent, so that no material change would take place in the distribution of power, or in the individual Members of the House. If a similar course were to be adopted in other counties, the result would be that every householder throughout the length and breadth of the land, who paid rates in respect of his residences, would be entitled to a vote for the district in which he resided, and thus an addition would be made to the constituency far larger than what is proposed in the Bill now before the House, and much larger also than what was proposed last year. Such a measure would be conservative in the highest and truest sense of the term, not as giving power to this or that party in the State, but conservative on the score that any dangerous or impulsive tendencies in any one town or district would be checked and rendered innocuous, not by clauses of Acts of Parliament, not by jealous provisions in restraint of the franchise, but by tendencies of a different description in other parts of the country, and by the average good sense of the whole community.

MR. YORKE said, that in answer to the impracticable scheme which the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had suggested, he thought he could add for the consideration of the intelligent foreigner the right hon. Gentleman had chosen as a witness one more problem in our representative system which would puzzle him as much as the right hon. Gentleman's. He (Mr. Headlam) stated that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in dealing with the re-distribution of seats, had said there were only two methods of dealing with that subject? One was to re-arrange, and to a certain extent so to modify the existing anomalies, so as to make it possible for the representation to continue under the present form; the other to re-open the question, and start de novo. Suppose, for instance, the intelligent foreigner referred to had put into his hands a statement of the population and property of the counties and boroughs. What did they think would be his opinion of the bases upon which they stand? There were in the boroughs a population of 8,638,000—electors 489,000, and houses 1,445,000—represented by 334 Members. In the counties there was a population of 11,427,000—electors 540,000; houses, 2,290,000—represented by 161 Members. Surely such a statement would surprise the foreigner. It was proposed in the Government Bill to meet the question of re-distribution by taking away what was termed the superfluous representation of some of the boroughs. It had been considered and decided that the key to the solution of the whole question lay in the borough franchise; and it was more especially with reference to its operation in small boroughs that he wished to direct the attention of the House. When a Conservative Government brought forward a Reform Bill based on household suffrage, it was natural for those who belonged to that party to inquire what it meant. He had not much difficulty in ascertaining what would be the effect of household suffrage pure and simple in the boroughs, and having verified a statement which appeared in The Economist, he would read it to the House—

“ In 40 of the smallest boroughs, between 6,000 and 7,000 population, it would double the constituency; in 13 a vote under £5 would outvote all the present constituency; in 42 boroughs, with a population between 7,000 and 12,000, there were only five in which household suffrage would not more than treble the present constituency. In 22 a franchise under £5 would completely outvote the present constituency, and in 82 small boroughs, under 12,000 population, with 133 Members, there were 20 in which household suffrage would more than double the present electors; in 71, with 113 Members, it would double the present electors; and in 35 of these the electors under £5 would control the elections.”

To those who advocated Conservative principles these were startling figures; because the question arose, What was there between them and household suffrage pure and simple. In the first place, dual voting was proposed; but, after what had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, they need not discuss it; and he, for one, did not believe that it could be carried into a law. With regard to the payment of rates, he must confess that it would have been more appropriately described as a clause “ for the payment of rates by candidates,” because he believed it was impossible to prevent bribery by penal enactments. The personal payment of rates would, he believed, though he should be glad to find he was mistaken, enable the candidate first in the field to secure a majority; and the consequence was that between hon. Members and household suffrage there was nothing but the provision which required a two years’ residence—a provision which introduced inequalities between one class and another, and would therefore be a stimulus to agitation. He did not, indeed, believe that such a provision could remain for any length of time. If it was desirable that they should have household suffrage accompanied with checks, he would much rather the Government had gone boldly into the question, and if it was necessary to introduce a variety of qualifications, why had they not gone back to what existed before 1832? He did not wish to resuscitate the old franchises, or to disfranchise any; but if the Government had introduced into large towns a household franchise, and a higher franchise into smaller boroughs, he thought that every one would have been satisfied. It was impossible to imagine two classes more distinct than the skilled artisans and the nondescript population of the smaller boroughs. There was great political earnestness in large towns where the artisans resided, and when they thought they had grasped a truth they were almost fanatical in the way in which they enforced it. They asked for Permissive Bills. They were not content with refraining from drink themselves; but they wished to prevent their non-abstaining neighbours from drinking a glass of ale. And, with regard to the sanctity of the Sabbath, they went so far as to seek to close public-houses, even against travellers. If the franchise were reduced in the small towns, the effect would be to increase the power of landlords over the electors. The defence of the smaller boroughs made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that a certain number of cheap constituencies were wanted to give opportunities to men of moderate fortune. That they thus added to the variety of the representation in that House, and introduced men of experience from India, the colonies, and the professions to take part in their deliberations, much to the advantage of the nation. But if the smaller boroughs were to be reduced to the condition he had described, they would cease to discharge their peculiar functions in this respect. All their peculiar faults would be aggravated; they would become the helots of the Constitution, and would be pointed to as examples of everything which a borough ought not to be. He earnestly hoped to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer some explanation as to the nature of the checks by which he meant to stand. He (Mr. Yorke) was not in favour of household suffrage pure and simple; but with efficient and lasting checks and counterpoises, from whatever source they came, he would give his support to this Bill. If, however, those checks were in their nature artificial, and of a character not likely to be lasting, then, much as he would regret acting in opposition to his party, with whom on most subjects he sympathized, with deep regret he should feel it to be his duty to oppose the Bill.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that on one point he was able to agree with the right hon. President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), who had stated that this Bill did not propose to introduce household suffrage “ pure and simple.” It certainly did not. The household suffrage introduced by it would be complex and corrupt—that is to say, encumbered with intricate conditions necessarily tending to corruption. But there his agreement with the right hon. Gentleman ended. That Gentleman had declared it to be most inconsistent on the part of the opponents of the Bill that some of them called it narrow, and others revolutionary. But the inconsistency was in the Bill itself, which would be revolutionary in some parishes and narrow in others. Of the large field of discussion opened by the Bill he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) only desired to consider two points. Was this measure likely to settle the question of Reform? What would be its effect as to bribery? The idea that it would settle the question because, after giving household suffrage, nothing more could be asked, was utterly erroneous. That nothing more could be asked, could only be true if Parliament went beyond the Reform League; for manhood residential suffrage would still leave open the claims of those who had not resided long enough to be registered. The right mode of settling the question was not to give all that could be asked, but to give what was reasonable, trusting to the good sense of the country to support you in refusing to concede more. Then it was suggested that you were more likely to settle the question by adopting principles than figures; and that the Bill of last year did, and this Bill did not, leave room for further agitation, because there the borough franchise rested on a figure, the £7 rental value, whilst here it rested on a principle. But did the borough franchise in this Bill avoid figures? On the contrary, it would be found that its framers, in trying to avoid the one important figure of last year's franchise, had introduced several figures, and that those were figures likely to give rise to an enormous amount of future discussion. First, there was the requirement, in the second paragraph of the 3rd clause, of a residence of two years, or two years and seven months, it was not clear which. This was a figure, and one which, if adopted, would be sure to open the door to subsequent agitation. While the 40th clause left the £10 rental householder capable of ripening for the franchise in twelve months, this 3rd clause would create an inferior class of voters, who would want twice the time, or more, to come to maturity. Now, those who occupied houses at £9 and under would immediately say it was not fair that because they had occupied their houses a year and a half only they should be excluded from the franchise; nor would the assurance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that they were shut out because they were "migratory paupers," tend much to console them, especially when they saw the £10 householder, who had been resident a shorter time than themselves, admitted. Then what was to be said of the 3rd paragraph of Clause 2? Although it did not mention a figure, it referred to the Small Tenements Act which did; and, in fact, this paragraph, so far as it was not modified by the 34th clause, introduced into every parish, in every borough, where no Local Rating Act was in force, household franchise, or a £6 0s. 1d. franchise, according as the vestry of the parish had decided, or might decide. Where the Rating Act of the 59 Geo. III., or Local Rating Acts, were in force, other figures would be introduced instead of the £6 0s. 1d. So we found that this Bill, which was to avoid any figure, had already introduced, instead of the one figure of last year, more figures than it was easy to count. But the matter did not stop there. The Government, frightened even by the shadow of household suffrage which they offered by their Bill, proposed, for the purpose of balancing it, more figures still in the shape of franchises of £50 in the funds, or in a savings bank. Nothing could be more certain to cause discontent than to talk of household franchise being your principle, and then to introduce as new voters only a small fraction of the occupiers who would be introduced by real household suffrage. As to the 34th clause enabling compound-householders to get upon the register by paying the rates, it would have very little effect except as an engine of bribery. It was vain to expect that the poor householder would incur the trouble and expense of claiming to be registered, and of paying the rates, taking the chance of getting, in some cases three-fourths, and in some only half, repaid by the landlord. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had called the £5 franchise a Serbonian bog; but he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) thought it a macadamised road compared with the Bill before them, which made the Act of Parliament subservient to the will of a vestry, and which was founded on the system of giving by one clause and taking away by another, of keeping the word of promise to the ear, and breaking it to the hope—a system acted on to a considerable extent in the Bill of 1859, but brought to a hitherto unequalled perfection in the present measure. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) thought he had now established that this Bill, which was said to be founded on a principle, and not on a figure, and therefore to afford reasonable hope of a permanent settlement, had in it much more of figures than of principle, and was sure to be a mere starting point for fresh discontent and renewed agitation.

Before passing to the subject of bribery, he would remark that if the second paragraph of the 3rd section of the Bill, which required as a qualification for a borough voter, that he should be on the last day of July in any year, and should have been during the whole of the preceding two years, an inhabitant occupier, was to be retained at all, the Government should clear up the doubt to which he had already referred. Were the two years to count from that 31st of July, or from the 1st of January preceding? And now a few words as to bribery. The 34th section would, he contended, make bribery not only easy, but almost necessary; the election agents would surely manufacture voters by paying their rates. The 6th clause, conferring the franchise on direct taxpayers, would have the same effect; a man would be able to make all his servants voters with a very trifling expenditure. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) approved of the provisions proposed by Government to be embodied in another Bill for preventing bribery. An early inquiry on the spot would, it could hardly be doubted, facilitate the detection of corrupt practices. And as to the proposal for allowing a candidate proving bribery and not having it proved against him, to take the seat, it must necessarily be satisfactory to him (Sir Francis Goldsmid), as he had himself had the honour to propose it in 1860 and 1863. He believed the more in the sincere desire of the Government to prevent bribery, because they did not now, as the same Gentlemen when out of office did last year, insist on strangling both the Bill for this purpose and that for Reform by tying them together by the neck. But the provisions of their Reform Bill would more than neutralize any possible benefit of their Bribery Bill. It was perfectly vain, if you passed clauses creating a gigantic machinery of corruption, like the 6th and 34th clauses of the measure under consideration, to pass at the same time another Bill threatening with punishment the bribery your own legislation had elaborately produced. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) said that if the leading principles of the Bill were impugned, a division ought to be taken on the second reading. But he surely ought not to argue thus, when the very ground of complaint alleged by the other side against this side of the House had for many years been that they had in 1859 divided against the second reading of the Bill of that year. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) would, on the grounds he had mentioned, and by reason of the objectionable nature of the Bill in other respects, have been glad if a division had been taken on the second reading; but as it appeared that this was not to be the case, he could only hope against hope that when in Committee they would succeed in bringing sense, utility, and consistency into a measure which at present appeared to him to be one mass of incongruities and mischievous absurdities.

MR. R. J. H. HARVEY said, he had, as an independent Member, called upon the Opposition last year to vote in favour of the Reform Bill, and he now called upon the present Opposition to vote in favour of this Bill in order that the question might be settled. He could not forget that last year the Ministry had resigned on the question of rating or rental. He had given the point his consideration, and had come to the conclusion that rating was the right principle to proceed on. As an independent Member he had to remind the House that it had been declared that Reform was not to be a party question. He had risen chiefly to notice what the right hon. Member for South Lancashire had stated the other night in regard to the borough which he represented. The right hon. Gentleman had said that Thetford was not a borough at all, but rather a cluster of villages—the mere rustics of the country. The fact was that Thetford was one of the oldest boroughs in the kingdom, and had anciently been the capital of East Anglia—the residence of kings. It was a mistake to say that its constituency would be peasants, for there was no cultivated country about the borough. Hares and rabbits frequented a large plain surrounding it. There were several large manufactories in the borough in which a great deal of skilled labour was employed, and the workmen paid their rates—the very class the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire thought it so desirable to enfranchise. Under the present Bill they would get votes. There was a very large iron foundry and iron manufactory which sent forth engines to most parts of the world. There was a paper manufactory, and also, perhaps, one of the largest manufactories of artificial manure in the country. Under the Bill of the late Government the increase in the number of voters in Thetford would not have exceeded fifty, but under the present Bill the increase would be nearer 350. It was well known that for many years the borough of Thetford had been to a great extent a nomination borough, and although it had sent Members to Parliament who had been a high honour to the House, they had chiefly been members of two large and influential houses in the district. So far as Thetford was concerned, therefore, the Bill of the Government was entirely consonant with his feelings, as it would emancipate its voters, and make their Member a true representative. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the people of Thetford were the mere peasantry of the country; but, for his own part, he had always felt that the peasantry of the country ought to be represented; and the great defect of former Reform Bills had been that they neglected a class of people who were a great honour to England, and who were hard-working, conscientious, and religious. It was an unfair slur on the peasantry of the country to say that they ought not to be represented. Such as the Bill was, he should have great pleasure in voting for the second reading of it.

VISCOUNT AMBERLEY: I should not venture to rise upon this occasion if it were not in the hope that I should occupy the time of the House for a very few minutes; and I think I may say without presumption, or without disrespect to the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, that I shall treat this question upon somewhat broader grounds than he has done. I am far from wishing to dispute with him whether or not the Members for Thetford have been ornaments to this House; but I wish to make a few remarks upon the Bill before us. Whatever opinions may be entertained with regard to this Bill, I think there is one fact which must be a source of great satisfaction to all those who supported the measure of the late Government, and that is, the change of opinions and tone which has taken place upon this question between the last Session and the present. I am not in the least taunting Her Majesty's Government with any inconsistency on the subject; but I think I shall be borne out in saying that those who sit on the opposite side of the House, taking them generally, speak in a very different manner from what they did a year ago. Although this is a subject of great satisfaction, I must confess that that satisfaction is somewhat diminished by the nature of the measure which the Government have introduced. Without in the least wishing to deny to them that moderation which they have claimed, I must say that the mutual concessions and co-operation which they have asked for, and which the President of the Poor Law Board has asked for again to-night, are rendered more difficult by the nature of this Bill. Her Majesty's Government, considering the subject during the comparative calmness of the recess, arrived at the conviction that on this question party spirit was a very inconvenient and troublesome element. I am not going to dispute that point with them; indeed, I am inclined to agree with the conclusion at which they have arrived, though I might wish, if I were to wish anything, that they had made the discovery a year ago. But while I fully admit that it is our duty to treat with moderation and candour any measures which they may think proper to introduce, I must at the same time insist that there is a point at which such moderation should cease, because it would amount to a betrayal of our public duty. We as a party have a particular, and I may say a definite policy on this subject. There are objects at which we have long been aiming, and which, to a certain extent, have been resisted by those who sit on the opposite side of the House. Having these objects and this policy, while up to the present time they have had at least no definite or intelligible policy, it is absolutely necessary that if there is to be concession, it must come from them, and not from us. We could not make concessions—at least, we could not make certain concessions—without giving up those objects for which we have contended. I do not know how far the Government may be inclined to go in concession; but to me, and I believe to many others, it would be a subject of great and sincere rejoicing if they were able to unite with us in carrying a sound, satisfactory, and large measure of Reform. Looking at this Bill, I find that it is a Bill of considerable pretension, because it professes to differ from all other Bills in the circumstance that the franchise it proposes to establish is founded upon a principle. As this principle has been considerably insisted upon, I wish to examine, for a few moments, what it is. I think I shall not be misrepresenting the Bill if I say that the principle upon which the borough franchise is attempted to be settled by it is twofold. In the first place, the Bill provides that the suffrage shall depend upon personal ratepaying, and that it shall cease when personal ratepaying ceases; and in the second, that the compound-householder shall be able to claim the suffrage when he becomes a personal ratepayer. When we are basing the suffrage upon a principle it appears to me that we ought to fix it at some point where there is a natural difference, and not where there are arbitrary and conventional differences between those who are above the line, and those who are below it. Now, I cannot see that this condition is very satisfactorily fulfilled in this measure. I do not see what is the difference between the personal ratepayer and the compound-householder—and it ought to be a very considerable difference—which makes it proper that the personal ratepayer shall vote and the compound-householder shall not. You cannot say that the compound-householder does not pay rates, because he does pay rates; but he pays them in a different shape—he pays them in the shape of rent to his landlord. Yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that the compound-householder was not a proper person to vote in his character of compound-householder. I confess I was not able to gather from him what were the precise reasons which justified that conclusion.

I pass from this point to that which has been so much commented upon by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone)—the case of the compound-householder who would be subjected, in claiming the franchise, to a larger rate than he paid when he compounded with his landlord. And either the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) misunderstood what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) said, or I entirely failed to understand him; because it appeared to me that he did not succeed in answering my right hon. Friend's objections. What I understood him to say was that a compound-householder claiming to become a ratepayer under this Bill would be able to deduct the amount of his rates from the rent which he pays to his landlord. But taking into consideration the increase of 25 per cent or 50 per cent which the compound-householder would be called upon to pay, I want to know what is the source from which that payment would come? I do not think the President of the Poor Law Board intends to say that it is to be deducted from the rent; because in that case you would impose upon the landlord the fine which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) supposed would be laid on the householder—that would merely be shifting the burden from one person to another, and not in the least removing the objection which was brought against this provision of the Bill. I think the provision is the more strange and suspicious, because in 1851 a statute was passed by which it was enacted that a compound-householder claiming to vote and claiming to pay his rates for the purpose of voting, where the composition was less than the whole amount of the rate, should not pay more than the amount payable under such composition. If I understand the meaning of that Act of Parliament of 1851, it acknowledges the principle that a compound-householder claiming to be placed on the electoral list should not be liable to an increased payment for claiming that privilege; whereas this Bill refers to the existing Act of Parliament, and it adds a provision that the ratepayer shall pay the full rateable value of the premises. Now, I venture to think that this clause might have been more clearly drawn. It refers to existing Acts of Parliament as if they were to apply, and yet at the end it states that the amount of rates to be paid is the full amount calculated on the full rateable value of the premises. Well then, Sir, we are told that the compound-householder who objects to this large increase of payment in order to obtain a vote must be supposed to be utterly indifferent to politics, and to care nothing about taking part in elections. It appears to me, however, that this is a principle that neither the Government nor any one else would venture to apply to the other classes of society. They say that the compound-householder who does not like to take all this trouble to obtain a vote is totally indifferent to it, and ought not to exercise the franchise; but would they apply this principle to manufacturers, merchants, or clergymen? Would they ask them to take all the trouble they are imposing upon the compound-householder?

Viscount Amberley

I am quite sure that no Government would come to this House with such a proposal; and I am certain that the patriotism which they expect to find in the compound-householder they would not expect to find, or seek to find, in those of a superior station in life. Then it has been objected, and very naturally objected, that the provisions relating to compound-householders would tend to corruption. It is true that there is a clause which provides that the corrupt payment of rates shall be punishable as bribery. But what is the punishment of bribery? We know that, practically, bribery goes totally and entirely unpunished. There may be laws against it, but it is an offence which always escapes with impunity. Therefore I say that this clause is perfectly futile, and is only inserted to save appearances. The borough franchise professes to be established on some principle; but passing on to the county franchise, I am at a loss to know what principle is to be found in the sum of £15. It is in direct contravention of what was established by this House last year, and appears to differ in nothing from those vulgar and commonplace Bills which have been introduced before. It appears to me that we should endeavour to avoid what was done in former Bills—namely, attempting to draw any arbitrary line where no natural line exists. I will not enter into any details respecting the dual vote; but there is one principle of the Bill which has not yet been noticed, but which appears to me to be of considerable importance. I allude to the 37th clause, in which it is provided that those who pass from one Ministerial office to another shall not vacate their seats in consequence. I make no objection to this clause, which I believe was copied from the Act of 1852; but I think it a fair subject for consideration whether there is any substantial reason for requiring that those who accept offices under the Crown should vacate their seats. Circumstances have changed since the Act of Anne was passed rendering such vacation compulsory; and at that time it was an open question whether Ministers should have any seat in the House at all. Now, it is held that they should; and therefore I cannot see any reason why we should continue to require the vacation of seats under circumstances which often create very great inconvenience. There is one point which is, in my opinion, of quite as much importance as the provisions of the Bill, and that is the spirit and temper in which it is introduced. If in the very act of enfranchising some portion of the labouring classes, we show ourselves afraid of the power we are about to give; if in extending to them electoral rights we show that we are jealous and distrustful, and anxious to take precautions against them, then I think that whatever legislation can effect in their favour, such a course will be futile, irritating, and vexatious. It is easy to say that this is a country of classes, and must remain so. There may be distinctions of feeling between its different classes; but I cannot look upon this as a sufficient reason for introducing legislation of an aggravating character, and maintaining injurious distinctions. We should endeavour to modify rather than aggravate such a state of things. It seems to me that if we wish to legislate successfully on this question, we must get rid altogether of the spirit of class. I cannot but believe that many of us are actuated by unnecessary fears, whilst I scarcely know what we are afraid of. If these new voters whom we are about to admit to the franchise were really possessed of revolutionary motives and were anxious to upset the Constitution of the country, is it to be supposed that they would have waited so patiently as they do now? Depend upon it they would show their anxiety for change in some more marked manner. As they do not, I am surprised to see evidences of jealousy in those devices for fencing in the privileged classes with checks and precautions of every kind. I wish that in legislating on this subject we could forget that we belong to this or that portion of the community, and remember only that we are all members of one common nation.

MR. BANKS STANHOPE said, there were many details in the Bill which could be best considered in Committee; and he would therefore confine his observations upon that occasion to its main provisions. He confessed that after the reception which the duality part of the Bill had experienced, he should not be surprised if it were not proceeded with; but he believed that all the hard words which had been used against that principle were without foundation. If hon. Members examined the basis of our parochial legislature ever since 1818 they would find that the principle of a plurality of votes had been recognised over and over again, and that it was embodied in even so recent a measure as the Local Government Act. With respect to the sum at which the county franchise was fixed, as he had said last year, he lived in an agricultural county, where it was a matter of indifference to him at what sum it might be fixed. But there were counties in which the character of the representation would be completely altered if the amount were brought too low. He was aware, however, that they could only deal successfully with that question of Parliamentary Reform by approaching it in a spirit of moderation and of mutual concession, and he was prepared to accept as a compromise the measure proposed by Her Majesty's Government. He entirely approved of the "fancy franchises," as set forth in the Bill. He believed that the education franchise would admit to the suffrage a number of persons to whom it was specially desirable that it should be extended. He also thought that the man who owned £50 in the funds or in a savings bank was fairly entitled to the same privilege; and with respect to direct taxation as an electoral qualification, he trusted that in that manner they would be enabled to take effectual precautions against fraud; while he felt persuaded that the contributors to the income tax in particular ought to be allowed a voice in returning Members to that House. He was willing to accept the Bill of the Government as a compromise; he was in favour of its principle. In the first place, Parliament had been trying to deal with the Reform question for the last fifteen years; and he remembered being told by an old politician that the time would arrive when that tampering with it would land them into this dilemma—namely, that it might be dangerous to deal with Reform, and it might be dangerous not to deal with it. They were at present in that dilemma. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) had proved to his satisfaction last year all the dangers involved in any deviation from the £10 franchise; but the right hon. Gentleman had not been able to persuade him that it was safe to keep to that franchise, and refuse to depart from the settlement of 1832. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne declared in one of his speeches that the moment the limit established by the Bill of 1832 was abandoned they were standing on the side of a hill, on which they sought in vain for any sure standing ground. The simile was perfectly true, with this addition, that if any hon. Member thought they had found a temporary resting place, Members of the Opposition would at once do their best to deprive them of it. A small ledge or temporary platform might have been afforded by the £6 rating; but what reception had that proposal met with? Recollect that supporters of the Government, being in a minority, could only convert their numbers into a majority by obtaining the assistance of hon. Members opposite; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, though he might have welcomed the proposal of a £6 rating, only did so as a peg on which to hang a string of Amendments. Had the Government persevered with that proposal he felt certain that an attempt would have been made to force down their throats a measure similar to that brought forward by the late Government. Lord Derby would have been told that his mouth was to enunciate, and his hands were to pass, the very measure which he and his party chose in the previous Session to reject. A feeling prevailed both in and out of the House that such a course was not one for an able Minister or a great party to assent to. The Conservative party could not, and would not, accept proposals of which they disapproved, dictated by the party opposite. Therefore, when it became clear that the remainder of the House were not disposed to give any assistance to carry a £6 rating franchise, the Conservative party were obliged to try another stand point. Suppose they had proposed a £5 rating, hon. Gentlemen opposite would at once have cut away the ground from beneath their feet by proposing a £4 franchise. It was most difficult to support by argument the adoption of any sharp line of demarcation. He found, for instance, that in small towns a man rated at £4 owned a better house, occupied a better position, and was in every respect a more solvent and respectable person than a man living in a £5 house in larger towns. The operation of the Small Tenements Acts again would be to exclude, or to include, whole classes of residents, according to the limit imposed for the franchise. The important question then presented itself—going at once to the bottom of the hill, would it be possible to gain any security, to establish any principle according to which, by a process of self-elimination, better men in the different constituencies might rise to the surface, and inferior men sink to the bottom?

Having thought the question out for himself, as far as his capacity enabled him, he believed that the proposals contained in the Bill did contain principles, and did afford securities worthy of adoption. The residence of two years insured stability in the voter and excluded the wandering classes; while, if persons evaded the responsibility of paying their rates, he did not see why the State need go out of its way to give them a vote. Upon these principles and these securities he, as a strong Conservative, pledged his faith. He contended that in taking this view he was acting strictly upon Conservative and not upon Radical principles; and if the measure had been Radical, it would have met with more support from the other side of the House. The principle and security of which he had spoken were essential points of the Bill. And whatever the fate of the Government might be, he declared that if the principles of continuous residence and personal and full payment of taxes were weakened or impaired, he should feel it his duty to take every opportunity in his power to prevent the Bill from proceeding further. He believed that if these principles were insisted on and established the common sense of the people would make the arrangement now contemplated the basis of an electoral system for the present generation, possibly for a generation to come. No rating clauses were included in the last Reform Bill; but the common sense of the people had come round to that view. If a system of corruption might be introduced from the payment of rates, it did not belong to this measure any more than to any other. One matter would be the rating qualification. As was said the other day by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, it was a question involving not only the honour of the House, but the good name of England, that they should keep the representative system tolerably free from bribery and corruption; and, though he did not believe they would ever be able thoroughly to stop individual cases of bribery, yet they might do much to reduce the evil as it at present existed. The act in which the House was now engaged was of the most solemn character. It was rebuilding the whole Parliamentary edifice. Men might differ as to the style of the architecture and the ground on which the building should be erected. In his opinion, however, the architect, whoever he might be, would not find his materials so good as might be desired.

He would now very briefly allude to some of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. And first, with respect to the compound-householders—or rather the householders under the Small Tenements Act. The landlord paid the rates according to the rule of the town which had adopted the provisions of that statute, and the tenant paid such an amount as the landlord pleased to take. The right hon. Gentleman had asked whether under this Bill it was intended that the tenant should pay his landlord's as well as his own rates. To that he would reply in the negative. Nor was it provided that the tenant, under the Small Tenements Act, should pay a fine for his vote. He would only be required to pay his rates just the same as anyone who was not affected by that Act. The fact was that the tenant really paid his own rates. He (Mr. Banks Stanhope) did not mean that the tenant should pay his landlord's rates as well; but that if the rates were 30s. a year, and they were paid by the tenant, he took the receipt of the overseer and legally claimed 15s. or 20s. from the landlord. That was the only way in which the tenant paid two sets of rates. He asked the right hon. Gentleman why, because a man lived in a house under £6, he should be placed in a better position than a man who lived in a £7 house? And why, he would ask, should a positive premium be given to the man who did not pay his rates? It was argued that a compounder whose landlord paid his rates had as much right as a ratepayer to have a vote. That, however, was not his opinion; because a man who paid his rates in full naturally took some interest in parochial matters, and had an interest in keeping down the rates, which was not the case with the compound-householder, who left it with the landlord to take its chance whether the rate rose or fell. The right hon. Gentleman had objected that the Small Tenements Act was not universal or compulsory; but the answer to that was that it might be made both universal and compulsory. ["Divide!"] He was aware that he had trespassed a little too much on the patience of the House; but there were particular times and crises when personal opinion became a matter of personal character. He was a strong Conservative by birth, education, and feeling, and he asserted that in maintaining the two principles to which he had referred, he was keeping his character as a Conservative. He trusted that the House would believe that the independent Members on that side had honestly endeavoured to grapple with the difficulties of the question. They had taken what they regarded as the best course, and had adopted principles which in their judgment would be a barrier against democracy. They did not underrate in any way the magnitude of the step they had taken; but, at the same time, they were firmly of opinion that it would lead to a beneficial result.

MR. ROEBUCK: I rise, Sir, to support the second reading of this Bill. I wish there should be no mistake as far as I am concerned. I desire to state why it is that I wish for any Reform, why it is that I support this measure of Reform, and why it is that I expect it may be made beneficial. Before I say distinctly why it is that I support any Reform, I will state two things, one of which I do not hope to effect, and the other of which I do not desire to effect. That which I do not hope to effect is to better the character of this House. I believe, Sir, that this House, since it has been reformed—that is, since the year 1832—has produced a body of legislation such as the history of the world cannot supply. Since this House was reformed a series of Acts have been passed creating greater changes in a shorter time, safely, quietly, and for the benefit of the community, than any recorded in the page of history.

It may be said that I have all my life been in Opposition, and it may be asked how it is that I have come to such a conclusion. When I entered this House I was very young. I was very sanguine and very impatient. I am now old, and having lived a life of very wide experience, and having witnessed many remarkable events, I hope I have learnt something by it. The conclusion to which I have come is that the House of Commons, with its tentative process, and caution, and care, and prudence, has been much wiser than I was when I was young, sanguine, and impatient. I do not say that the combating of minds and of different opinions in this House is not productive of great benefit. I want the timid to meet the bold, the hasty to meet the slow, and the courageous to meet the diffident. That, Sir, has been my part in this House. I believe that the fact of urging on others who would not have gone so fast had it not been for the clash of opinions, has wrought out benefits, which one side of the House would not of itself have conferred. Therefore it is I cannot hope that this House will, as far as regards the country, improve its character, or increase its wisdom by Reform. The other remark I wish to make, in order to guard myself in what I shall presently say, is this—that I am not one of those who seek Reform to carry out what is called the natural rights of mankind. I know that “natural right” is a favourite phrase with some. We are told men have a right to the suffrage. I deny the principle. Right is a creature of law. Where the law has not produced it it does not exist. If it be said the man has a right to it, that is merely giving the thing as a reason for itself. It is no argument. Therefore, though great men have talked about rights, and about natural rights, and on two remarkable occasions they have been made use of to no very good purpose, I dismiss them without further remark.

Now comes the question why I seek Reform. Sir, in the administration of justice it is not enough that the tribunal should render equal and impartial justice. Justice is not justice unless it is thought to be justice. No tribunal that does not satisfy the people is a tribunal that ought to remain. I believe that this House, though it has been more wise than any other House of Commons or any other legislative body ever was in the same time, does not satisfy the people. There are large bodies of our countrymen who are not represented in this House. Their opinion is that they ought to be. They will not be satisfied till they are. Therefore, Sir, as a prudent man, thinking that a very large number of these are in a state of mind which well fits them to be represented, I am desirous that they should be. But, Sir, would I therefore have the whole artizan or labouring class represented? Not at all. I think that of that artizan or labouring class, there is a portion who, as to character, probity, intelligence, sagacity, and every other point that distinguishes men, are quite equal to any other portion of the community. I would as soon put my faith in these men as in any whom I see around me. I say that to bring the opinions and the feelings of these men into this House is a thing we ought to do; and which we can do without danger. But there is another portion of that body who are not educated, who are vicious, who are unfit to have in their hands the government of mankind. I should fear to intrust to them the destinies of this great country. Therefore, Sir, I make a distinction. I say, "We will adopt some means by which, in addition to those who are already represented, we shall admit to this House the representatives of that section of the working class who desire and deserve to be represented." That is a clear, definite purpose. I want to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) whether he agrees in that purpose. Is that his aim? Does he want anything more. Anything more than that class shall be represented who, in short phrase, ought to be represented? If he does not desire anything more, will he point out his means for admitting them and keeping out the others? I want to keep out the others. I state it boldly. I do not wish to mince the matter. I say there is a very large class I desire to keep out, and a very large class I desire to let in. Sir, how can we do this? The Chancellor of the Exchequer has proposed a means. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire last year brought in a Bill proposing a £7 rental franchise. That failed. There is one sentiment which I fear does not extensively prevail in this reformed House, and that is the desire to see itself reformed. I do not believe that the majority of this House wish to see that. They feel that they have done their duty, and done it well. I can understand readily why they should not believe that the composition of this House would be improved by alteration. That is the state of mind of the large majority. I do not say that all will act upon it. There are influences out of doors which operate. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite has proposed a plan, and what is it? He says that many attempts have been made taking the rental of houses as a basis. All have failed. Then he comes in with one bold measure. He says, "I will admit every man who is an inhabitant householder in a Parliamentary borough, with these provisos. He shall have lived in that borough for two years, and he shall be rated to those rates which are levied upon that house." I want to know whether that is not a wise proposal? I do not mean to say that I entirely agree with the mode recommended by the right hon. Gentleman. I have placed an Amendment on the Votes showing what I mean as to that. But why those provisos? Now comes the object I have stated. I want to admit the worthy portion of the artisan class. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire says you ought to make no distinction. I can not help making a distinction unless I go to manhood suffrage. Even then I make a distinction according to my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill). He says you ought to admit the women. Then, what is the mode we should adopt? "Oh!" says the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) "you ought to consider a man's worth, his intelligence, his virtue." So, Sir, I do. But I want some mark, some test of the worth, the intelligence, the virtue. I cannot go into the street and put my hand on a man's shoulder and say, I know him to be intelligent, virtuous, worthy. But I can do what has been done time out of mind by all mankind. I can judge of a man by how he lives. In that way I can tell when he is not a vagabond, when he has a stake in the country, and has lived a virtuous and quiet life. I say we judge that he leads a quiet and peaceable life by this. He lives in a society and has lived in it two years. He pays his way. He provides the rent for his house. We justly take these as signs that the man is worthy of the franchise that we are about to confer on him. I want to ask men of common sense, men of the world, whether that is not a wise test? There is no use in mincing the matter, or in going into those minute, pettifogging questions we have heard discussed to-night. Let us take a large and broad grasp of the subject. I want to know how we can admit the worthy and intelligent portion of the working class and keep out the others. That is the real question. It may be said this is not the whole Bill. Well, I have no objection to what are called "the fancy franchises." I do not see that they will do any good, nor that they will do any harm, and if hon. Gentlemen are pleased with their rattle let them have it.

As to the county franchise, I think it would have been wiser and safer for the right hon. Gentleman to have taken the vote of last year rather than a £15 rating. Then there is the re-distribution of seats. That goes on a distinct principle from that of the franchise. It relates to the mode in which the present constituency votes. I think I once heard a panegyric pronounced upon the small boroughs, and I am not at all sure that it was not a wise panegyric. I do not believe in a geometrical division of the country, and deriving your constituencies from it. What we want is the representation of a variety of interests. This we get better in the curious haphazard way in which everything is done under the English Constitution than we could if we were to divide the country into squares, worked upon the map. Therefore, I am not very anxious as to the disfranchisement of towns. I do not want to increase the numbers in this House; but I do want to give an enfranchisement to large bodies of our countrymen of the manufacturing towns. This scheme, then, is one which deserves consideration. Keeping clearly and steadily before our eyes the desire we have, or ought to have, to admit to the suffrage that portion of the working class who are worthy, and to whom it may be confided safely; desiring also to shut out the unworthy, and those to whom it could not be confided without danger, I ask whether anything could be more simple than the mode proposed? Every householder who lives in a Parliamentary borough, who pays his rates, and who has lived there two years, is to have this right. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) has told us that you are putting a "fine" upon the voter who lives in a house under £10 renting; but I want to know what that is. Why do compound-householders exist? For the benefit of the State. In order that the landlord may have a quid pro quo for taking upon himself the duty of paying the rate, the rate is made less to him. But when a man, instead of having his rates paid by his landlord, becomes part of the State and enjoys the right of voting, is he to turn round and say he wishes to be in the position which he occupied before he possessed that privilege. No! We tell him, "Now you are a voter you must do as other voters do." That is but plain common sense, and the invidious word "fine" is, I think, not worthy of the right hon. Gentleman. There is no "fine" in the case. A man is simply called upon to bear his fair share of the burdens of the State. I hope that the Government will not shrink in this matter. The virtue, the intelligence, and the sagacity of the country are anxiously looking for the settlement of this question. Every hour we dally over it increases the danger by which it is surrounded. I beg right hon. Gentlemen opposite to pluck up courage. Do not let them be frightened by the terrible anathemas they hear denounced against themselves or by pettifogging cavilling cant. Let them do their duty. Let them, as my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) said, act as men of sense. When the subject is well thrashed out, as it will be, let them, not stick to their preconceived notions because they are preconceived, but let them, with large hearts and willing spirits, yield where truth, knowledge and intelligence teach them to yield, not fearing the taunt that their conduct is inconsistent.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that since he had had the honour of a seat in the House he had given constant support to the Government. He trusted that he might be permitted to say a few words in explanation of the reasons which unfortunately at the present time compelled him to entertain fears as to the measure which they were now asked to read a second time. Even if the question upon which he found himself unhappily at variance with those with whom he had hitherto acted, were one in which he took only an ordinary interest, he should be in a situation of no little embarrassment. But when it was to be added that he never was more earnest than he was to see an early and Liberal settlement of the Reform question, his embarrassment was increased tenfold. The basis of the present measure was what some called household suffrage; but what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) denominated rating suffrage. He would not enter into this difference. But he would say that no great party in that House or in the country would like to see a settlement of the Reform question on a basis of pure and simple household suffrage. Therefore, the desirableness of the measure depended upon whether there were sufficient safeguards by means of which it could be made a safe one. Among the foremost of these was the duality of voting. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) held out threats of directing some special Resolutions against this particular check. He (Mr. J. Lowther) thought from what had fallen from both sides of the House that this would be much like hanging a skeleton in chains, for the duality of voting was dead already. Some objected that duality of voting was founded upon a wrong principle, others that there was great risk of it not being accepted by the House, and others that it would not last. His objections to it were antecedent to all these, for he believed that, if passed, it would be found wholly inadequate to secure the object for which it was introduced—namely, to maintain a fair balance of power between the various classes of the community. Then as to the safeguard of the personal payment of rates, it had been said very aptly that evening that this might well be denominated payment of rates by candidates. He (Mr. J. Lowther) was much disposed to agree that it would be almost impossible to frame any clause in the Bribery Bill to prevent the corrupt payment of rates by the agents of candidates. As to resident and fancy franchises, although he considered them good as far as they went, yet he believed that the whole of these things, if taken collectively, would be found insufficient for the purpose for which they were introduced. He feared this measure in its present shape, and still more after the introduction of a compound householder franchise, would be found to be not a Conservative measure, and that it would end in giving undue preponderance to one class. He trusted that he would not be considered as having any hostility towards the working classes, for he should equally object to any measure by which it was proposed to confer Supreme power upon any one class in the State. Without wishing to cast any reflection upon hon. Members who could conscientiously support this Bill, he himself felt that he would not be performing his duty to those who sent him there if he were to support a measure which he considered would have an effect which he was solemnly pledged to oppose. The ties of party were strong; but there were ties which were stronger still. Believing that the probable effect of this measure would be the utter annihilation of the Constitutional party, he should hold himself at liberty, when the moment should arrive, so to regulate his conduct as to entitle him to acquittal from the verdict which posterity would pass upon the party—that of selo de so.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Sir, my hon. Friend who has just addressed the House is undoubtedly wise in his generation. At the same time, I trust that by-and-by, when he finds that the view which is entertained by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) finds favour in the House, he will alter the opinions that he has expressed, and join the Government in doing what he can to support this measure. I can assure the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield that the Government are not intimidated by anything they have heard to-night or on previous occasions. They do not intend to shrink from the responsibility of passing this measure through Parliament. It has been said in tones of loud denunciation of the Bill that it is without principle and rests upon no basis. I ask leave to show that the principle of the Bill, so far as the borough franchise is concerned, is well defined. And I ask the House not to pronounce an opinion in accordance with a fanatical hostility exhibited against every clause, but if the principle of the Bill is correct to assist us in carrying it. When we hear that the Bill is without principle let me call attention to the fact that until the Reform Act passed, in 1832, a resident and rating franchise was the common franchise of the boroughs in England. The measure of 1832 was a disfranchising measure. ["Oh, oh!" from the Opposition.] I call it disfranchising, though of course it was also enfranchising, because it took away the right to vote from those who paid "scot and lot" which right they had previously exercised. Instead of these voters the Bill created others who held the franchise by virtue of the £10 house which they occupied, upon the condition that they paid the rates incident to that tenure. They recognised no inherent right in any man or in any woman to vote. It was a privilege conferred upon certain persons, which they must earn, not a right inherited from their birth. They could not exercise the franchise unless they had resided in the borough for which they claimed a vote a certain period, and had been rated to, and had paid, the assessed taxes.

It was in 1819 that, for the first time, an Act was passed which declared that the landlord should be rated instead of the tenant in certain cases. But when it passed, so tender was the Legislature in favour of those who had a right to vote by reason of their residence in a borough, that it was specially provided that the Act should not apply to cases when the right depended upon scot and lot. Therefore the Sturges Bourne's Act, as it was called, had no reference to this particular franchise. In 1832 the Reform Act passed. That measure enacted that any person who should occupy a House of the required rental within a borough should have the right to be rated. But he was required to make a claim to be rated to the relief of the poor in respect of the premises he occupied, whether the landlord was liable to be rated or not. Upon his making actual payment of such rates, or tendering the payment, he acquired the right to be upon the rates. If the overseer should refuse to put him upon the book he had the right to vote notwithstanding. It was also provided that the landlord was not thereby freed from his liability to pay the rates in case the tenant should make default of payment. Now, what was the effect of those provisions? In cases where by local Acts the landlord was liable to be rated instead of the tenant, the latter was still empowered to go to the overseer and demand to be rated. If the overseer should neglect or refuse to do so, he was still to have the vote; but, in case he made default in the payment of the rates, the landlord would continue liable for their payment. Since the passing of the Reform Act, then, is it or is it not the case that the whole of the persons were thus "fined," to use the expression of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone), for the exercise of the franchise? Is it not the case that from the year 1832 down to the present moment—at all events, for years after the passing of that Act—persons who asked to be rated, in cases where the landlords had previously compounded for the rates, have had to pay not the compounded but the full rate, and that there was no provision for their being recouped by the landlord at all? Therefore, what force is there in the argument of the right hon. Gentleman that the present Bill proposes to inflict this "fine," when, in point of fact, it has been imposed for years past? In order to make this clearer, I will refer to Sir William Clay's Act, passed in 1851. That Act recited the hardships which then existed on certain persons having to claim annually in order to get their names upon the register. Certain householders, desiring to exercise a vote, had been obliged to make what is called in the Act a "continual claim." From 1832 to 1851 they had been "fined," they had continued to pay the rate without the power of recoupment from the landlord. The Act of Sir William Clay, condemning this practice as "inconvenient" and "impracticable," enacted that persons who had once claimed to be rated in respect of premises they occupied were not to be required to renew their claim every year; but that their liability to pay the rates was to continue as long as they continued to occupy the premises or remained on the register. I am aware that there is a proviso in the Act of 1851, enacting that in cases where, by any composition with the landlord, a less sum shall be payable than the full amount of rate, the occupier claiming to be rated shall not be bound to pay or tender more than the amount payable under the composition. But I ask my hon. and learned Friends opposite to point to any provision in this Act by which the landlord was compelled to recoup the tenant for the rates he thus paid in order to exercise the franchise. No doubt this was unjust, and the Acts embodying the injustice ought to be repealed; but I ask, how is it that no hon. or learned Gentleman opposite has ever come forward with the proposal to repeal it, until the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) finds it convenient to make this grievance one of the reasons for picking the Bill of the Government to pieces? And for that purpose the right hon. Gentleman brings the point forward as if the present Government were about for the first time to introduce the grievance, or as if, on account of it, the Bill deserved to be rejected by the House. Under Sturges Bourne's Act the landlord was allowed to be rated at a much less sum than the occupier; because by reason of his paying the rate he incurred a certain amount of risk and liability which he would not have incurred otherwise. The recital of that Act shows what was the grievance which had to be remedied. The grievance which existed was that by reason of some occupiers not paying the rate the other occupiers had more to pay. If, however, a person occupies a tenement, the rates on which were paid by the landlord, and if, for his own convenience, and for the purpose of exercising the privilege of voting, he desires to be rated, what reason is there why he should only pay the same composition as the landlord, who had not the same advantage for the payment as the tenant? There was a reason for exempting the landlord in some degree; but there can be no reason why an occupier, who desires to exercise the franchise, should not pay the full amount of the rates to which the tenement he occupies is liable, just as other occupiers are obliged to do.

I maintain, then, that the present Bill is founded upon a principle, which was well explained by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he asked for leave to introduce the measure. It has been said, and we believe, that a great number of the people desire to exercise the franchise who are now excluded from it. We believe, also, that they will exercise it fairly, honestly, and intelligently. Therefore it is that the Government have, in the fulfilment of their duty, brought forward a measure in the hope of settling the question which has hitherto remained unsettled. They propose that every man, being a householder and residing in a borough, who desires to be rated, shall be rated; and when he is rated, or has paid his rates, or has shown that he is not a mere migratory nomad, but has resided for a certain time within the borough for which he claims, that he shall then be in a position to exercise the franchise. It cannot be the wish of any one that the man who is here to-day and gone to-morrow should have a vote. The Bill, therefore, wisely provides that a residence for a certain period shall be one of the requirements that must be fulfilled before the franchise is conferred. It also provides that the occupiers shall pay the impositions incident to the property he occupies. Is there anything unreasonable in this? It is an intelligible and well-founded principle. Then, if it be an intelligible and well-founded principle, we come to the next question—Can it be carried into effect by the provisions of this Bill? If there are provisions in this Bill which do not satisfy hon. Members that the principle can be carried out, then I ask them to devote as much time as they can to make it perfect for the purpose. But when I hear it said that the Bill as it stands, or as it will stand, can never by possibility carry that principle out, it appears to me that you mock the whole intelligence of the House of Commons, which, agreeing upon a principle, cannot find means to carry that principle out. I know it may be said there is a difficulty in carrying out that principle by reason of the Small Tenements Act. But those difficulties are much more imaginary than real. The Small Tenements Act which applies to this question is the Act which regards the rating of premises down to the limit of £10. Below that limit we have a class of cases between £10 and £6 which are not touched by any public Acts. When we get to £10 we have the Small Tenements Act, which was passed without reference to the franchise. The right hon. Gentleman says that if you pass this Bill you will place the tenant under the control of the vestries. I deny it. If you pass this Bill you can tell the tenants that they will have a right to be rated and to pay the rates, notwithstanding the Small

Tenements Act. They will have a right to do that which the £10 householders, by the 2<sup>d</sup> Will. IV., are entitled to do—namely, to go to the proper officer, and claim the franchise by paying the rate. Now, what has the overseer to do with that? He has nothing on earth to do with it. When I see this Bill so severely criticized, and hear it said that no proper provision is made to carry out this principle, let us turn to the enacting part of the Bill, and see whether this criticism is just. It says, "Every man"—by which I mean every male, not as the hon. Member (Mr. Stuart Mill) suggests it should be "every woman"—shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote for a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for a borough who is qualified as follows, that is to say:—First, is of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity. Second, is on the last day of July in any year, and has during the whole preceding two years, been an inhabitant, occupier, as owner or tenant, of any dwelling-house within the borough. Third, has during the term of such occupation been rated in respect of the premises so occupied by him within the borough to all rates (if any) made for the relief of the poor in respect of such premises; and fourth, has before the 20th day of July in the same year paid all poor rates that have become payable by him in respect of the said premises up to the preceding 5th day of January. Then I turn to the 34th clause, which tells such occupiers that they are precisely in the same position as the £10 householders who have possessed the franchise since 1832. We tell them that they may claim to be rated in the same manner and under the same conditions as the occupiers under the existing Act of Parliament. I maintain that this is a just and fair principle, notwithstanding Sir William Clay's Act which enacts that the occupier, in order to obtain the franchise, has only to pay the amount which the landlord heretofore paid under the composition. I say that this principle of the Bill is fairer than that of Sir William Clay's. Voters under the Reform Act were content to claim the franchise by paying the rates, though they were not recouped by their landlords. If the principle we contend for be right, we ask you to frame a clause in the most stringent way possible to carry it out. Frame it so as to prevent the danger of the exercise of any influence by the landlord; but do not tell me that when the unenfranchised classes come forward and say we want to possess the privilege of voting, they will not take the trouble which the £10 householders have been in the habit of taking to possess the franchise under the Act of 2 Will. IV. So far as the claim itself is concerned the occupier will not be required to make continual applications, as has been suggested. They will be placed precisely in the same situation as the £10 householders under Sir William Clay's Act. They can make their claim once and for all, and can exercise the privilege without all that trouble which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) with immense ingenuity has imagined. I deal with the Bill before the House. I maintain that the provisions are just, fair, and reasonable.

I decline to discuss the question in reference to any other Bill which is not before the House. I do not know what the £6 rating would do. It was not in the Bill of last year. It is absurd to press such objections as we have heard against this measure, and to say, "Oh, if you bring forward another Bill we will be happy to support it." If Her Majesty's Government had proposed a Bill with a £6 rating franchise we should have been met with a series of other objections from hon. Members. They would have said, "Oh, that does not satisfy us. We should prefer household suffrage." If there be a sincere desire to pass a Bill of this character, surely it is better not to take objections upon those points to which I have referred. It is better not to suppose that the House of Commons is so weak in its powers of legislation, that even when they intend to confer the franchise on a householder of two years' residence who pays his rates, they are unable to frame a provision in the Bill which would carry out their object; and as I have shown to those who are desirous of obtaining the franchise, the amount of trouble it will cost them will not be greater than that imposed upon the £10 occupiers under the existing law. When it is said that under the present Bill they will have to pay the rates twice over, I deny that any such difficulty is thrown upon them. The evil will remedy itself. Under the Small Tenements Act the tenant agrees to let his landlord pay his rates on the condition that he pays a larger rent. If you pass this Bill a large class of electors will be added to the present constituency, by the power which it gives them to obtain the franchise by the payment of the rates themselves, which the landlord has hitherto paid, the rent of course being reduced in proportion. It will be much more to the interest of the landlord to enter into this arrangement than to continue paying the composition rate. There will be two classes of tenants under this measure. The one class, who, deserving the franchise, will make new contracts with their landlords, and pay their own rates; the other, those who, not caring for the franchise, pay an increased rent in order that the landlord may pay their rates.

This is the whole history of the Bill, so far as the borough franchise is concerned. The ingenious arguments used by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) against the Bill are utterly inapplicable. They do not even find favour with other hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House. This is a question of principle. It is not a question of difficulty, nor is there a "new-fangled" principle in the Bill. The principle is as old as the Constitution itself. You have the principle laid down in the scot and lot voting. If you are really desirous of passing a measure of Reform, and say you cannot frame provisions to carry out your objects, then I say that the House of Commons will in effect be saying that they are unable to exercise their functions as legislators. That is the great attack which is made upon the Bill.

I pass by some of the fancy franchises, because nothing has been said against them. Then I come to the 6th clause, upon which some observations have been made. I need hardly comment on the £50 savings bank clause; because I find it was contained in the Bill of 1854, which was introduced on the responsibility of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), and again in the Bill of 1866. It is therefore hardly possible that any objection will now be made to it.

I now come to that part of the clause upon which a great deal was said the other night, and which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) designated as the "rat-catcher's franchise." In order not to be outdone, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) described it on Monday night as the "three-legged £3 horse franchise," and said that a miserable jade of this kind might be passed round to 365 persons in the year, and by the transfer manufacture as many votes. I was surprised to hear that argument used; be cause in the Bill of 1852 I found a similar franchise, but of 40s. instead of 20s. This kind of franchise was again introduced in the Bill of 1854. I do not know what great difference there is in principle between a 40s. and a 20s. direct tax qualification; because if one was a rat-catcher's franchise, or a three-legged £3 miserable jade franchise, the other was also. But if any one had got up in 1854 and had made such a statement, he would have been told that he was adopting "a tone of levity upon a serious question." You cannot laugh a Bill out of the House. You must argue it out, and it cannot be done by mere ridicule.

The right hon. Gentleman says it is perfectly true that if we look through the Bills to which he has been an assenting party some things will be found of which he has since repented. But he says that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is merciless in making past errors suit present purposes, ought to have found out that these were fancy franchises, and were bad and new-fangled. I have heard they might be new, but that they must not be new-fangled. I was therefore curious to discover what was the distinction between them, and, on looking into a dictionary to ascertain the distinction between the two, what I found was this, that "new" meant "recently invented," and "new-fangled" meant "newly found out." The apology for these new fancy franchises I found in a small blue book. One would have thought that during the last Session the right hon. Gentlemen would have warned us to avoid these franchises. But the right hon. Gentleman then said he would briefly allude to those franchises which were new to the Constitution, distinct from tenure and occupation, but which had sometimes been pilloried with scoffing and irreverent names, but which might be called special or bye-franchises. A number of them he said were proposed by Lord Aberdeen's Government in 1854, and again in 1859. So far as the Bill of 1854 was concerned, the right hon. Gentleman said that many of those who formed the then Government were responsible for it. The right hon. Gentleman added—

"We have considered very carefully the nature of those franchises, and the numerous considerations that bear on the policy of their introduction, and we have come to the conclusion that they are not suitable or adequate as a general basis for extending the franchise; at best they are only auxiliary, and while they do not admit any large number, they have a great tendency to complicate the system, and thereby to multiply and increase expense, already very heavy."

["Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.] I am much obliged to hon. Gentlemen for their "Hear, hears;" but if, instead of arguing against the present Bill as the right hon. Gentleman has done, he had said it was unworkable, as he did in reference to the same subject in 1866, I could have understood him; but I cannot understand the right hon. Gentleman's objection that the clause is a three-legged £3 horse clause. Now, when the right hon. Gentleman tells us that the franchise which he proposed in 1854 and in 1859 was withdrawn, because it was found to be so unworkable, so wretched, and so unsuitable to the times, that it was not to be introduced in a subsequent Bill, we ought to expect some warning against its adoption. But I do not find in the right hon. Gentleman's speeches of last year that any of these predictions that these franchises would lead to bribery and the manufacture of faggot votes, were then put forward; but only that they were inconvenient, and would not add a large number to the franchise. I have already said that I assume you are legislating for a large body of the unenfranchised classes who honestly wish to exercise it; and if the Government frame a Bill for that purpose, it is no answer to its provisions to say that those who desire the franchise will commit the grossest possible corruption and bribery. It does not apply to the new franchise only, but to every other class of franchise. If men wish to be corrupted they will find men ready to corrupt them; and if a man wants his rates to be paid, he will find an electioneering agent ready to do so. We do not legislate for such persons, but for those who honestly desire to obtain the franchise and honestly exercise it. If an election agent should hereafter act upon the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the transfer 365 times of a three-legged horse, with a 20s. tax, he would be liable to the penalties of the law, and if found out he would have to stand in a criminal dock on the ground that he had committed a misdemeanour in acting contrary to the provisions of the Bribery Act.

I now come to the question of duality of voting. It is argued against on the ground that it will set class against class, and light a flame throughout the length and breadth of the land which will never be extinguished. Another argument is that you will have a class of Dives and a class of Lazarus, and that this will never be allowed. But I adopt the argument of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gathorne Hardy):—"Is it more disagreeable to be excluded altogether, or to be included with others who are to have a second vote?" I should have thought it more disagreeable or worse to be excluded altogether. There is an axiom that half a loaf is better than no bread. Is it the first time that persons have been told in this country that they are unfit to exercise the franchise, and that it should be taken from them? By the first great disfranchising statute of Henry VI., some freeholders, who theretofore had the right of voting, were told that they should no further exercise that right because their voices were not equal to those knights and esquires, who were entitled to vote for knights of the shire. The statute of Henry VI. disfranchised certain classes of voters, and yet there was no flame created throughout the length and breadth of the land. It was the first Act which gave to 40s. freeholders only the right to vote in counties, which continued to the Reform Act. Then as to plurality of voting. It should be remembered that Sturges Bourne's Act enabled persons to vote in parish meetings according to the value of their property, some persons having as many as six votes, so that while one man has only one vote, others have six. That Act has been in operation some years, and has not created any flame in the country or excited any war of classes. I admit that duality of voting has never yet been tried; but before you can say that it is wrong from the beginning to the end, you should at least state your reasons for coming to such a conclusion. The hon. Member for Maldon likened the dual voting to Dives and Lazarus. Let us examine into this point a little. It is proposed by the Bill to give the dual vote to a man who occupies a house, who pays his rates, and who pays 20s. per annum in direct taxes. Well, this man living in a small house is Dives, while the man who lives next door to him in a house of £50 per annum, but who pays no direct taxes, is Lazarus, and the latter is the man who, we are told, is going to bring the country to the verge of a revolution because his neighbour has a dual vote.

You have now before you the Bill, which has been brought before you honestly and fairly, for the purpose of settling this long-vexed question of Reform. Ingenious arguments may, and doubtless will, be raised against it; but I think you will find, upon examination, those arguments to be more ingenious than solid. I ask hon. Members to take the Bill into their hands and to examine it carefully; but I ask that the same measure of justice that was asked at the hands of the House of Commons last year by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, may be accorded to us. I would use the language of the right hon. Gentleman himself, when he said that the interest in the successful solution of this question was an interest common to the whole House of Commons, and to every party and section of a party within its walls. Therefore I think that hon. Members, instead of meeting the Bill with implacable hostility, should co-operate with us in our endeavours to bring to a successful solution this most difficult problem. We have asked you to accede to the principle that a person who occupies a house for a certain length of time, and who pays his poor rates, shall be entitled to be admitted to exercise the franchise. If you accede to that principle, we further ask you to aid us in carrying that principle into practice. In so doing you will earn the thanks of the country, and will settle the question of Reform upon a sound, permanent, and constitutional basis.

MR. A. PEEL said, he was glad to find that, instead of discussing vague Resolutions that might mean anything or nothing, the House was now considering the debate of a Bill that was supported by the authority of a responsible Ministry. The problem before the House was how they were to admit to the franchise large classes who were now excluded, and who, if not admitted, might become hostile to the Constitution, and how they were to admit them without impairing the due representation in Parliament of the other classes of the country. In his opinion the Bill of 1866 effected that change most admirably by admitting the industrial element. He was aware it was said that that Bill was drawn up on no principle. The great feature of the present Bill was that it claimed a monopoly of principle, and it was asserted that while the former Bill rested upon the shifting quicksand of a figure, this was based on the firm rock of an unchangeable principle. Since the Act of 1832 the representation of the people had been in the hands of the upper and middle classes of the country, and what was now required was a measure which should admit the humbler classes to a fair share of power in the representation. With regard to the principle of the ratepaying qualification, he might observe that that qualification was adopted in the Reform Act of 1832 for the purpose of identifying the bonâ fide occupier, and not as a proof by itself of his fitness for the franchise. But if there were a principle was it not a shifting one. In fifty-eight boroughs the Small Tenements Act was entirely in force; in ninety-eight it was partly in force; in forty-four it was not in force at all. With regard to the dual vote, he thought it would only be desirable as a check in the event of universal suffrage being adopted. It would be very invidious, moreover, for persons to be ticketed as inferior and degraded voters by being allowed only half the electoral power of those a little above them in social rank. Another proposal to which he objected was the requiring a longer term of residence for the poorer class, for this would operate very unjustly on the most skilled and industrious working men. These were more migratory than others; because, instead of remaining in a particular place, they carried their labour to the best market. With regard to rating and rental, he maintained that the gross rent which a man paid was the best criterion of his position and qualifications, and he should have preferred a £5 rental franchise. As the House had been warned off that so-called dangerous ground, he thought a settlement might be found in a modification of the Small Tenements Act, and in the definition and demarcation of compound-householders—compounding being limited to £5 and under, while all occupiers above that sum should have the franchise. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in that most readable volume which he had recently published, which contained a collection of his speeches, had pointed out the various phases which a question went through in this country. At first the opinion or crotchet of an individual, it gradually enlisted supporters and became a public question. In time it became a Parliamentary question; and then, being taken up by the Government of the day, it became a Ministerial question. There seemed a danger at one time of Reform becoming an open question; but a Bill had now happily been framed on the responsibility of the Government, and he hoped that they would hereafter be able to look back on the present Session as the period when this long-pending question was settled, and the representation of the people placed on a surer because broader basis.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped that the debate might be taken to-morrow. The hon. and gallant Member for Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) had a Notice on the Paper; but he trusted, under the circumstances, that he and the other Members who had Notices of Motion would give way.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, though it was difficult for a private Member to get a day for bringing forward any Motion he might have to make, yet when so important a question as that which they had been discussing was before them he had no hesitation in saying that he, for one, should not stand in the way of the renewal of the debate to-morrow.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND) BILL.

(The O'Conor Don, Mr. Monsell, Mr. Leatham.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to call attention to one effect of this Bill, which was that magistrates would be called upon under it to determine the religion of the children sent to such schools, and that the certificate of their baptism would be held as satisfactory proof of their religion. This ought to be well considered when the efforts of the Roman Catholic Church to subject children to the rite of baptism without the knowledge of their parents were known to all. For years past there has been an organized system carried on by the Roman Catholics for the surreptitious baptism of children of the working classes, and this Bill was intended to give effect to that system.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether the Bill was introduced on the authority of the Government?

LORD NAAS: This is not a Bill, it is merely a formal Resolution.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of a contribution towards the cost of the custody and maintenance of Children, and of the expenses of their removal in certain cases, in pursuance of the provisions of any Act of the present Session relating to Industrial Schools in Ireland.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY moved for leave to introduce a Bill to consolidate and amend the Law relating to the Public Health in Scotland. He said, it was to consolidate four previous Acts of Parliament relating to the removal of nuisances for the prevention of disease in Scotland, and several clauses were taken from the English Public Health Act of 1848. The Bill would afford increased facilities to the local authorities to carry out their Act, and would give a controlling and compelling power to the Board and supervision, which was very necessary.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to consolidate and amend the Law relating to the Public Health in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, and Mr. HUNT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 89.]

PROMISSORY NOTES (IRELAND) BILL.

Act read; considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the Act of the ninth George the Fourth, chapter eighty-one, intituled, "An Act for making Promissory Notes payable, issued by Banks, Banking Companies, or Bankers in Ireland, at the places where they are issued."

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. M'KENNA and Mr. BRADY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 90.]

House adjourned at half after

CLERICAL VESTMENTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, your Lordships will recollect that a few days since I stated, with reference to some observations made by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Shaftesbury) on the subject of a Bill which he was about to introduce, relating to Clerical Vestments, that the Bishops had under their consideration a Bill on that subject; but that they had not come to any final decision as to the course they should adopt. I am now happy to state that they have abandoned their Bill, in consequence of the probability of a Royal Commission being issued on the subject.

THE OATHS COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

EARL STANHOPE wished to ask his noble Friend the President of the Board of Trade, When the Report of the Oaths Commission would be laid upon their Lordships' table?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that the Commissioners were considering their Report; but that they had adjourned their sittings until after Easter.

CASE OF THE "TORNADO."

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he observed that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) had given Notice of a Motion for Papers on this subject. He now wished to represent to the noble Marquess that it would be expedient to postpone his Motion until their Lordships were in possession of further information. The noble Marquess was to move for copies of the depositions sworn before the British Consul at Cadiz by the master, officers and crew of the Tornado, on the 23rd of February last. With regard to these depositions, it would be seen from the papers that up to the 20th of this month no such depositions had been received at the Foreign Office. The petition of the plaintiffs, as they might be called, stated that it was a great hardship to them that these depositions had not appeared in the second series of papers. Lord Stanley made inquiry, and finding that they had never been received at the Foreign Office, telegraphed immediately to Consul Dunlop to ascertain whether these depositions had been taken, and where they were. The answer was that they had been taken, and were in the hands of the parties themselves; but that they would be forwarded the following day. They were received at the Foreign Office that morning, and he hoped to lay them on the table in the course of the day.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that after the explanation of the noble Earl he had no hesitation in postponing his Motion. He trusted that their Lordships would read the papers carefully, for the conduct of the Spanish Government, which had been fully exposed by Lord Stanley, had been such that it was impossible for the Government to allow Her Majesty's subjects to be treated with such disregard of international rights.

Afterwards—

Correspondence respecting the Seizure of the Tornado off Madeira by the Spanish frigate Gerona, (Part IV) presented (by Command).

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

BERMUDA—YELLOW FEVER.

QUESTION.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of Council on Education, Whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Commission on Yellow Fever at Bermuda, 1856; Report of Committee on Yellow Fever at Bermuda, 1864; Report of the late epidemic of Scarlet Fever among children at Aldershot, 1866; and, what conclusion is to be drawn from these Reports as to the infectious nature of the diseases referred to?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in reply, said, he was sure the House would not expect that he should, within the limits of a reply to the Question of the hon. Baronet, enter into all the intricacies of the medical considerations which it involved. He might briefly state that the Reports referred to had been brought under his notice, and that there was no particular conclusion to be drawn from them as to the infectious nature of the diseases mentioned.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to an Action, tried at the Oxford Assizes in March 1866, in which £111 was awarded as compensation to the plaintiff in consequence of his being obliged to dispose of twenty-two cows at considerable loss, the rinderpest having been communicated to them by a cow sold to him by the defendant; and, whether the case of "Mullet v. Mason" will constitute a precedent in compensative claims for loss sustained through infection?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that in the case in question the defendant had falsely represented to the plaintiff that the cow was not diseased when he knew that it was diseased, and the Court held that he was liable to the consequences of that false statement. But unless similar circumstances should arise in any other case he did not know how it could be drawn into a precedent.

ROYAL COURT OF JERSEY.

QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to bring in a Bill, or take other means to reform the constitution of the Royal Court of Jersey, conformably to the suggestions of the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council for the affairs of Jersey and Guernsey, as set forth in the Order in Council of the 3rd of February 1866?

MR. WALPOLE replied, that Her Majesty's Government had no intention of bringing in a Bill upon that subject, and he did not see how they could take any other step for the reform of the Court.

NANTLLE RAILWAY COMPANY.

QUESTION.

MR. SAMUELSON said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware that the Nantlle Railway Company having been authorized by an Act obtained in 1865 to increase the width of gauge of their Railway, subject to the previous approval of the Board of Trade, have in fact increased such width on a portion only of the Railway, and without the consent of the Board of Trade, thereby inflicting serious loss and inconvenience upon the proprietors of certain slate quarries communicating only with that portion of the line the gauge of which has not been altered; and, whether the Board of Trade will cause any inquiry to be made into the circumstances of the case?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE, in reply, said, the Board of Trade had recently been informed that the Nantlle Railway Company had increased the gauge on a portion of their line without the previous approval of the Board as required by their Act. The Board of Trade had, in consequence, called upon the Company for an explanation, and, upon the receipt of that explanation, an inspector would, if necessary, be ordered to inquire into and to report upon the circumstances of the case.

NAVY—CLAIMS OF MR. CLARE. QUESTION.

MR. BAZLEY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will place upon the table of the House the Document handed to his predecessor in November last, seeking a settlement of the claims of Mr. John Clare, for the use of his patents in Shipbuilding?

MR. CORRY said, in reply, that he thought it would be very objectionable to put the country to the expense of printing Returns which could lead to no practical result. Mr. Clare had no new claim to urge since the rejection of his petition of right in the Court of Queen's Bench in the year 1861, and the subsequent refusal of the Court to grant him a new trial. Under these circumstances, he trusted that his hon. Friend would not ask him to produce the very lengthy document to which his question referred.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS BILL. QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he intends to proceed, on Thursday next, with the Metropolitan Improvements Bill, which has been brought in by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets and the hon. Member for Bath?

Mr. Samuelson

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in reply, that in the present state of the public business it would not be possible to take that Bill or any other measure relating to the taxation of the metropolis, on Thursday next; and he proposed, with the concurrence of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, to postpone the further discussion of the Bill in question until after the Easter recess.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH PORTUGAL.—QUESTION.

MR. AKROYD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has received any communication from the Portuguese Government favourable to the negotiation of a Treaty of Commerce upon the same terms as the French Treaty, provided that Portuguese Wines, although of a higher degree of proof than French Wines, be admitted at the same rate of Duty; and, whether he will lay the Correspondence upon the table of the House?

LORD STANLEY: For some months past a Correspondence has been going on between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Portugal, having for its object the establishment of a new Treaty of Commerce between the two countries. I regret to have to add that that negotiation has not proved successful. The Portuguese Government insisted as a sine qua non on an arrangement which would have the practical result of abolishing the alcoholic test as applied to wines. They claimed that their wines should be admitted at the lowest rate of duty at which the wine of any country is admitted into our ports. That question was very carefully considered by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by my right hon. Friend the late President of the Board of Trade, and by myself, aided, of course, by the information and advice of the experienced officer of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise Departments, and we found ourselves compelled to come to the conclusion that the imposition of a uniform rate of duty on all wine would not only lead to considerable temporary loss to the revenue—a loss, no doubt, which might afterwards be made up by increased consumption—but would give so much encouragement to illicit distillation as very seriously to endanger the increased revenue derived from spirits. We were willing to consent to a comparatively slight modification of the higher rate of duty on wines; but the amount of the concession which we thought we could safely offer was not such as to satisfy the Portuguese Government, and accordingly those negotiations have come to an end. I shall have no objection to lay before the House the Correspondence which has passed upon the subject.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS
—WHITBY RECTORY.—QUESTION.

MR. BAGNALL said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for East Norfolk, Whether the Tithes of the Whitby Rectory, the purchase of the lessee's interest in which was stated in the Seventeenth Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to have been left to arbitration, have become the property of the Commissioners or not, as no mention is made of any decision in the Eighteenth Report?

MR. HOWES replied, that the lessee's interest in the tithes in question had become vested in the Ecclesiastical Commission; but that the actual transfer of those tithes had not been completed until the 28th of November, the day posterior to the date on which the Report referred to was delivered.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT.—QUESTION.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in accordance with Clause 35 of the Public Health Act of last Session, the nuisance authorities throughout the country generally, and particularly in the East of London, have made regulations for fixing the number of persons who may occupy a house which is let in lodgings, for the registration and inspection of such houses, and for enforcing other provisions contained in the clause; and if the nuisance authorities of the more thickly populated parishes have not applied for power to make such regulations, whether it is not advisable that some further steps should be taken by Parliament in order to induce them to do so?

MR. WALPOLE replied, that a considerable number of places had already applied to the Home Office to be placed under the 35th section of the Public Health Act; and twenty-five of these places had got regulations already made in consequence of such application. The City of London, and in the East of London, Poplar, Limehouse, Rotherhithe, Whitechapel, and Bethnal Green had applied and had got regulations. There were many large and populous places in the country which had moved in the matter, and with the same result; and under these circumstances, and believing that the Act was working well, he did not think there was any immediate necessity for further legislation upon the subject.

CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council for Education, Whether he has noticed in the weekly returns, Nos. 67, 68, 69, of the Cattle Plague Inquiry, "no cattle were slaughtered in consequence of being in contact with infected animals;" that upwards of 52,650 have been slaughtered healthy; while the First Report of the Commissioners, p. xvii., states that "the hope of thus arresting its march diminishes, the inevitable waste increases, and the sense of hardship tends to become insupportable;" and, whether the time has not come when this portion of the Report might be attended to without great danger?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in reply, said, he conceived that the object of the Question of the hon. Baronet was to insinuate that the killing of cattle should be put an end to; but he must call the attention of the House to the whole of the paragraph from the first Report of the Commissioners, of which the hon. Baronet had only read a portion. The Commissioners stated—

"This power is right and useful when the disease has appeared only at isolated spots and attacked a few animals; the public benefit is then very great and the private sacrifice small; but in proportion as it extends the hope of thus arresting its march much diminishes, the inevitable waste increases, and the sense of hardship tends to become insupportable."

That was from the first Report; but, subsequently, in the third Report, the Commissioners said—

"We see no reason to doubt that the lessened rate of progress during the last two months is substantially due to the new repressive measures—namely, slaughter, stoppage of cattle, traffic, &c. . . . The very principle of stoppage by slaughter is to make the killing follow immediately on the attack, &c."

Therefore, it appeared that the Commissioners, when they became better acquainted with the disease, thought it was necessary to slaughter such cattle as were diseased. Parliament endorsed that opinion by passing the Act of 1866; but, though the cattle plague was not extinct, he hoped that in a very short time measures might be taken by the Privy Council to relax a great many of the orders in force by means of a Bill which would be introduced.

THE CONVICT WAGER.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he rose to put a Question respecting a recent exercise of the Royal Prerogative of mercy. It appeared from the reports in the newspapers that a murder, accompanied by circumstances of more than usual barbarity and atrocity, had been perpetrated by a man named Edward Wager, and the announcement of the reprieve of the murderer was received with surprise and dissatisfaction; and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would by his reply allay those feelings in the public mind. ["Order, order!"] He would therefore beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will state the reasons which induced him to advise Her Majesty to exercise the Royal Prerogative of mercy in favour of the murderer Edward Wager?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that the murder referred to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman was one of aggravated enormity and barbarity. When the case came before him he thought it his duty, as he had done in all other cases which had fallen under his consideration since he filled the office he now held (and he believed he so informed the House at the end of last Session), to apply as a test the unanimous recommendation of Her Majesty's Commissioners on the subject of capital punishment. That recommendation was that unless there was a premeditated and deliberate intention to kill—"malice aforethought" was, he believed, the expression in their Report—these cases in future should not be followed by the penalty of death. When he read the case now alluded to, his first impression was like that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, that it was a case of such barbarity and cruelty that it was proper that the law should take its course. On the other hand, he found that the jury recommended the criminal to mercy. Moreover, he felt that in this, as in all similar cases, it was his duty to apply to the Judge who tried the criminal, and he did so without intimating any opinion one way or the other.

Lord Robert Montagu

The learned Judge had twice favoured him with his opinion, and he would read a portion of the report. It was as follows:—

"The murder was not premeditated, and I do not think that when he commenced the pursuit after his wife he intended that act of violence which he afterwards made use of. I am therefore of opinion that the case is not an unfit one for the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy."

After the recommendation of the jury, expressed not only at the time when the verdict was given, but since conveyed to him in stronger language than the original recommendation was couched in, and after the deliberate opinion of the Judge that the case was, in his opinion, not unfit for the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy, he did not think that he could have taken any other course than the one he adopted, and the sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask, whether the right hon. Gentleman adopted it as a principle that he should give effect to the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners before legislation had taken place on the subject?

MR. WALPOLE said, that the hon. Member had better give notice of his Question.

SALE OF LAND BY AUCTION BILL (Lords.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SELWYN said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, and would propose to take the discussion when the Bill was printed with Amendments.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Selwyn.)

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he hoped that a fair opportunity would be given for a full discussion of the measure, to which there was great objection.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, he understood that the concessions made in the Bill by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Selwyn), and its noble author, were so many that all the objectionable clauses had been struck out. He also understood that the auctioneers had waived their opposition to it, and now wished it to be proceeded with, on the understanding that there would be full liberty that its opponents should be unpledged with respect to it. Under these circumstances, he would postpone his observations until they went into Committee.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM—
BILL.—[BILL 79.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord Stanley.)

DEBATE RESUMED.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, that it was only upon questions in which he took a great and deep interest that he presumed to intrude upon the notice of the House; but holding as he did strong convictions upon the question of Reform, he felt that it was no time to consider what was tasteful or distasteful to himself, but that it behoved him to speak out his sentiments boldly to the House. He believed that vital issues were at stake, and the mightiest that could be debated in any country or senate; nothing less than the whole course of this country's future history; and men in after days looking back to these times and sitting in judgment upon us, would either say that Parliament did well and saved the country, or that it did ill and ruined the Constitution. He confessed that it did not diminish from his anxiety on this question to reflect that it was the country Gentlemen of England, on whichever side of the House they sat—it was the Hampdens, the Pymes, and the Cavaliers alike—whose influence was at stake. He had had the misfortune to differ from his party in the House more than once, but he had never shrunk from boldly expressing his convictions; and he would say he did not think a greater calamity could happen to the country than that these Gentlemen, with their high spirit and great qualities, should be subtracted from the sum of their country's attributes. It appeared to him that they were standing on the brink of a precipice, and that it needed but a slight push to send them over it, and that push, the Bill of the Government, if it were passed as it stood, with what must inevitably and immediately follow, would certainly give. He did not wish to be misunderstood—he did not blame the Government—he was quite sure they wished to do their duty to the Crown and the country. But he believed they had quite misapprehended their duty in undertaking to solve a question which it was wished to get rid of, and that they had erred quite as much in their omissions as in what they had proposed. Erroneously believing that the question of Reform must inevitably damage their party, their whole minds had been bent on its being damaged in the least possible degree. Hence that elaborate system of checks and counterpoises—hence what he would call that egregious and stupendous blunder the dual vote. What was the consequence? These checks and counterpoises were seen to be unpalatable, and in all probability would be withdrawn, and could they then be surprised that their party should stand aghast and bewildered, and believe that sentence of death had been passed upon them by their own leaders? For what was the case? The Government, in fact, seemed to be doing that which the late Government proposed to do, only by a different machinery; because nobody supposed there was any great magic in rating, and if they took this Bill merely as a franchise Bill the effect would be precisely what the late Government had intended, and which they were told last Session would bring about the ruin of the Constitution. Ruin the Constitution he firmly believed this Bill, if unamended, would; and therefore he had always thought that the position taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), and others, was perfectly unassailable. It was enough to do one's heart good, and it redeemed one's opinion of the consistency of mankind, to find that one who had held these opinions last year, in spite of all that had been said against him, holding the same opinions now.

The arrangement of 1832, it had been said, stretched the Constitution as far as it would go, and it could not be stretched any further without breaking it. That opinion he fully shared; but, nevertheless, changed the Constitution must be. No one believed that that change would not take place, and was it not wise to acquiesce in the inevitable, and accept facts that must be accomplished as certainly as if they had been accomplished? Accept them certainly, but not as a Turk or a Hindoo would accept fever and famine, as a decree of Heaven. Accept them bravely by throwing themselves, as it were, at the head of the storming party. In 1832 a Whig Government proposed a Reform Bill. The Tory party, headed by the Duke of Wellington, met the proposal by a negative, and cried non possumus. What was the consequence? The Whigs, aided by the force of the country, knocked down all obstacles, and the tide which might have been directed broke loose and swept over the fair face of the land. At that time the numerical principle of representation, a principle unknown to the Constitution, was introduced—at first diffidently—it afterwards assumed a form of greater confidence, and now it asserted itself quite arrogantly. Before that principle asserted itself the result of a great Yorkshire meeting was regarded as having more force than that of scores of borough elections. Thus, in 1781, a great county meeting in Yorkshire put an end to the American war and to the Administration of Lord North; and in 1807, the election of Mr. Wilberforce in Yorkshire was attended with consequences of corresponding importance. Ever since 1832, the principle of numerical representation had asserted itself. And what was the principle of numerical representation? It was not only a democratic principle—it was the democratic principle—it was the very principle of evil. Care must be taken lest it should wax so strong as to swallow up the whole representation. Take the cases of Dewsbury and Middlesbrough—boroughs each containing 18,000 or 16,000 inhabitants—when they asked for representation it was because they had interests which required representation. But when Torquay, with a population of 16,000 inhabitants, asked for representation, he would ask what principle did Torquay represent? None that he could understand, unless, as an hon. Friend near him said, it represented pulmonary principles. The population was dependent upon pulmonary patients, and was composed of butchers, bakers, tailors, and other purveyors to these pulmonary patients. These pulmonary patients had no status at Torquay. They were not shiftless nomads; but, at all events, they were nomads who shifted about from place to place according to the bidding of the East wind, and the state of their bronchial tubes; they did not live at Torquay, and they did not care for Torquay, and the remainder of the population consisted of bakers, butchers, and tailors. But, when an election came, they would rush to the poll, though

in doing so they would not be actuated by any particular degree of public spirit. He did not say that these people should not be allowed to have a voice in the affairs of the country; but they should not be allowed, as an uncontrolled and unmixed constituency, to return a Member to Parliament. As far as his argument was concerned, it did not matter whether a Member of Parliament was returned by fifty or by 50,000 tailors. The principle was equally wrong in both cases. Outside the boundaries of the proposed borough there lived something like 1,000 villa-holders. They were composed of retired tradesmen, barristers, medical men, professional men, and literary men—men who read their newspapers and talked politics, and took an interest in the collective action of the country, yeomen such as no country under the sun, except England, could show. They were, in fact, the equivalents of the ancient yeomen of England, the representatives of the ancient freeholders of counties. When it was said that the yeomen of England had died out, he pointed to these men with pride, and asserted that they were their representatives. These were independent men living upon their own incomes, owing no man anything—men who revered the law. Such men were the ancient yeomen of England, and they were more numerous now than in the time of Hampden, when the freeholders of Buckinghamshire returned him as their representative to Parliament. There was, however, one important difference between the ancient yeomen and their modern representatives, and it was this, the yeomen of England returned Members to Parliament, they had a voice in the country; whereas, by the existing arrangements, these men were practically disfranchised, they were politically annihilated. It was said that freeholders formed a large class of the county constituency; but the old class had been swamped by the 40s. freeholders—and this last class was, as it were, but the galvanised relic of a previous age, who swamped the better class, so that these would not take the trouble to register themselves for the counties, and the consequence was they were practically disfranchised. Had the Government Bill, instead of drawing the boundaries of this proposed borough so as to exclude these freeholders, drawn them so as to include them, then instead of getting a worthless constituency such as he had described, they would create one of the best conceivable constituencies. He thought that if they took a town as a radius or focus, and included in it a certain district of the neighbourhood, they would get the best constituencies imaginable. They had some such constituencies in the country. There was East Retford, there was New Shoreham, with the Rape of Bramber, and there was Aylesbury, all of which were of this character. One of them included an area of twenty-five miles, having in addition only one or two small townships and a rural neighbourhood. Then, again, he would take the case of Windsor. He had nothing to say against the representatives of that borough; but he would appeal to them to say if the constituency would not be improved if the neighbouring village of Ascot and town of Maidenhead, and the surrounding country were added, thus creating instead of a corrupt borough a most satisfactory constituency.

He would point the attention of the House to the case of Hungary Proper, whose constitution, bearing great similarity to our own, dated nearly from the period of Magna Charta. There were 335 representatives in the Diet of Hungary; and he begged the House to mark this fact, that out of that number 248 were Members for counties, and only fifty-six for towns, and there were upwards of thirty representatives for the rural districts. It would be impossible in this manufacturing country to allow the counties to have the same proportion of representatives; but, at the same time, the counties were entitled to their fair share of representation. Turning to the county representation, he might point to counties like Rutland and Cumberland with limited constituencies, but which were enabled to secure a fair representation of their sentiments; while again, where the counties had increased in population, so as to become unmanageable, they were very properly separated into divisions, which was a most rational and sensible arrangement. When the Government proposed to disfranchise corrupt boroughs, like Lancaster, Yarmouth, and Totnes, in his humble opinion they committed a great error. When they passed sentence of death against a constituency they ought to do so in a calm and judicial manner; they had no right to deprive towns like Lancaster and Yarmouth—towns with a life of their own—of their share of the representation, on account of the viciousness of a certain portion of their inhabitants. Independently of that fact, the proposed disfranchisement was not made in a judicial spirit. The inhabitants of those towns and the country generally would feel that their disfranchisement was merely a matter of convenience, and that those boroughs were deprived of their share in the representation because the seats were wanted. If, instead of disfranchising these towns, they were to disfranchise unmercifully all those persons who were guilty of corrupt practices, and to infuse with the remainder of the inhabitants a large healthy country district, they would thus create a good constituency. In the course of time, too, those boroughs would raise an irresistible clamour for the restoration of their representation, and their demand would have to be complied with, and their share in the representation restored to them. Let them contrast with these constituencies the small rural districts composed of towns, townships, and neighbouring villages, and the small counties and divisions of counties; let them, on the other hand, take a large county like Berkshire, and he would ask whether they had in such a place a satisfactory constituency? In such a large and long county the men of Dan at one end did not know what the men of Beersheba were doing at the other end; they had nothing in common with them; they did not even worship the same golden calf. In the case of an election it was turned by the townspeople, and turned in the wrong way, for these people had no sympathy with those of the county. He believed that the consequences of a Bill like that now introduced by the Government, would be that they would lose the counties, and the counties which had hitherto been the stronghold of Conservative feeling—he did not use the word in a party sense—and they would become centres of democracy, the result would be they would have a pure democracy, equal electoral districts, and the reign of the 50,000 tailors.

He had said but little about the franchise, and for this reason—that to his mind it was a question which was quite secondary to that of the re-distribution of seats. He had been taught to trust the great body of the English people, and he believed that they would never very widely diverge from the magnetic currents of society, and that consequently they would be able safely to do in England what would be unsafe in America and in Australia. In these states of society they required checks and counterpoises, but in England he believed that they would be utterly vain and pusillanimous. While, therefore, he should like to see the franchise widely extended, he would control its exercise by infusing two kinds of aristocracy among them—the civic aristocracy and the rural, radiating freely in well-proportioned and naturally selected districts. They must trust the people altogether or not at all, and it was the theory of our wise Constitution that they should be trusted altogether. If they insisted upon a wise distribution of seats it did not matter much whether it was a £10 rating or household suffrage, and to his mind it was intolerably nauseous to go on discussing the difference between £10 and £7. It seemed to him that they had got beyond questions of renting and rating. There might have been some sense in the matter if it were a question between £50 and £10; but between £5 or £6, and a household suffrage, the discussion seemed utterly useless, and one likely to lead them into a perfect Serbonian bog. Surely it was not beyond their power to discover some other test of respectability beyond the tests of rent and rating, and a man might be equally worthy whether he lived in a flat containing four rooms, in a four-roomed house, or being a single man occupied only one room. What he should propose when they were going into Committee on this Bill was that the second part, which related to the redistribution of seats, should be taken first. The present Government had in this matter followed the example of the late Government, who had followed the advice of the hon. Member for Birmingham—the serpent beguiled the woman, and the woman beguiled the man. The present Government had followed the late Government in laying especial stress upon the question of the franchise; but to his mind it was an entirely subordinate question. If they left the people under their natural leaders, and if they had naturally selected districts such as he had endeavoured to describe, there was no fear that the people would choose improper men, they would respect and trust the old names and the old associations. He was not in favour of equal electoral districts. On the contrary, he believed that such a system was about the most destructive surgical operation you could put a country through; it would be a severing of the limbs from the trunk, and cutting through the muscles and sinews of the body politic. Such a system would be cutting across the train of old and hallowed associations; but he would make his districts in obedience to and in accordance with those associations, and if this were so he did not think that it would matter much what franchise they had. Were they afraid of the people of England? Was there any fear that those who lived in their own districts could be turned out by a stranger, or that any caucus would be able to elect a hireling representative for their own sinister purpose and against the interest of the whole country? What he wished to point out was that if they had a natural selection of districts, there was no fear whatever kind of franchise they had, and, a fortiori, that it was perfectly unnecessary to have cumulative or dual votes, as there would be no need of checks or counterpoises to defend the minority. He did not want the principle of minority representation defended. It appeared to him that any system of minority representation would prevent their getting at the real sense of the country. He was decidedly opposed to the principle of dual voting. The reason which made him anxious to see a Reform Bill carried was because he believed that matters had now come to a deadlock, and would remain so until that question was settled.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER, who rose at the same time with Mr. Osborne, said: Sir, it is with very great regret that I deprive myself, as well as the House, for a short time, of the pleasure of listening to the hon. Member for Nottingham, whom the House is always willing to hear; but, in the meantime, I will avail myself of the indulgence of the House to offer my remarks upon a subject which I, in common with all here, feel to be of the utmost importance. I do not, however, mean to follow the example of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Butler-Johnstone); but in saying so, I hope he will not believe I intend any discourtesy towards him. What I mean is this—the hon. Gentleman has chiefly addressed his remarks to the subject of the redistribution of seats; whereas I, though by no means undervaluing the importance of that question, look upon the question of the franchise as of still more importance, and with this feeling all I intend to say will have reference to that question.

My right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board told us yesterday, and with truth and candour, that whatever else this Bill may be, it is certainly not a Bill for the introduction of household suffrage. Whether that be a merit or otherwise, it is, I think, a fair description of the Bill. Now, the House is aware that I am not one of those who entertain any alarm at the idea of household suffrage. Upon a former occasion, when there were many reasons why I might have abstained from making a declaration on the subject, if I could conscientiously have done so, I felt it to be my duty not to conceal from the House that my own mind had been for some time travelling in the direction of household suffrage. It had done so upon what I thought to be a combination of Liberal and Conservative principles; I thought a household suffrage liberal in principle, because, whatever might be the regulations under which that franchise was conferred, it would be still a large and satisfactory admission of many persons now excluded from the franchise; I thought it Conservative in principle, because it identified the suffrage with the heads of families inhabiting rated houses in boroughs, and I, of course, anticipated a provision that the proposed voter should have inhabited a house for a sufficient time to secure us against a vagrant and fluctuating constituency. At the same time, it was recommended à priori by the very powerful consideration that, so far as the limits of Parliamentary and municipal boroughs were conterminous, the citizen of the municipality would seem in reason to be entitled to that part, not the least part, of the rights of the place or borough in which he resided. It appeared to me that there was a natural principle of finality in such a franchise; but I have never disguised from myself that if at any time that principle should be admitted it would be necessary to define what we mean by rated houses, and what we mean by residence, so as to insure that the voter should be identified with the place for which he voted. Whatever may be the mode arrived at of solving these necessary questions, I do not for one moment entertain the slightest alarm or apprehension as to the consequences of a franchise so extended. My confidence, in this matter, is founded upon the broad basis of the state of society in this country; upon the manner in which the different classes of society are seen to be practically united and co-operating together; and upon the fact, that in every town, if this principle of enfranchisement were adopted, it would place the suffrage in the hands of those who at least were the heads of their own class, whether that class were high or low. I know that the working of the municipal franchise under the Compound Household-ers Act was made the subject of inquiry a few years ago in "another place;" and the Report of the Committee who considered the question infused alarm, with respect to the working of that Act, into many minds. I find in that Report that in certain places, not very numerous—of which Newcastle-on-Tyne was the only one, from which more than a single witness was examined—among the more ignorant portion of the constituency, described as being chiefly Irish, I believe, there was a great deal of treating and some personation of voters arising from the use of voting papers. But, on a careful examination of that evidence, it appeared to me that the proof of the charge was very narrow; that the charge was made with respect to a small portion of the population, and—what is of far more importance—that every witness admitted that the practical good government of the towns in respect to their local affairs was not substantially, if in any degree whatever, anywhere impaired by the working of that Act. Under these circumstances, I shall feel no alarm if it be found necessary to go to the full extent of the municipal franchise. I am, however, the last man to set up my own judgment against the general opinion of the community, in case it is thought safer to proceed by slower degrees. With reference to the question of limitations, premising that the simple provision of requiring a voter to write his name at the poll would be enough to exclude a great amount of ignorance, I would say that, if it be the general opinion of the House that we cannot go safely to the furthest limit of the household principle, without some safeguards which would prevent the ascendancy of the lower portions of the constituency, which some apprehend, though I do not, then I say, by all means let us accept the proposal, made by more hon. Members than one, to stop at £5; but, if we do that, let us at all events do it in such a way as to obtain that which we all want—a good settlement of the question. And whatever we do, whether it be done under the name of household suffrage or under the name of a rating franchise—which my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) prefers—let us not by introducing new differences infuse new grounds for disagreement and discontent. The introduction of new and arbitrary inequalities into our franchise is, I venture to say, not the right way to produce any settlement, but it may be calculated to leave the question more unsettled than it is at present. That, I take the liberty of saying, is what this Bill would do; and I think the assertion can be demonstrated with perfect ease.

Now, I ask the House to test the Bill by one very simple criterion—How does the Bill propose to leave the existing constituencies? Will those constituencies, as the Bill proposes to leave them, be constituencies in conformity with the alleged principle of the Bill; or will they be established upon a totally different principle, and in a manner quite at variance from the Bill? I say that all the conditions of the borough franchise given by the Bill are at variance with the law which regulates the existing constituencies, and that you cannot leave the existing conditions untouched side by side with the new conditions which the Bill proposes to create. Now, this is a very important matter. Let no one suppose that all that the present Bill does with regard to existing constituencies is to preserve unimpaired the rights of those who may at this moment be voters. The Bill, by the 40th clause, says, “the franchise conferred by this Act shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, any existing franchises.” Therefore, not only those persons who are now upon the register, but for all time to come, as long as this Act is in force, you are to retain the £10 householders, with their present qualifications and with their present conditions. Are these qualifications and conditions the same as those which will attach to the new voters under this Bill, or are they entirely different and inconsistent with them? Now, I give the answer. Your first clause says with regard to your new franchise that first of all there must be a two years’ residence. That might possibly be a very good term for the purpose if it were uniform and applicable to all alike. But you are going to retain the present law as to the £10 householder; and the £10 householder, divided from those beneath him by that arbitrary line, will be qualified by one-half of that amount of residence. Is that a satisfactory settlement of the question? I thought your object in introducing the rating household suffrage was to get rid of this arbitrary pound figure—the line which had been arbitrarily drawn at a certain sum, when no human being can say that one sum is better than another. But you retain this line, as if for the very purpose of getting rid of the benefit of your own principle. An arbitrary figure is still to separate a privileged class from an inferior and a “handicapped” class below them—a class which is to be loaded with greater difficulties in the attainment of the franchise. But the objection does not stop there. Besides the advantage they will have in respect of length of residence, you intend that persons who pay £10 shall get the household franchise much more easily than persons who pay only £9 19s. 6d. You only allow occupiers below £10 to qualify for an entire dwelling-house; but if the amount is more than £10 they may qualify for counting-houses, warehouses, and shops; which, in some cases, may be only parts of dwelling-houses.

Nothing is better than an example to make a thing well understood; so I will mention a case from Stockport which in 1843 came before the Courts under the Reform Act. A mill was let off by the owners in different rooms to a dozen or more different people, each paying £10 or upwards for his room, having his own key and the common use of the machinery. The rate was entered in the rate book in gross; the names both of the owner, and of all the occupiers, were entered as rated together; one gross sum was levied upon the whole premises; and the landlord paid the rate. Now every one of these persons was held entitled to his vote for the separate room he occupied, and will be so entitled after this Bill has passed. But if those persons had each paid £9 19s. 6d. instead of £10, not one of them would get a vote unless he occupied the whole house. Is that the way to settle this question, by introducing such distinctions in order to make the dividing line, always arbitrary, more galling and more objectionable, if possible, than before? But there is another point to be considered. Does the present law require this personal payment of rates which you say is the great cardinal principle—the most reasonable principle—of your Bill? When the £10 householder whose rates are compounded for claims to be put upon the rate book, does the present law require from him payment of the difference between the composition and the full rate? It does not, and will not after this Bill has passed. I agree that the present law does require that the voter’s name should appear upon the rate book; but I venture to say there is no earthly use in it, unless it is to pay the rate or something in addition to the rate

If the occupier is put in the rate book and he is not obliged to pay more than the owner, it clearly makes no practical difference, so long as the rate is paid, who pays it. As between owner and occupier it is sure to be taken into account in the payment of rent. Now, I want to know whether, under the present law, your £10 householder is obliged to pay the rates himself. He is not. It has been settled over and over again that if by arrangement between landlord and tenant the tenant pays nothing to the landlord but his rent, and the landlord pays the rates, and if the overseer goes to the landlord without communicating with the tenant and gets the rate, that is just as good in the eye of the law as if the tenant paid the rate himself. The absurdity, therefore, of requiring payment to be made by the tenant's own hand is not entertained by the law as it now stands, and will not be with respect to £10 houses after this Bill passes. The landlord's payment is exactly as good as the tenant's payment, and it would be absurd if this were otherwise; for, if the money be paid, can any one doubt that for all the purposes for which the rate is imposed it matters not who pays it, and that as between landlord and tenant the rate must find its way into the settlement of rent? Then, I say, that for the form of requiring what you call personal payment of the rate not a reason can be given; and that, as it is not required by the present law, if you mean to make it a condition in the case of the new voters, you are introducing a most unreasonable, unnecessary, and arbitrary distinction. The essence of the thing is that the rate shall be paid; if paid, it is unimportant by what hand the payment is made; and to introduce this test as a qualification for the franchise is, I venture to say, a simple absurdity.

Now I come to a still more important matter. Is, or is not, the principle of this Bill right when it requires that the person who has compounded, if claiming to vote, should pay an additional sum of money beyond that which would be payable by him or by anybody unless this claim were made? How stands the law on that point as regards the present £10 householders, and how will it stand with regard to those householders who are to be enfranchised if this Bill should pass? My right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) said—

ing his full rates, it might be rejoined that he would be bribed by being permitted to pay less than the full amount. But why should one man be put on a more favourable footing with respect to the exercise of the franchise than another? Let every man stand on the same basis.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxvi. 511.]

The words are not mine, but those of my right hon. Friend. I echo those words. I say that one man should not be put on a more favourable footing with respect to the exercise of the franchise than another. I accept the principle, “ Let every man stand upon the same basis.” But will he, if this Bill passes as you have introduced it? No, he will not; and that you must perfectly well know. You leave the law as it stands with respect to the £10 householder, who, on paying the landlord's composition, if the landlord has not already paid it, and without paying anything if the landlord has, is entitled to be put on the register and to have a vote. Now, I want an answer to this question, and I hope that when the right hon. Gentleman addresses the House he will give that answer. Is it meant in Committee to adhere to this part of the Bill? Is it meant to leave the £10 householder in a more favourable position than those below him because the law at present gives him that position? You do not by the Bill alter the law in this respect, and you let the richer man acquire a vote on easier conditions than the poorer man, for the former may get upon the register after half the period of residence, or if he only occupies part of a house, and without paying a farthing additional, though the landlord who has compounded may only have paid one-half the rate; while you say to the man assessed one sixpence below £10 that he shall not come upon the register unless he pays the full rate. I say, Sir, that the measure stands self-condemned on this point. But the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General was very candid, and told us that from the time of the passing of the Reform Bill to that unhappy year 1851—when Sir William Clay introduced a certain unfortunate Bill, which, still more unfortunately, has become law—until then the Reform Act required everybody to pay the full amount of the rate. I wish my hon. and learned Friend had given us his authority for that statement. I do not believe it. I do not believe that such a thing has ever been established as law under the construction of the Reform Act, and I hold in my hand the words from which I draw this conclusion—

U 2 [Second Reading—Second Night.

"And upon such occupier so claiming and actually paying or tendering—'What?'—the full amount of the rate or rates, if any, then due in respect of such premises."

But nothing was due in respect of such premises except the sum legally payable; and the Act goes on to say that if the landlord has paid it nothing is due of course; but that if the landlord has omitted to pay it, then the occupier has to pay it. The Reform Act did not expressly add that the occupier paying what was legally due from his landlord might deduct it from his rent; but the law would, without express words, give him that right if it was the contract between the landlord and the tenant that the landlord should pay the rate, as in these cases of composition it always is. Sir William Clay only made clear and express what was the law before. But suppose it were otherwise.

I now come back to the Solicitor General. He says, "Oh! that was bad legislation; the present Bill is good legislation, and the former Act ought to be repealed." Then, where is your settlement of the question? You say your new franchises are to be cumulative; they are to be additional to the old franchises, and not to interfere with them; you have the £10 householders, and you do not require them to pay the difference. And then the Solicitor General says this is justified, because the £10 householders' law is a bad law and ought to be altered. Why, then, does he not alter it? I suppose the right hon. Gentleman means to propose in Committee that the £10 holders shall pay up this difference. If he does make such a proposition I hope to offer some reasons to induce the House to pause before they accede to it. Not only do I say it is wrong in principle as well as inconsistent and unjust to have this distinction between the two classes; but I want the House to see what a total departure from every principle hitherto recognised or contemplated you will make if you adopt the view that the difference of the rate is to be paid. The Reform Act certainly said no such thing, and it is clear that Sir William Clay's Act, as to the municipal franchise, the Small Tenements Act, and the Act 21 & 22 Vict., relative to compounders under Sturges Bourne's Act, have ruled to the contrary. You have had repeated legislation with regard to the Parliamentary and the municipal franchise on the principle that the whole rate is to be treated as paid by payment of the composition; and even the Committee of the House of Lords in 1859, although they were more impressed than I am with the evils which they thought were introduced into the mode of conducting municipal elections by the lower class of householders, yet what did they recommend? Did they recommend this? Nothing of the kind. They never recommended as a condition of the franchise that a man should pay what was not due. What they recommended was that the occupier under £6 should be admitted to claim to be rated on the same terms of payment as the landlord. At all events, therefore, it would be reversing the whole previous course of legislation if you were to agree to this proposition of the Government. But now I want to know whether this is not in principle a fine?

I now come back to the language of my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board. Commenting on the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, who had said—"Don't think that those small things are not galling. You remember that the 1s. formerly paid under the Reform Act for registration was felt to be galling, and you had soon to do away with it." In reply to that argument the President of the Poor Law Board said—

"The right hon. Gentleman says that a man will have, in consequence of the provision in the Bill, to pay for his vote, and he puts it on the footing of the 1s. which used to be paid for registration. But that 1s. was paid by a man for the purpose of being put on the registry; whereas the rates are paid because they are due from the man." —[3 Hansard, clxxxvi. 512.]

I take issue upon that point with my right hon. Friend. I say that the small occupier wishing to obtain the franchise will have to pay money which is not due from him, and which is not due from anybody else, and if it is not due, it is to all intents and purposes a fine. How is the difference between the amount at which he would be rated and the rate actually paid by the landlord due by the occupier or by anyone else? If it were due now, some one would have to pay it. The fact is you make it due as the price of the occupier's vote. You sell him the vote for that sum of money. That is the simple truth of the matter. But then it is said, if it is not so it ought to be so. And my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) said, "It is plain common sense to say that if a man comes in and has a vote, he should pay the same as anybody else. But I have just been showing that he will not pay the same as the £10 compound householder now pays; and therefore I say that it is not so simple a matter of common sense. But what is the meaning of this composition? Under those Acts, for the purpose of the convenient collection of rates, a double system has been introduced. In 1819, and again when the Small Tenements Act was passed, and when several local Acts were passed, it was thought advantageous for the local interests, practically, to employ the owner as a collector of the rate from the occupiers. It was perfectly well known that what the owner paid he would get—and probably much more—in the rent; and it was thought an economical and convenient arrangement, because it might happen that he would occasionally not be able to collect the rent, to allow him a sort of discount or commission for the collection. It was, under the Small Tenements Act, arranged that 75 per cent should be rated on the owner instead of the 100 which would have been put on the occupier; and by that and other Acts a further composition was allowed, reducing the payment to 50 per cent, if the owner paid upon all the houses belonging to him, taking upon himself the risk of some of them remaining unoccupied. What reason in the world is there why you should make the occupier pay the owner's commission if he is put on the rate instead of the owner? It is more extravagant and absurd still if the occupier is required to pay that portion of the rate which the owner is allowed as a compensation for the chance of some of the houses remaining unoccupied. He pays in the lump upon occupied and unoccupied houses, and is therefore granted an advantage. Is the tenant to pay that? Is the tenant to pay for the unoccupied house that is covered by the landlord's composition? The whole theory depends on an utter misconception of the nature of this discount and allowance. That which the landlord pays is the amount of the rate, and the sum allowed to him as discount is money paid for the benefit which those interested in the rate are supposed to get in consequence of the payment of the rate being made by him. If anybody is interested in the payment of the rates, surely it is the local community; but a man may obtain municipal privileges without the payment of this discount or commission. Should we, then, impose such a payment for the privilege of voting to return a Member to Parliament, which has nothing to do with local burdens, while for the exercise of a privilege in connection with the local community, and consequently with local burdens, nothing of the kind is required?

I come next to a remarkable passage in the speech of my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board, which shows me that, notwithstanding his ability, he is not himself master of this Bill which he is here to advocate. He did not know what it contained. He thought it ought to contain something which it not only does not contain, but which, I venture to say, could not by possibility be put into it. My right hon. Friend said that of course the tenant would deduct from the rent he now pays his landlord the sum which he will have to pay in rates. The right hon. Gentleman observed that the provisions of the existing law were made a part of the Bill, and that a man when he paid his rates would have a right to recover against his landlord. But, under the existing law, you do not oblige him to pay anything, except what the landlord is by law compelled to pay; and if the tenant pays what is the landlord's proper burden, he can recover it by the ordinary operation of the law. The question, however, is not as to the payment of the proper amount of the rate, but as to the payment of what we take the liberty still, notwithstanding all that has been said on the other side, of calling "the fine"—namely, the extra payment for which the landlord is not liable, but which you impose on the occupier as the price of the franchise. My right hon. Friend laid down that the occupier would have the power to recover from the landlord the full amount he had paid. He observed—

"I can only say that they were meant to be, and that a man shall be entitled to recover from his landlord the amount he has paid. It is obvious justice requires that it should be so. Nobody will suppose that the Bill meant to make both the landlord and the tenant pay the rate. Then would there indeed be a fine. The provision of this Bill is, that where the occupier claims to be rated he shall be entitled to recover from the landlord the amount of rates he has paid in the rent."—[3 Hansard, clxxxvi. 512.]

I took the liberty, no doubt improperly, of interrupting my right hon. Friend; but, regarding the point as one of much importance, I asked him to what section he alluded, and he referred me to the 34th clause, which is in these terms—

"Where the owner is rated in respect of a dwelling-house instead of the occupier, the occupier may claim to be rated for the purpose of acquiring the franchise in the same manner and subject to the same conditions in and subject to which an occupier may claim to be registered under the existing Acts of Parliament for the purpose of acquiring the franchise in respect of the occupation of premises of a clear yearly value of not less than £10, and all the provisions of the said Acts shall apply accordingly, provided that the rates to be paid by such occupier in order to entitle him to the franchise shall be rates calculated on the full rateable value of the premises."

Now, observe that those who drew the proviso at the end of this clause must have known well that they were attaching conditions to the new franchise which do not attach to the old. The clause merely states that the occupier may come in and claim to be rated in the same manner as the occupier of a £10 house may now claim to be registered. But is any £10 householder enabled to recover any sum in excess of that paid by his landlord? No, because he is not liable to more. In respect of a £10 house, of which the landlord pays the rates, the occupier need only pay them if the landlord is in arrear. If the landlord is bound to pay them, but allows them to get into arrear, and the tenant pays them for him, the tenant is left to recover the amount by the ordinary process of law. But he does not pay anything more than the landlord is liable to pay, and does not recover more. Now, if this plan were passed into law, how would it act? Under some of the statutes the landlord is obliged to compound one full half. Suppose, therefore, that a landlord had 100 houses rated at £8, and that fifty of them were full and the remaining fifty empty, and that he pays a composition at the rate of £4 for each of them. Of course, he would make that good by putting at least £8 on each of the occupied tenements; so that, in point of fact, he would recover from them the full rate; and yet, when one of the tenants desires to come in for a vote, you would make him pay over again, by compelling him to bring up his rate to the full amount, so as to cover the allowance which the landlord has got for the unoccupied houses, and for which allowance the landlord has been fully indemnified, as far as the actual payment is concerned. Then I want to know how the measure would work in other cases. Take, for instance, the case of the aggregate rating at Stockport, to which I have already referred. How are you to divide it? Or take the case of frequent changes of residence in the occupied houses within the required time, and

of different rates, and see what a deal of trouble you would impose upon a man who desired to have a vote; and all these difficulties will inevitably make themselves felt if such a provision is to become law. But you have not got any such provision in your Bill; and I say that the right hon. Gentleman does not know his own Bill when he thinks that there is any such proposition in it. If you try to introduce it, you will have to encounter all the difficulties I have mentioned. But, apart from this, I ask for what reason ought the landlord to be mulcted for the benefit of those tenants who desire to claim the franchise? Yet this would be the effect of such a provision. But it is quite evident that it was the improvised idea of my right hon. Friend. It is not the law, and I hope it never will be. It is monstrous that you should disturb and unsettle contracts and economical arrangements made for the greater advantage and convenience of the parties interested in local taxation, under laws passed for that purpose, merely to discover a mode of impeding and restricting the operation of a new Parliamentary franchise.

I will not occupy the House with dwelling on the practical difficulties which my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General makes so light of. He argued that they would be no worse than what have existed under the Reform Bill, and that we know how to manage these things. Well, but it is one of the objections that it is so easy to manage them—that they would be managed so very unequally—that in some cases they would be so managed as to put such an immense number of persons upon the list as to swamp the constituency, and that in other cases they would be kept off altogether. That sort of management will not be prevented by the clause about the corrupt payment of rates. What is a corrupt payment of that description to consist of? You must define it by some other words than you have got in your present Bill.

Well, I will now pass from this subject, and I come to another point, upon which I shall not say much to-day, though certainly I cannot treat it as one of trivial importance—I mean the principle of dual voting. Sir, when we came down to the House yesterday, I think many hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House expected that we should have been relieved from the discussion of this question. I fully thought that the Government would take an opportunity, and an early opportunity, of throwing that lumber overboard. But it is not so. We are required to bring forward our arguments against it; and my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board have brought forth their arguments in favour of it. And what were those arguments? They may be summed up in one felicitous phrase made use of by the Solicitor General, who accompanied it by his happy reference to the antiquities of English history and the reign of Henry VI. The felicitous phrase was this, that "half a loaf is better than no loaf at all." My hon. and learned Friend argued thus:—"How can you complain of there being a favoured class, a privileged class"—and most of the £10 householders, no doubt, would be included in that privileged class—"how can you complain of their being gifted with a double vote, of their voice being made twice the value of that of others? For see how much better off you are who have a single vote than those who have no vote at all." Now, Sir, the thought did occur to my mind when I heard this argument, that there was a little undercurrent towards universal suffrage in that way of putting the question. The suggestion of the grievance of those who have got no vote at all, and how thankful those ought to be, by comparison, who have got even half a vote—I must say that this did not appear to me, on the whole, to be a remark of a very Conservative tendency. But it is of more importance to observe that this remark did lay bare the very essence of this proposal, which is to grant a half enfranchisement instead of a whole enfranchisement; because it is quite plain that it makes no earthly difference whether I give a man below me half a vote, retaining my own vote at its present value, or give him what I call a whole vote, and at the same time double the value of my own. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not profess to be able to state fully what the effects of this provision would be; but I apprehend that they would be—if it were possible to imagine that it could be adopted—of a much more large and potent character than the right hon. Gentleman shadowed forth in his speech. And, Sir, whether or no it is thrown overboard—as I have no doubt it will be—it will remain to stamp the character of this Bill with respect to the purpose for which it was introduced. Why has this provision—not without forethought, not without deliberation, and not without a place for repentance being several times given—why has this provision to the last and up to this very moment adhered to the Bill? and why is there now so much hesitation about throwing it overboard? Because, as my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board said, the favourite principle of the Bill is that of limitation, and not that of enfranchisement. Well, then, I say, as far as this is the case, those whose object is enfranchisement, and whose main object is not limitation—they certainly are bound to be on their guard if the Bill goes into Committee; and if they consider that they cannot sufficiently protect their object when in Committee, they will be well justified in taking care, in such other way as may seem best to them, that the purpose of limitation rather than of enfranchisement, entertained by hon. Gentlemen opposite, is not fulfilled.

I have kept the House so long that I really do not like to go into other matters; but there are still two points of considerable importance upon which I wish to say a word. One is with respect to the county franchise. We have here exactly the same provision promised us as with the borough franchise—an invidious line is to be drawn between the present constituency and the future one—the £50 occupier is not obliged to pay any rates at all by the present law in order that he may have a vote; but the Bill proposes that the new county occupiers must be rated, and must pay their rates, before they can claim the franchise.

Then with regard to the special franchises. Now, I am perfectly free in this matter, and I mean to exercise my freedom. I have been no party, directly or indirectly, to any Bill containing such franchises, except the Bill of last year. With respect to the saving banks franchise in that measure, I took the liberty of saying that I regarded it as by no means the best portion of the Bill, which was as much as saying that, as far as I individually could, I disapproved it. I venture to say that the whole of these franchises, from beginning to end, are utterly wrong. They are wrong in principle, and untenable and unsettling in practice. When I say wrong in principle, let me for a moment apologize to the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill). I do not like to pronounce a principle wrong in the abstract of which he is the advocate. I do not think I shall be misunderstood; I mean only to express my personal respect for the hon. Member, not of course that I agree with this or that particular opinion which he may entertain. The hon. Member has put on the paper notice of his intention to propose in Committee—if we reach that stage—certain clauses which shall substitute the principle of personal representation in the place of local representation. The hon. Gentleman holds to the well-known method of Mr. Hare, which would be no doubt a very effectual mode of carrying out that principle. But it is not at present the principle of our Constitution. We go now upon that of local representation; our counties are large communities; and though they may in some respects no doubt be artificially defined, yet by the associations of our whole history they have acquired a certain species of reality in the minds of men. And so with regard to our boroughs, our cities, and our Universities—in each case there is a living body politic, which is the seat and local centre of representation. The whole of our present system is founded upon it; our present franchises are all local franchises. You have your freeholders and occupiers in the counties; you have your householders in the boroughs. But these special franchises will cut you adrift from that principle altogether and, if they are accepted, will not land you in any consistent results. They are personal, and not local in any proper sense; they depart from the one principle, and do not develop or satisfy the other; there is no reason whatever that I can see for them. The lodger franchise, indeed, would be an exception; because that is, in fact, a franchise given to a person who occupies part of a house, under circumstances similar, though we are not able to apply all the terms of the definition, to the person who occupies a whole house. But with respect to those merely personal franchises, I venture to say that while they would be totally insufficient to satisfy any principle, they are also, as they stand, either objectionable or needless. Take the first of them, that which proposes to confer the franchise on the graduates of our Universities. What claim have they to it? You have already given them their own local representation. The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge already return Members; and under this Bill the University of London would return a Member. There is the proper place for their graduates. Your ministers, your lawyers, your schoolmasters, will be householders, or lodgers; they are part of the class which, at all events, a lodger franchise would introduce, and there is therefore no reason for a special franchise for them. I come next to the savings bank franchise. What does that mean? I know very well that in what I am going to say I may be separating myself, in some degree, from some of those whose judgment I respect; but I feel bound to say what I think on this subject. What does this savings bank franchise mean? It is a petty property qualification for a special poor class of people. By all means admit poor and rich by any well-considered franchise which is applicable to all; but do not invent a petty property qualification for the sake of one class—probably a very special class, of poor persons—household servants, and others of that description. Well, then, we come to another still more absurd and preposterous—the qualification of £50 funded property. Why, in the name of all that is reasonable, should it be “funded” property. When you had that old incumbrance, the property qualification for Members of Parliament, it was once, but did not continue long to be, limited to landed or funded property. Why limit the qualification, if you are to have anything of the sort, to this particular mode of investment? Do not you see that it could not possibly stand there—that there is no kind of principle in it—that you are merely introducing a new element of change which cannot possibly stop at the point at which you have put it? The direct taxation franchise has been sufficiently dealt with by those who have preceded me, and I have reached the limit of the observations I have to offer.

For my own part, I share fully in the wish that something, if possible, may be made of this Bill; and if the House thinks it can make something of it in Committee, I do not hesitate to say that, for one, I should prefer to go into Committee. But most assuredly I agree with those who say that if this Bill passes substantially as it stands you will neither be improving the representation of the people nor settling this question; and therefore it is the bounden duty of the House to prevent such a consummation as that.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I hope that all who agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, in the opinion that household suffrage has in it essential merits to recommend it to the country as the basis of borough representation, will be prepared to go into Committee on this Bill. I agree with my hon. and learned Friend that the borough franchise is the main feature of this Bill; and I agree with him in placing, in a comparatively subordinate position, the attention and consideration which should be given to the other franchises which it contains. The borough franchise in this Bill rests on a principle intelligible and free from doubt; there is no obscurity about it. He who runs may read. The humblest individual in the kingdom, and the lowest in point of education, can understand this—that the borough franchise here contained is conferred upon the rated and ratepaying occupier of a house. If there be a word that requires definition it is this—the word “occupier?” You do not intend that it shall mean an individual who enters the house the day before the election and leaves it the day afterwards. Some description must be given of the word “occupier,” and even in the democratic constitutions of America some conditions are laid down with which a man must comply to become an occupier within the meaning of the law. But it is introduced not for the purpose of excluding from the franchise those to whom it had previously been given, but simply as part of the description of those to whom it is extended, and the period fixed is a two years’ occupancy. Admitting that the borough franchise will be placed on a wholesome basis by extending it to household suffrage, the arguments urged have been mainly directed against subordinate points—it has been argued that the manner, the form, and the condition on which we propose that the franchise shall be enjoyed is open to objection. I venture to ask, is there any justice in that mode of argument? Is it not our duty, first of all, to consider whether this basis be a sound one for the borough franchise? We ought to look at it first in the abstract, and to consider afterwards the manner, the form, and the condition (not the limitations) under which this ample qualification is to be enjoyed. We must bear in mind that the inquiry we have to make is whether this is not the most satisfactory mode left to us of settling the franchise consequent on the measure of 1832. For collateral purposes it is no doubt useful to refer to our ancient Constitution; but in determining what ought to be done to-day we must take our departure from 1832—we must accept it as a fact. It is in vain to go further back. At the time of the passing of that Act two questions were argued—first, whether it gave promise in it itself of supplying the means of good Government; and next, whether it contained any principle of fixity and permanence? I admit frankly that I was one of those who thought that the measure of 1832 was objectionable upon both these points. I doubted whether a House of Commons elected under it would harmonize with the other parts of our Constitution; and I feared it would lead, at no distant day, to other and greater changes in the representation. I admit that I was wrong in thinking it unlikely to lead to present good Government; but it is another question whether the apprehension that it did not contain any principle of fixity has not been justified.

After the Act of 1832 passed, the then great Leader of the Conservative party foretold that it would ultimately be the duty of Conservatives to stand by that measure; and I will say that the Conservative party beyond all doubt have been loyal to that measure. Though they by no means approved the principle which fixed the limit of enfranchisement at the £10 householders, they were not the persons to break down the line. Of course, it was not right to surrender a stand-point, however imperfect, without being sure that it was the wish of the country really to abandon it. It has been stoutly maintained; but it has been found impossible longer to maintain it. I do not think it has been obstinately maintained; but the time has come when it was plain that the principle of the Act of 1832 must be extended. Everybody who has spoken in this debate has distinctly admitted that change of some kind was necessary; and, that being so, the question is, in what direction should we proceed? You cannot recede, you must take the direction of the Act of 1832—something must be done to extend the franchise; the existing line must be given up. Will you simply adopt another figure in place of the present one; or will you not rather look for some new and better definition of the franchise? The hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) has distinctly admitted that household suffrage is a resting place, and a much more lasting one than any figure we can fix upon. It gives us, my hon. and learned Friend said, the very elements of a constituency.

I agree with that—defined as household

suffrage is in the Bill—namely, the rated and ratepaying occupation of a house. That is the principle which is advocated by the Bill now before us. It requires from the voter the possession of that which is of the first necessity, and the discharge of that which is the first duty in civilized society—the possession of a roof over his head—the discharge of his obligations to the State. I say, then, that if we have got to this point we have obtained a clear and definite principle, and one on which all may rely. It may not be comprehensive enough to suit some classes of Reformers; but I venture to say that it is comprehensive enough to satisfy any class of Liberals—at least, to satisfy that class which constitutes the majority of the party in this House. Another question may, indeed, arise, whether it ought to be accepted by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. But the experience we have had of former Reform Bills, the knowledge we have of the feeling of the country, the description of the class who are to have a vote—that is, any persons who have occupied their houses and paid their rates for two years—ought to take away from us all practical apprehension of danger from the immediate operation of the measure itself. The immediate and the important question for us to consider is, whether these qualifications do not give us as good a security for the exercise of the franchise as the fixing of a certain amount of rent. The other and more difficult question is, how far is this measure calculated to afford us the prospect of permanency? Now, in speaking of permanency in human affairs, nobody means immutability—we speak only of that degree of permanency which we expect to find in human affairs; and looking at the measure in that point of view, I say it does afford us the prospect of such a permanency. Nor do I now speak of permanency considered in reference to the life of an individual, but in reference to the life of a nation. What might be sufficient in dealing with the interests of an individual would be wholly insufficient in dealing with the interests of a nation, where we ought to expect that more than a quarter of a century will elapse before we are called upon to try some new experiment. And I say boldly that in this Bill a broad and distinct and yet flexible line is adopted which takes the first elements of the constitution of society, as to what voters must possess and the duties they must discharge. I say that in this

you have the prospect of a permanency which it is simply idle to say that a £6 or an £8 rental would afford. The old argument would for ever return—why should those below £8, why should those below £6, be excepted from the franchise? But when it is decided that not any amount of rent, but the simple fact of being rated and paying his rates in respect of the house he occupies, entitles a man to the franchise, I maintain that you have here a prospect of permanency which does not exist in any other experiment that has yet been tried. I hold, therefore, that this measure is one which it would be wise for this House to adopt, comprehensive enough to satisfy all the reasonable demands of the Liberal party, and safe enough for the Conservative party to adopt.

Then I come to the objections which have been taken to the manner, the mode, the conditions on which this franchise is to be enjoyed. This, I must say, has hitherto been the whole burden of the arguments that have been urged against this measure. I maintain that the real place for the discussion of all these objections is the Committee. You have got the principle settled—the principle which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond says he approves of—the principle of the rated and ratepaying occupation of a house. [Sir ROUNDELL PALMER: I said a rated house.] Well, my hon. and learned Friend prefers to put it in that way. At any rate, we have got the principle of a rated occupancy fixed, and I say that everything else ought to be left to the Committee. But let us consider it. The first question with which we have to deal is whether the vote shall be given to the occupant of a rated house, or to the rated and ratepaying occupier of a house? Is it not a distinct and clear advantage that the occupier should also be the ratepayer? Is not that a guarantee when you are desirous of finding an instrument for good Government? It is said that this qualification was put in as a check to democracy. Is that necessarily an objection to it? We need not go back to find what was the precise basis of representation in our early history; but if we do so, it is clear that a Conservative element has always prevailed in this country, and in this House; and that in your Reform Bills you want a constituency that will work in harmony with the Constitution, that will continue to work, as the House of Commons has hitherto worked, in harmony with the House of Lords and the Sovereign; and I say that it would be no objection to the qualification of the rating and rate-paying clause if it were found to work in that direction; on the contrary, it will be an essential qualification if necessary for that end, and I say that this qualification is simply the description of a class. The occupier of a rated house is not enough; that description defines a class very different from that which is defined in the present Bill. I confidently put it to the House whether, for the purpose of the franchise, the rated and ratepaying occupier of a house is not a better description than the occupier of a rated house? I have little fear of the decision of the House if that question were put to it; and I have little doubt it would prefer a constituency of rated and ratepaying occupiers of houses rather than of the occupiers of rated houses, no matter who was rated or by whom the rates were paid. Then we come to the alleged inconsistency of permitting differences between the constituency under the old Reform Bill and the constituency under the new Bill. I ask you to consider on this point what is possible to be done, and what it is impossible to do. As I understand, it is admitted you must respect and cannot interfere with the old constituency established under the Act of 1832; and if that be the case, then I say that, in maintaining the existing constituency, you are not introducing safeguards or drawing distinctions between class and class. You are simply making a distinction between qualifications created in 1832, and qualifications it is thought right to create now. The different times at which the two measures were introduced will sufficiently reconcile the community to any distinctions that may exist.

I come, then, to the other arguments which, as I have already said, are more properly fit for the Committee. A great argument has been that the Bill is not adapted or applicable to the existing state of things. We are told that it is impossible to apply the principle of personal rating and payment of rates to those householders where the owner of a large number of houses compounds for them and is rated, and pays the rates. Why not? What is the difficulty? Surely it is a very simple process. You have got the simplest enunciation of the franchise, the rated and ratepaying occupier. Is there any difficulty in putting into words so simple a proposition? If any Acts of Parliament stand in the way, can they not be modified? Just consider what it is you propose. Simply that the occupier of a house shall have a right to insist on being placed on the rate book, and upon being put on the register on his paying such rates as are in the rate book, or as by law are due. Is there any difficulty in that? None. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire said that when the Act of 1850 was passed it effected a great social and moral revolution, by establishing a new mode of collecting rates; and, with an emphasis which those who heard him will not easily forget, he read this passage to explain the great social and moral revolution which took place—

“Whereas the collection of highway rates assessed upon the occupiers of small annual value is expensive, difficult, and frequently impracticable, and it is expedient to make proper provision for the collection of such rates.”

A Bill, then, the object of which was to remove difficulties in the way of collection of rates, is said to be a revolution:—a Bill to enable those persons who desire personally to be rated, and to pay their rates, and who say, “Put me upon the rate book; take my money; I am willing to pay,” is said to stand in the way of a franchise which depends upon rating and the payment of rates. That is an extravagant proposition. It is said that you have numberless difficulties thrown in the way of the ratepayer. I have difficulty in enumerating the long bead-roll. There are, it is said, the difficulties of knowing the law; of knowing that he must obey the law; of finding where the rate collector lives; of claiming to be rated; of paying the rate; of claiming to be put upon the register; and finally, of seeing that he is put upon the register. There are other difficulties raised of this nature; but they are mere words, the meaning of which is lost in the sound. There is nothing in them. The whole of them comes to this—all that the occupier who desires to vote has to do is to claim to be rated, and to pay his rate. The proposition is so simple that I cannot understand how these difficulties can have any real existence, and if they do exist, I am sure they can easily be removed. A great deal has been said about the compound-householder being “fined” if he tries to obtain a vote. What is the meaning of this objection? Is it seriously intended that, in the long run, a contract between landlord and tenant will not settle itself; and that as soon as it is found that there are tenants willing to pay their rates, they will not find landlords with whom they could make arrangements for their rents consequential on that? It is simply a question of supply and demand. The whole difficulty, if there be one, would simply rest upon the first year or so after the Act came into operation. After the first year everything will be settled, and the occupier, if he claims to be rated and pays his rates, will get as much as he pays in reduction of rent. The landlord will ultimately lose nothing; he will not have any of the risks of payment. The tenant will be rated, and the whole argument of the compound-householder being "fined" falls to the ground fully after the Act comes into operation. I at first supposed that the right hon. Gentleman opposite meant to say that possibly the tenant might be called upon to pay a second time the rate which the landlord had already paid; but, of course, that is not so. Then it is said that the tenant may pay the rate, and may not be able to recover it from his landlord; but that is not the true construction to be placed upon the Bill as it stands. It was certainly not so intended. The whole question is covered by the 34th section. The tenant, where the owner is rated, may claim to be rated for the purpose of acquiring the franchise; and then the clause goes on to prescribe the manner and conditions on which he shall do so, maintaining the manner and conditions found in all existing Acts with respect to the payment of rates by persons who, as occupiers, are not liable to pay themselves, but who pay through their landlords. The construction and legal effect of the provision, as I understand it, is that the tenant paying the rate would have a right to deduct the amount of it from his rent. If that is not sufficiently clear, however, it could easily be remedied in Committee, and all dispute on the point avoided. The whole of this question of the "fine" rests upon the difference between commuted value and the full value for the first year or two after the Act has come into operation. The tenant is to pay the full value and the landlord the commuted value; and in some cases that may produce a difficulty for a year or two, but it only comes to this after all—that the question of paying the full value is open to consideration. However, I believe it is right that the occupier should pay the full value. The petition from the people of Wolverhampton, recently presented in "another place," says that "a claim to vote should be supported by giving up the relief of composition and paying the full rate." I believe that that is the sound view. That if a man chooses to claim the franchise he must pay the rate in the same manner as other ratepayers, and the most that could happen would be that he would pay the difference for the first year or so until the law of contract stepped in, and the form of contract would be so altered as to set the matter right. I do not believe that there would be any practical difficulty in the case.

We now come to a further argument of a very remarkable character. It is said that this provision will give great facilities for bribery—it is said that these voters will be handed over to political agents who will say to the tenant, "We will claim the vote for you, and we will pay the rates;" and it is said that there will be no difficulty in doing this, and that there will be no way of preventing such a course by this or any other Act of Parliament. But I say that, where you have a candidate who is above bribery, and electors who are also above bribery, there are no facilities and no danger; but if you have a candidate and electors who are, the one willing to give and the other willing to receive bribes, it is idle to talk of facilities for bribery. All that is wanted is that there should be money or money's worth to change hands, and there are no greater facilities for bribery given by this Bill than existed before. As the law exists now there are unlimited facilities for bribery by the payment of rates. I cannot, therefore, understand how we are said to be handing over the voters to the political agents. May not other classes of voters be handed over to political agents also? Is this handing over peculiar to one class? May it not be just as easy, if you take a household voter under a household suffrage pure and simple, or if you take a £5 voter? And if you take universal suffrage, may not the result be that the voters may be equally liable to be handed over to political agents, until you have Government in one place by a "caucus," and in another place by an Emperor? It is idle to say that you hand this particular class, more than any other, over to the political agents. It is an idle argument, of no avail. The real question for consideration is—Is this Bill founded upon a wise and sound basis for a borough franchise? I venture to say that it is. The borough franchise, which is the real main feature of the Bill, stands upon grounds which cannot be controverted by any moderate Liberal. It may be open to question from those who have Conservative instincts and Conservative associations. Many of us have, doubtless, felt that there were grave considerations to be entertained before the Bill should be adopted; but we have felt that it was necessary that the franchise should be extended, and that we should come to some point that would afford a chance of permanence. It may be said, "If these are your views why do you not stop somewhere on the road? Why do you not try something farther in the shape of an £8 or a £6 rental?" My answer to that is that if you begin changing in that manner now you will be more rapid in your descent than if you make a broad change, and get to a more secure resting place at once. You would go on much more rapidly in your changes when once you had begun, and it would be most dangerous. When change becomes necessary and inevitable, it is better to make it at once—not with an idea of immutability—but selecting some line, some resting place, better than any amount of rental, such as household suffrage—and I am glad to have the authority of my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Roundell Palmer) for saying that household suffrage does afford a great security—for something like permanence. And I say, that with the conditions we propose, though we have not household suffrage pure and simple, but qualified by residence and payment of rates, we have reasonable assurance of permanence.

I shall not trouble the House by going into the other franchises. My hon. and learned Friend, however, thinks that a lodger franchise is a good franchise. If you go into that, however, in the spirit with which this Bill has been examined on the other side, I venture to say that it is far more impracticable and impossible of execution than anything to be found in the present Bill. Under the Bill as it stands every lodger whom it would be desirable to admit will be able to acquire the right of voting as an investor in the funds or in a savings bank, or by virtue of the educational franchise. There you will find all the elements for realizing what you desire from a lodger franchise; and no lodger whom it would be desirable to admit would be unable to acquire the suffrage. The difficulty of admitting the lodger as such is great, compared with the ease with which he can be placed upon the register by one of these other modes. My hon. and learned Friend asks us why we select one particular kind of investment, and do not select any other description of personal property? The reason is obvious. We do not take investments in trading or commercial speculations, which are constantly fluctuating; but we take investments in the national funds, which are ordinarily made with a view to permanence, and we say that if a man has a given amount of money in these for a certain period, you have in that fact a satisfactory presumption of his eligibility for the suffrage.

For these reasons I venture to think that the special franchises, as well as the borough franchise, stand on a safe foundation. As to the county occupation franchise, there is really nothing to discuss upon the second reading. Everybody is agreed that it ought to be extended, and the question, What should be its amount? has to be determined in Committee. So, again, with respect to the redistribution of seats—the moment it is conceded on the one side and the other that some enfranchisement and some disfranchisement are necessary, the principle of the Bill on that point is thereby admitted. In fact, there is only one question upon which there is any difference to be discussed on the second reading of the measure, and that is the borough franchise. I say the principle on which this Bill rests that franchise is the most favourable conclusion which the country is left to deduce from the Act of 1832 and its consequences. This measure is consequent upon that Act; and nothing, I think, remains for us that is more capable than this Bill is of forming a constituency which is likely to produce in the Members it returns an instrument of good Government adapted to the present circumstances and requirements of the country, and that there is no other basis to which you can point as affording so sure a resting-place for the franchise. For these reasons I trust the House will not only be prepared to assent to the second reading of this Bill, but will also in Committee see whether, by adopting household suffrage, defined as it is by the Bill, as the basis for the borough franchise, a measure may not be passed which will prove satisfactory to the country.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY had always felt it his duty to support the Government of the country as far as with consistency he could. It had been said—

Uncasy lies the head which wears a crown— and if that were true the Prime Minister of this country had difficulties enough to encounter without having to struggle with a factious opposition in the House of Commons. He (Sir Francis Crossley) had been sent to Parliament for two objects:—first, to sustain and extend the principles of free trade, and secondly to extend the franchise to the working classes. With regard to the former, he was well satisfied with the legislation of the last fifteen years in which he had taken part; but as regarded Reform he had been miserably disappointed. He had seen it bandied from side to side and from Government to Government. They had had Liberal Ministers who really cared about it; but they had had others to whom it was merely a profession. During the whole time he had sat in that House, however, he had never seen a more general disposition to settle a question which blocked the way to wise legislation on other matters, and was a serious injury to business. Looking at the conduct of the present Government towards their predecessors last year, he agreed with the noble Lord the late Secretary for India (Viscount Cranbourne) that not much indulgence for the Bill could be looked for from the Opposition Benches; but he did, nevertheless, hope that bye-gones would be allowed to be bye-gones. He did hope that there would be more disposition to pass a good Bill than to make small holes into large ones. He did hope that the House would do its best to amend the Bill as far as it was possible, so as to make it a practical measure and one capable of settling the question in a manner satisfactory to the country. If he understood the measure, it professed to extend the suffrage by a plan which would give it at once to all ratepayers, and would leave it to compound-householders to extend it amongst themselves at their pleasure. If that profession were really carried out he did not think there could be much objection to the Bill. He did, indeed, very much prefer that which had been brought in by the late Government last Session, because it selected the best portion of the working class to be enfranchised; whereas the present Bill left it to the householders themselves to claim to be put upon the register. Still, there was something to be said for the present proposal; for it would be a great convenience to make the rate book the register. He thought the Government must allow that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had shown the Bill would not do without alteration; for in many boroughs where the Small Tenements Act had been partially adopted all the householders on one side of a street might be enfranchised, whereas very few on the other would have the same privilege conferred upon them. It seemed to him that the Small Tenements Act should be made compulsory; that all householders above £5 should be obliged to pay their own rates; and that it should be left optional to those under £5 to claim to be rated and to be put upon the register. Then would come a question as to the amount of the composition. No doubt the landlord, as a wholesale customer, should be allowed to pay wholesale prices, while his tenant ought to be left to pay retail prices; but still, when the difference came to be 50 per cent, the difference struck him as too great. There were some parts of the Bill which appeared to be given up by general consent. For example, there was dual voting. The Solicitor General complained that no argument had been brought against it; but the hon. and learned Gentleman's own illustration was argument enough to condemn the proposition. When he pointed out that a £4 householder who paid 20s. a year in assessed taxes would have two votes, whereas a ratepayer of £50 or £100 a year might have only one, he had said quite enough to dispose of the plan. With these there was the question of voting-papers, the adoption of which he feared would lead to great abuse. They could not establish from the use of voting-papers in the election of guardians a rule with respect to the voting for Members of Parliament. With them there would be nothing easier than for a wealthy man to obtain a qualification in every county in England. He believed that he himself could at present vote for eighteen Members of Parliament; but if voting-papers became the law, he could extend his franchise to 200. In his judgment, if there was any objection on principle to dual voting it applied with tenfold force against voting-papers. There was one point in connection with the payment of rates on which he hoped the Government would give way, because they could do so without the surrender of any principle. What they required was that a man who wished for a vote should make his claim himself, and pay his own rates; but why should they bind him to a particular day for that purpose? They all knew that the men who collected the rates in boroughs were generally political partisans, who when an election approached took care to get in the rates from their own friends, but in the case of their opponents forgot to go until the day after the election, and so the vote was lost. But that was not the worst. In cases where parties were pretty equally balanced in a borough, and where party spirit ran high, there were men to be found who, although they had plenty of money for everything else, were always a few shillings short for their rates. Electioneering agents would soon get a friend to pay the rates for those who were short, and the process acted injuriously in this way—that when an honest man found that his neighbour had got his rates paid at one election he himself hung back for similar payment next time. Why, then, insist on the payment of rates when there was always a certainty of their being recovered? The Government required that a man should himself put his name in the rate book; but there was no security to make him in addition pay his rates, as a preliminary to voting. If the Government withdrew this condition the rates would still be paid, so there need not be any difficulty about the matter. With regard to the county franchise, he hardly had thought that a Government having the same leaders as in 1859, and who came down then to the House to propose that the qualification for the county franchise should be £10, could now come down and say that that franchise should be £15 rating. Let him look at that proposition. Her Majesty's Government said, "If you extend the franchise to the working classes you must have a counterpoise;" but he said, that if they wanted a counterpoise the best way to get it would be to fix the county franchise at £10 rental, because the houses in counties were better than the houses in towns, and were occupied, not by the working but by the middle classes. Therefore, if they wanted a counterpoise to the boroughs, there was one ready to their hands. He certainly expected, both from the House and the Government, that they would not have anything worse than the Bill of last Session, but that at least the county franchise would be lowered to what was then carried by a majority. With regard to the redistribution of seats, he thought that the present measure was defective in not going far enough; but, that in as far as it went, it would bear a comparison with the proposal of last Session. The giving a third Member to places where they were not wanted was not so good as dividing the counties, and giving Members to places which had recently grown into importance. What the present measure was defective in was, that it stopped short in settling the question. He thought it would have been better to deal with the question now, than to leave it open until after the Reform Bill had come into operation. He had one word to say with respect to the disfranchised boroughs. There was no one in that House who would go further in the punishment of bribery than himself; but he did not wish to punish the innocent with the guilty. Those boroughs which had been exposed were not so much worse than many others that they should be altogether deprived of Parliamentary representation. The deprivation of one Member would in his judgment be sufficient punishment, and the right hon. Gentleman could prosecute those who should be found guilty of offering or receiving a bribe. He did not wish to overlay the present Bill with all that he thought necessary to be done as remedies against bribery; but he feared that they never would find a sufficient remedy until they had obtained the ballot. Suppose they were to begin by trying the experiment of the ballot in a few places, when he believed it would work so well that it would soon be adopted in all the constituencies.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that difficult as this question undoubtedly was, he was bound to say that if it were approached on both sides of the House in the spirit which had been developed in recent speeches much of the difficulty would vanish, and they would come to the question with a more anxious desire to settle the matter than had been exhibited hitherto. For his own part, he must say that he had a strong desire to come to some settlement of the question. He believed that it had been too long bandied about from one party to the other, and that both parties were overlaid with promises which there was little hope of getting realized. Therefore it was that he listened with great pleasure to the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he rose to address the House, and proposed a measure which he intended should settle this question. Now, the House of Commons must decide one way or the other what was to become of this Bill. If they on both sides of the House were anxious—and he believed that those on the Government side were sincerely anxious—for a settlement of this question, he did not see any reason why they should not pass a just, fair, and reasonable measure of Reform in the present Session. He considered that it would be a reproach to the House if they failed to pass such a measure. When they considered that in this country the settlement of almost every great question was a compromise between the two great parties in the State, he thought that they were bound to settle the present question now when they had the opportunity of doing so, and not to allow any light matter or difficulty to intervene between them and its settlement. He was bound, however, to say that there were some great and serious difficulties to be overcome before arriving at that desired consummation. Representing as he did a great and important constituency in the metropolis (Marylebone), he regretted to perceive that London was practically ignored in this Bill. When he heard of a proposition to increase the representation of Scotland, whose claims he admitted were great, he confessed he was surprised at seeing London treated with such neglect. Since the great Reform Act of 1832 London had almost doubled in size, in population, and in wealth. It seemed, then, most extraordinary that the state of the representation of London should be left nearly in the same position as it was by the Act of 1832. He also complained of the total absence in this Bill of a lodger franchise. Considering the high rents paid in London, both for houses and apartments, he was at a loss to conceive any sound reason why the lodger franchise should be omitted from the Bill. Although lodgers might be considered as rather migratory individuals, he thought that a residence of twelve months in the one house ought to entitle a man to the franchise. As far as London itself was concerned, he did not think that any Reform Bill would be satisfactory without a lodger franchise. It was true that people of a certain position might obtain the franchise by placing a certain sum of money in the funds or the savings banks; but what was to be done for the cream of the working classes employed in London who only occupied apartments in a house, but paid good rents every year for such accommodation? He was decidedly opposed to the principle of dual voting, believing it to be unjust and totally subversive of the Constitution. It would give rise to further agitation, and had a tendency to set class against class. He thought that the provision regarding dual voting was so objectionable that he was determined to give it his most strenuous opposition. The question of compound-householders was also one to which he had the strongest objections. It was no doubt right and proper that the voter should contribute in some degree to the State; and he contended that the compound-householders who were brought into existence by the Act of that House contributed their quota to the State by the payment of rates through the hands of their landlords. When they asked a man to pay directly himself the whole rate of the house he occupied, they were in reality depriving him with one hand of the franchise which they professed to give him with the other. Practically, the landlord was only the agent of the compound-householder, for he charged him in rent the amount which he paid for him in rates. This question was one, however, which he thought might be settled in Committee. With regard to the use of voting-papers, he was strongly opposed to the proposal; for he believed that however well the system might work in the case of the Universities, their use in large boroughs in Parliamentary elections would open up bribery, corruption, forgery, and fraud of every kind. He should therefore oppose that part of the Bill as not coming within the constitutional principle which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had laid down as the basis of the Bill. He hoped the House would hear no more of charges of inconsistency and references to previous Bills, for they had had quite enough of the tu quoque line of argument, and the wisest policy was to profit by experience, and to avoid those mistakes which had hitherto impeded a settlement of the question. Any party which effected that settlement would deserve the gratitude of the country, for while the public mind remained unsettled our national prestige was impaired, and we appeared to the world a divided people. It would be a great and serious reproach to them if they could not lay aside all party prejudices and feeling, and by mutual sacrifices satisfactorily settle the question for at least this generation. He had never been a party to obstruct any Government, and he never would give his vote against a fair and liberal proposition simply because it came from the Conservative side of the House. He again expressed a hope that this question would be settled this Session.

MR. LIDDELL said, that if they could all bring their minds to approach the subject under discussion in the spirit which had been exhibited by the last speaker, a settlement of the question might be nearer at hand than many persons expected. Before examining the provisions of the Bill, he should like to say one or two words upon the general aspect and position of the question. He, for one, concurred in the opinion expressed by the hon. Baronet (Sir Francis Crossley) that it was desirable that a settlement should, if possible, be arrived at in the present Session; for there was, he thought, great force in the remark which had a few evenings ago been made, to the effect that the country must be looked upon as disunited so long as it was postponed. The state in which it at present stood produced feelings which they must all regret, and which could only be allayed by the removal of the grievance. In order to arrive at that settlement great sacrifices must be made. The sacrifice of place was often a small sacrifice to make to obtain the confidence of the people in the sincerity of public men. But there were other sacrifices than those of office; there were sacrifices of opinion (or prejudices as some might consider them, which had not been rashly formed, but had been long entertained), and these sacrifices were very painful to honourable men. Such sacrifices had, however, been largely made at the shrine of public duty, and he believed they would be considered by the public as proofs of the sincerity of our public men in an attempt to settle this question. He wished now to make a few remarks upon the Bill before the House. When he first read the Bill it reminded him of a very pithy saying of the late Sidney Smith. A friend asked him if he had seen a certain new book; and his reply was, "Oh, yes, I have seen it and read it; and it contains a great deal of what is both new and true; but what is true is not new, and what is new is not true." That was a not inaccurate description of this Bill. The county franchise was true—it was a bond fide reduction of the franchise—but it was not new. It was nearly identical with the proposition of last year; and he thought it would have been wiser, and more respectful to the House if it had been identical. He thought it would throw into the counties a large amount of the town element, which would alter their constituencies; but that was one of the sacrifices which he thought those on the Ministerial side of the House were prepared to make, in order to arrive at the solution of the Reform question. The borough franchise, on the other hand, was a new franchise; but it was not, as it stood, a true one—that was to say, it did not propose a bond fide reduction. It was undoubtedly open to the accusation which had been made against it, that it took away with the one hand what it gave with the other. Now, he had always thought that when once the House of Commons made up its mind to depart from the present resting-place, and to confer the franchise on those who were anxiously desirous of possessing it—and there were many of the working classes, in his opinion, deserving of it—it should act in an ungrudging and unsuspecting spirit. He entertained that view, because a gift frankly conferred was likely to be valued; while a boon wrung from Parliament was likely to be regarded, not as a gift, but in the light of a victory. He would prefer giving less and giving freely and bond fide than to give more, and by some ingenious process to draw back again that which he appeared to give. These remarks were applicable to the dual vote, which the House, he believed, was not disposed to accept, which the country did not understand, and which he therefore looked upon as doomed. As the Bill was a measure of checks and balances—or, to adopt the phrase of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, compensation balances—it behoved the House very carefully to weigh those balances before going into Committee to see whether they might not be found wanting. He, for one, was not prepared to vote for household suffrage, which he did not believe that either the House or the country desired. Household suffrage was said not to be the proposition before them; but he wanted to look well at the safeguards, limitations, securities, or balances, or by whatever name they were called, upon the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, or else by some accident or other they might find them tumbling, they knew not how, into household suffrage in Committee. The safeguards in the Bill were three in number. Dual voting was one—but he looked upon that as gone. Then there were, besides, residence and rating. With regard to a residential qualification, it was a curious fact that the residence required for a municipal voter was longer than that proposed for a Parliamentary voter. In the first case, it was a residence of two years and eight months, and in the latter it was a residence of two years. The attention of the House had been drawn by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) to the valuable Report of the Committee of the House of Lords on the working of the municipal suffrage; but he must say that that Report had made a different impression on his mind from that produced on the mind of the hon. and learned Member. He would appeal with great confidence to the majority of the fifty-eight boroughs which had adopted the Small Tenements Act, by which the municipal voter was not required to pay his rates, but obtained his vote by residence, and would ask whether they were satisfied with the working of the municipal suffrage as it now stood. He believed that their reply would be in the negative. A curious fact had appeared in connection with the municipal suffrage. The town of Great Yarmouth, which he had never understood to be very remarkable for any great sensitiveness on the subject of purity of election, adopted the Small Tenements Act shortly after its passing; but so great were the scandals and increase of cost which occurred in the municipal elections that, at the end of two years, Whig, Tory, and Radical unanimously agreed to put an end to the operation of the Act in that town; and the increased rates collected under the Small Tenements Act were sacrificed in order to obtain greater purity of elections. He thought that case constituted a warning against the adoption of a simple residential franchise, which did not produce that independent class of voters best qualified to exercise the privilege. The next safeguard in the Bill was the rating qualification; and he thought that there could be no doubt that that was a good provision. It had evidently received the approval of the House, and he thought he perceived in quarters hostile to it last year a certain leaning towards it this year. But when they came to the practice, he was bound to say he thought any man of common sense and judgment would admit that the objections urged on account of the existing state of the law in respect to rating were so strong that unless a change in the law were proposed the principle of a personal payment of rates, which was the only safeguard in the Bill against simple household suffrage, became extremely difficult to adopt. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had dwelt too much on the "fine" imposed on the voter by being called on to pay the difference between the full amount of rate and the composition, according to which the owner undertook to pay the rate for all occupiers in places where compounding was not in practice paid the full amount of rate due. Then the right hon. Gentleman tried to make much of the point that the occupier paid the rate in his rent. But it so happened that an owner of small tenements who was examined before the Committee of the House of Lords stated that since he was rated for those premises he had not increased the rent on the occupier except in three instances, that he preferred taking a lower rental to getting an indifferent tenant, and that he was so much out of pocket. Whatever subtlety or refinement the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, or the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond might employ, he (Mr. Liddell) should not be persuaded that individual responsibility could be so efficiently secured as by the personal payment of rates. If Parliament once accepted the principle of a rating qualification as the basis of the Parliamentary franchise, he thought it would not be difficult to alter the law in respect to compound-householders so as to make it work well. The present state of the law placed too much power in the hands of the overseers for making bargains with owners of houses, and also placed the compound-householders under the influence of registration agents all over the country. He should have liked to have seen this mode of rating altered before rating was made the basis of the Parliamentary franchise. His noble Friend who usually sat by his side (Viscount Cranbourne), in the course of the observations he made the other evening, said, "Don't trust to personal rating; because, depend upon it, the soreness and irritation that will be produced in the voters will be such that the very first Parliament elected under it will sweep it away." Now, his answer to that was a simple, but he thought a complete one. They must trust those whom they intended to invest with political power; and, whatever the conditions, if reasonable, plain, and moderate, which Parliament chose to attach to the possession of the franchise, the voter's fulfilment of them would be the test of the sincerity of his desire to obtain the vote, as well as of his intention rightly to exercise it.

There were two other points on which he wished to say a few words. Great complaint was made against the Bill because it did not contain any provision for the enfranchisement of lodgers. He thought it well worth inquiry whether it was wise to enfranchise lodgers as a class. Of course, the class comprised a great many highly-respectable persons; but the very word "lodger" implied an unsettled condition. Evidence was better than argument. A most respectable working man was asked before the Committee of the Lords on the Municipal Franchise some questions on this subject. He had raised himself to an independent position, and even thought of becoming a candidate for one of the wards in the town where he lived: he said he had resided in the town for twenty-one years; during thirteen or fourteen years he had worked on a railway, but during that time he did not care a bit about town affairs: he took no interest in them till he had a house of his own and paid his rates. That was his description of a working man's own feelings, and he (Mr. Liddell) thought it was as applicable to things Parliamentary as to things municipal. A young man in that position, probably a lodger, if he did not care to meddle with the election of those who were to take charge of lighting, draining, ventilation, and everything which touched his social and sanitary interests, could scarcely be expected to take an interest in Imperial matters. Therefore, he saw objections to the enfranchisement of lodgers as a class. But the lodger, if an educated man, would have the franchise under the Bill; if a prudent and saving man, he would have the franchise under the Bill; if he was fond of amusement and, like most of them, got the key of the door from the landlord, he would have the franchise under the Bill—he would then be a tenant, not a lodger. He would show by the small sacrifices he would have to make that he was anxious to obtain the franchise, and that was a tolerable security that he would exercise it well. He therefore did not join with those who thought it essential to enfranchise the lodger class. Of course, in London this became a great question, where, from the dearness of houses, the lodger class was, ex necessitate rei, a very numerous one; and London had certainly very strong claims to a lodger franchise. With regard to the re-distribution of seats, he agreed that the scheme of the Government did not go far enough; he ventured to think a much larger scheme would have been more in accordance with the wishes of the House and the actual claims of the country. But then it must be considered that the larger the scheme, the more numerous would be the enemies which it would arouse, and therefore the Government had to consider what they would be best able to effect. His chief objection, however, to the smallness of the Government scheme was, it did not do what they had for years urged on that House; it did nothing to redress the inequality between the borough and county representation. Whether they considered population, growth of wealth, number of electors, or the number of members, the counties were vastly under-represented in that House. The boroughs returned 334 Members, and there were only 162 county Members. The scheme of the Government was just, so far as it went; but it did not go far enough. It left the great existing inequality unredressed, for it equally divided the number of seats available between the boroughs and counties. This was a matter which ought to command the attention of Parliament with a view to a remedy. An hon. Friend last night announced a scheme, which he did not very well understand, to include in the borough agricultural areas outside; but, then, he said the over-represented counties must agree to part with some of their Members. If his hon. Friend would point out to him where the over-represented counties were he would agree with him; but he held that the counties were not over-represented, but under-represented, by whatever test they chose to apply. He thanked the House for the kind attention with which these remarks had been received. He had endeavoured to make them not from one particular side of the question or another, being sincerely anxious that this question should be settled. He was sure that could only be done by sacrifice of opinion not on one side only, but on both sides. Many of those on the opposite side had, to their honour, expressed their willingness to sacrifice opinions. Those on the Ministerial side had made great sacrifices; and it would therefore be hard if they could not deal with this question and really settle it upon a broad and intelligible basis that would be satisfactory to the people of this country.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he was glad to find that the second reading of this Bill was not to be opposed, because he never could admit that so grave a question as Parliamentary Reform could be the exclusive property of any one party. The great Reform Bill of 1832 was opposed by a number of persons who by birth and education were Liberals, as well as by Tories; and it was perfectly true that the Bill of last Session was opposed—unwisely, as he thought—by those who now occupied the Treasury Bench; but it must be remembered that the first great blow it received, and from the effects of which it never recovered, and the finishing stroke, to which it at last succumbed, were not aimed by members of the party who were then in Opposition. He remembered the feeling of satisfaction with which he listened last Session to what he considered the modest proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire when he brought forward his Bill; and that feeling, he believed, was shared in by some of those who sat near him. But a change came over the spirit of the dream of those now in office, and it was determined to oppose the Bill by every means and at all hazards, and, as a party man, he supported them in their efforts to accomplish it. On the present occasion, however, he hoped a similar policy would not be pursued. The country was in an unhealthy state; and without referring to the Hyde Park riots, or the Trafalgar Square meetings, which he was ready to accept for what they were worth, they found wherever they went, whether in town or country, that no man was satisfied with the present House of Commons on the question of Reform, and the easiest criticism they met with was a good-natured jeer, which to his mind was more dangerous than the mere riots of a mob. With regard to the question of rating or rental, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in alluding to a vote that was taken on the Bill of last Session, said that the House by instinct had arrived at a great principle in our Constitution. Now he (Mr. Percy Wyndham) must say that on that occasion he arrived at a conclusion by instinct as contradistinguished from reason, for he gave his vote, as he had given many previous votes, for the mere object of getting rid of the measure neck and crop. When they were told that there was a difference between rental and rating for the basis of this question—no doubt he had not gone so deeply into the matter as other hon. Members had—he believed that each had its advantages, its difficulties, and its defects as the basis of the franchise; but when they were told that one had transcendent qualities over the other, he confessed that he could not see it. His hon. Friend the Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope) alluded to what had been called “the ten minutes’ Bill,” and said it did not meet with the approval of hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House. He (Mr. Percy Wyndham) strongly disapproved of that Bill. It appeared to him that it was a very feeble measure, inadequate to the occasion; and really if they got rid of the distinction between rating and rental, it was a luke-warm réchauffée of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. He should like to see a very wide measure of the re-distribution of seats based upon philosophical principles; but the principles laid down by his hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Butler Johnstone) he considered too Utopian. That measure was not, however, then under discussion; he would address himself further to the franchise question. If the present Bill were opposed on the Motion for going into Committee, he should certainly vote in its favour, but he regretted that they had not as yet heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the Government intended to stand by and what they intended to abandon; and he protested against their being called upon to vote for portions of the Bill which perhaps it was the intention of Her Majesty’s Government to withdraw. When they got into Committee every vote that he gave would be decided on the merits of the clauses, and he intended rather to support the Bill of the Government than the Government itself; because he thought it essential that, whatever the wording of the Bill might be, as it then stood, the actual bearing and effect of the clauses should be in accordance with the words of those clauses. And if the patient should prove to be of too delicate a constitution to bear this medical treatment—if he should sink beneath the hand—though he would greatly regret that they had not arrived at a settlement of this question during the present Session, he would rather trust to the good sense of the English people to defer the settlement to another Session, rather than to press the adoption of a bad measure, which would only disturb and unsettle everything, and tend to promote agitation.

MR. LAING said, it struck him forcibly that the House of Commons were drifting on this question in a manner not very creditable or satisfactory. He was to-night reminded of the position of the House some years ago, when they drifted into the Crimean war for want of a clear understanding of the principles on which they were proceeding. It was therefore incumbent on those who had devoted any thought and attention to the question to contribute their information and opinions towards the general stock, with a view to prevent any drifting into Committee with a bad Bill and getting out with possibly a worse one. He believed that the opinion of the majority of that House was that the Bill of the Government in its present form was a bad Bill, and one that ought not to be passed. He thought also that the majority of the House of Commons were desirous of substituting an alternative measure which would be accepted as a practical settlement of the question. He further thought it evident that the House and the country were anxious to arrive at a settlement of the question in the present Session, and would therefore substitute a good measure for the present bad measure, if they could do so without involving a Ministerial crisis, and throwing the whole thing over for another year. Looking at the matter from that point of view, he wished to state in what respect he regarded the present Bill as a bad one, the nature of the measure which he thought might be accepted, and the course which might be adopted by both sides of the House in order to arrive at a satisfactory settlement. He did not pretend to more consistency than his neighbours, and he was anxious, therefore, not to say a word that might be construed into taunting hon. Gentlemen opposite with having changed their opinions; but he could not help feeling bewildered at the position of almost standing with the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) on "the old lines of the Constitution," and offering a defence against the reforming vehemence of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite, whose zeal had, he must confess, somewhat outrun his own. He had always believed that if the Reform settlement of 1832 were ever reopened, it ought to be dealt with in a manner which would give a complete, comprehensive, liberal, and yet Conservative solution, by which all parties could abide for many years to come. On that ground, and on that ground alone, he opposed the measure of last year, so long as the then Government left out the re-distribution of seats. He felt that whatever might be the anomalies with regard to the franchise, the anomalies with regard to the re-distribution of seats were still more flagrant. He would touch briefly on what the present Bill proposed to do in that respect. He held as strongly as he did last year that in order to make a permanent settlement of the question the Legislature must deal with the re-distribution of seats; and if they dealt with that question in an obviously inefficient manner they had better not touch it at all, because they would only be deferring the discussion to a future opportunity. In this respect the distinction between the present Bill and the Bill of last year was very conspicuous. The Bill of last year proposed to re-distribute forty-nine seats, which were to have been obtained by taking away one Member from all boroughs returning two Members, and having a population under 8,000, and by a system of grouping the smaller boroughs. The present Bill drew the line at 7,000 inhabitants, where one Member was to be taken away, and did not propose any grouping of the smaller boroughs. The result would be to leave eight boroughs returning two Members each, which would by the Bill of last year have each lost a Member. Those boroughs were Bridgnorth, Bridport, Buckingham, Chichester, Chippenham, Coker mouth, Newport (Isle of Wight), and Stamford. He would read the names of the eight corresponding large towns or cities which would still be left with only two Members each. He left out the metropolitan boroughs returning sixteen Members, which were exceptional in circumstances. Those boroughs were Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Birmingham, Dublin, Leeds, Sheffield, and Edinburgh. The population of those towns or cities was, in round numbers, 2,500,000; while the population of the eight boroughs excepted from partial disfranchisement by the present Bill was only 60,000. He did not put this matter as one of population merely, but on higher ground; because it was not a question merely of population or of dividing the country into electoral districts; but he put it on the right of national representation in the great cities, which were important

centres of national life. He would put it to any hon. Member whether those towns were not important centres of national life, whose opinion on any great question, such as a foreign war or a renewal of the Bank Charter Act, did not carry great weight; and whether the opinion of the inhabitants of the other eight towns would weigh, or ought to weigh, in the scale against that of the large towns he had mentioned. The Bill of last year would have given a third Member to those large cities; but the scheme of the Government would not do so, and in his opinion it was miserably inadequate and unsatisfactory, and if adopted would not afford any fair chance of a final settlement of the question. By disregarding the principle of grouping they left as returning one Member each a number of boroughs—he would not call them towns, for they had been properly described as “decayed villages”—in the West of England. He would read the names of the eleven boroughs, each having a population under 5,000:—They were Arundel, Ashburton, Dartmouth, Evesham, Honiton, Launceston, Lyme Regis, Marlborough, Northallerton, Thetford, and Wells. Contrast these with eleven boroughs—large towns—which return only one Member:—Salford, 105,000; Dundee, 90,000; Merthyr Tydvil, 83,000; Aberdeen, Swansea, Birkenhead, Dudley, Cheltenham, Rochdale, Bury, and Walsall; the population of these places varied from 40,000 to 100,000. The population of the eleven large boroughs was 655,000, while the eleven small boroughs, with a population of no more than 44,000, had a larger representation; or, to put it in another way, eight of the small boroughs returned two Members each, and eleven of them returned one Member—in all, twenty-seven Members were returned by boroughs containing in all a population of 104,000, which was smaller than that of a single town like Salford. But this discrepancy in the population was not the only objection to the scheme. The present geographical distribution of political power in the country was eminently unsatisfactory. The progress of commerce and industry in the North had developed largely all the elements of political life, and the advance of those districts had been out of all proportion to that which had taken place in the South, yet the power of the representation remained in the South. Thus, of the two counties of Wilts and Dorset, the population of Wiltshire was 248,000, and had eighteen

Mr. Laing

Members; the population of Aberdeenshire was almost the same, equal in numbers, wealth, and intelligence, and it had only two Members. The population of Dorsetshire was 188,000, and had fourteen Members; the population of Ayrshire was exactly the same, and had only two Members. Now, anomalies such as these must be dealt with, and with a liberal hand, if they wished to construct a system that was likely to last. He said confidently that no plan of re-distribution would be acceptable to the country or to the House that fell below the standard of last year. He thought, indeed, that 10,000 was the lowest limit of population which should entitle boroughs to return two Members, and that all boroughs with a smaller population returning two Members ought to be deprived of one, and perhaps have the system of grouping applied to them. It might be, too, that the larger cities of the county should send three Members instead of two, and some system be devised by which their minorities might be represented. At all events, he thought it would be necessary to double the representation of those cities which possessed more than 50,000 inhabitants, and which at present returned only one Member.

With regard to the borough franchise, it was of the utmost importance that the House should remember that the extent of the proposed enfranchisement depended altogether upon whether the checks at present in the Bill were struck out or not. It was estimated that there were 723,000 male occupiers in boroughs living in houses under £10, the whole of whom would be admitted to the franchise if the checks proposed were not agreed to; while if all the restrictive provisions were maintained, the number of these that would be enfranchised became quite insignificant. Now, the principle of personal rating was the one upon which the real character of the measure—whether it was a democratic or a restrictive measure—must turn. The other proposed checks could be easily disposed of. If it had been proposed in the first instance to insist on two years' residence for the whole of the constituency, the proposition might have passed; but it would be simply impracticable to require half the constituency to qualify by two years' residence, and the other half by only one. The check called the dual vote had already been condemned. It was not a point upon which he felt strongly, and he was willing to admit that if some description of plurality of votes had come down with the Constitution from the days of Pym and Hampden, he should have been inclined to think it as good as the principle now adopted. It was clear, however, that no party in the State was strong enough to entertain the smallest prospect of being able to carry such a proposition. Hon. Members who held by the theory credo quid impossibile might believe in such a scheme; but for his own part, he looked upon it as impossible, and therefore dismissed it from his thoughts. Well, then, he came back to what he had said at the outset, that the provision of personal rating was the essential point of the Bill. If it were maintained, he reckoned that the numbers enfranchised would be between 100,000 and 120,000. But if this provision were not enforced the 723,000 male occupiers in boroughs would come in; and, according to the experience furnished by the £10 householders, deducting some 250,000 who would be temporarily disqualified or disinclined to vote, it might be reckoned that about 500,000 of these would qualify, which number, added to the present constituency of 488,000, would make a total of nearly 1,000,000. Of this number upwards of 300,000 would come in at the lowest point of the scale, occupying houses below even the standard of £4 rating; and, according to the calculation of proportion made last year by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne), out of the whole constituency, as it would stand under the Bill, a proportion of three-fifths would belong to the working or wage classes, and only two-fifths to the middle and upper classes. This conclusion was arrived at on the presumption that 25 per cent of the present constituencies were of the working classes, and that all the new voters were of the same class. Thus the Bill, without the ratepaying check, would be far more sweeping and democratic than anything contemplated during last year's discussion. The most fatal objection to the Bill, however, was that provision which left to local vestries and election agents to decide whether Parliament was to be elected by a limited or by an almost purely democratic constituency, by simply adopting or rejecting the Small Tenements Act. If these bodies decided generally to adopt the Small Tenements Act, the enfranchisement effected by the Bill would be comparatively restricted; but if otherwise, the influence of mere numbers must become predominant. It was impossible to suppose that such a question could be left to be decided by local bodies, actuated by local party feelings and local jobbing. When he looked at the possibility of maintaining the test, he had to consider the whole current of their past legislation upon the subject. The hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) had shown clearly that the current of past legislation was to enfranchise all persons whose rates were paid for them by their landlords on the principle of qui facit per alium facit per se, a maxim which prevailed in all other cases. Even if they succeeded in introducing that check into boroughs, what chance would there be of its holding its front against the attacks that would be made upon it? In periods of great political excitement means would be found by the payment of rates to put these compound-householders on the register, and it would not be easy to prove a corrupt intention when these persons might probably have been put on the register long before an election took place. In all the smaller boroughs it would be simply a question of who had the longest purse. If they were to resolve that such payments of rates would be bribery, the experience in all contested elections showed that that would be absolute moonshine. How would the system work in large towns? But there was a more serious point for consideration. What would be done in large towns by members of trades unions for the purpose of having the rates of compounding members paid, and securing that their names were put on the register? Would not every workman, at a time when the body felt its interests were at stake, spare a 1d. or 2d. a week for the purpose of getting the whole of his fellows on the register? That, he thought, was a most serious danger; they were asked to place enormous power in the hands of an organized army of trades unionists. If the Bill were passed, and Parliament were dissolved to-morrow, he did not believe there was a borough in the kingdom where a Liberal candidate would not have to promise to vote for the abolition of the ratepaying clause if he desired a chance. He was therefore convinced that the tests in question would prove illusive — that they would be frittered away like the crumbling cliff by the tide, and ultimately be swept away altogether. He felt strongly that in voting altogether. He felt strongly be voting for household suffrage pure and simple, but not of a satisfactory kind, because it would not be a final settlement of the question. It would not be given as a boon to the working classes, nor in a generous spirit, as it would be accompanied with the check and counterpoises to which he had referred.

He had stated why he thought the Bill of the Government would not effect a permanent or a satisfactory settlement of the question. He felt, however, that they had arrived at a point at which criticism of Bills from the Ministerial Benches was not the only duty devolving on Members—the House itself must be prepared with some solution of the question. For his own part, he believed that the majority of the House would be prepared to adopt a £5 rating franchise coupled with a reduction of the Small Tenements Act to the same sum. It was said that a £5 rate franchise was a mere figure, and that there was no principle involved in it. The principle of it was the same as the principle of household suffrage. If they adopted that principle they would include what was good, and exclude what was bad. He might shortly sum up his idea of a Bill. It might be adopted, if the majority of the House were free to give an opinion on it. He would fix the borough franchise at £5, reducing the Small Tenements Act to the same point: he would add a liberal lodger franchise; and he would have the county franchise fixed at £14, the figure agreed upon last year. He would add a measure of redistribution of a character not less liberal than the proposal of last year. If that were done he thought the result would be a measure which would be acceptable to the House and to the country, and which would perfectly settle the question. The question remained as to how they could best arrive at such a solution. In what position would they be if they went into Committee on the Bill as it stood? They were met on the threshold by a clause which declared that household suffrage was the principle of our representation; and how could they deal with that question while they were left in a position of uncertainty as to whether the checks proposed were to stand or not to stand? They all desired a satisfactory solution of the question; but the only chance of arriving at it was, that some influential Members of the House should bring forward the broad outlines of a scheme before the House went into Committee, so that they could fairly have it in competition with the Government Bill, and so that the Government could have a fair opportunity of adopting those Amendments which the general feeling of the House showed to be desirable. The question, as had been recommended at the commencement of the Session, should not be treated in a party spirit—but that should apply to the other side of the House as well as to the Opposition. He thought the plan of embodying the scheme in Resolutions, which was first adopted, was a good one, and if it had been carried out it might have formed a good foundation on which they might have adopted the basis of a measure. This was a serious and important measure, and as a different course of action had not yet been pointed out in the course of the present debate, he thought he should be doing some service if he helped to sketch out a different course. He thought that propositions should be presented to the Government—not in a hostile spirit, which they could not accept with honour, but in a form in which the Government could accept them with perfect honour and consistency before going into Committee; and then, on the Motion that the Speaker should leave the Chair, the House ought to have a distinct understanding as to what the Government meant to do, and as to what they meant to stand upon. He trusted that the Government would adopt such modifications as would make the Bill acceptable to the House; but if they did not do so—if they proceeded with the present measure—he who had always struggled for what he considered a Liberal-Conservative settlement of the question could not be satisfied with it. As it was, it was not a Liberal-Conservative, but a Tory-Radical measure.

MR. POWELL said, he felt anxious that before this debate closed the House should have some expression from Her Majesty's Government with regard to the course they would adopt in reference to the dual vote. He was anxious to know whether the dual vote was dead or alive. For his own part, he was inclined to think that it was neither numbered amongst the living nor recorded amongst the dead; but that it somewhat resembled one of those melancholy objects to be seen in a foreign land, which, although considered dead, were yet arrayed in the dresses of ordinary life, and attached to a delicate mechanism, from which, on the least movement indicative of life, the tinkling of a bell was heard. He had waited patiently during this debate to hear the sound of the bell which would render the life of the dual vote apparent. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, in peremptory tones and a sepulchral voice, had pronounced it dead; and from the Treasury Bench there had been only doubtful sounds heard, not indicative of confidence in the life of the vote, but rather expressing a desire on the part of right hon. Gentlemen to ascertain the judgment of the House upon the point. He thought, however, that the Government should give some expression of opinion upon the subject. If the dual vote was indeed dead, the House ought to know whether there would be any alterations made in the Bill in consequence of that death. Were there any other parts of the measure which would be surrendered if the dual vote was entirely abandoned? He also desired to ask what would be the method of procedure in case the dual vote was still living? There was first the question of the franchise to be decided, and then they had to decide upon the dual vote; and it was only right that the House should know whether their judgment was to be taken in that order, and whether, when they had determined the franchise, they would then be called upon to decide upon the dual vote. With regard to the question of personal rating, it had been spoken of as a grievous and intolerable hardship that there should be a diversity of votes in the same community, either under the partial carrying into effect of the Small Tenements Rating Act or of some system of local legislation. He entirely concurred in that judgment, and did not think that there should be diverse votes in the same community. But in truth no difficulty existed, as any community by private legislation where local Acts created diversity, or by universal adoption or non-adoption of the Small Tenements Rating Act where there was no local Act, could render the practice uniform. With regard to the question of the lodger franchise, he did not think there had been any reasons given on that point which militated against the second reading of the Bill. If the lodger franchise would admit good men, it was well to admit them by that franchise. Good men were welcome wherever they came from, and bad men were not welcome whatever might be their origin. There would be in Committee the amplest, fullest, and finest opportunity for ascertaining the judgment of the House upon the lodger franchise. With regard to another of the proposed franchises, the hon. and learned

Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) had fallen into a strange error when he said that the graduates in our Universities were already enfranchised. It was true that some of them were; but none below the degree of Master of Arts were entitled to the franchise, and of Masters of Arts none voted save those willing to comply with certain conditions. With regard to the re-distribution of seats, he wished to point out that in taking the group of boroughs represented by one Member each, it would be found that those at the bottom of the list had indeed small populations; but those at the top of the list had large populations, and were growing and increasing boroughs, which during the past few years had gathered round them, and would continue to gather round them, large and increasing populations. Some of them were centres of commercial life, and were entitled to a large share in the representation of the country. He thought the Government were right in not dealing too boldly and too broadly with this question of the re-distribution of seats; but still, he had a lingering wish that the Government would deal a little more boldly and a little more comprehensively with this important question. He could not help sometimes asking himself what would be the result of passing that measure or any similar measure? It would no doubt give increased power to the working classes, while he did not believe that the new Parliament would be animated by a greater desire than the existing Parliament to promote the welfare of those classes. But he felt persuaded that a more direct representation of the working men in that House would lead to a more accurate knowledge of their condition and their capacity; and that circumstance would necessarily be productive of some amount of advantage, enabling Parliament as it would to legislate with more wisdom on matters relating to the most numerous classes of society.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, on the last occasion when I offered a few observations to the House on this question, I concluded by a quotation from what some might call a demand, and some a prayer, uttered by working men when they said, "Deal with us on the square." Now, we all know exactly what that means, and we are all conscious whether, in the vote we shall give at some future time on this Bill, we shall be doing that which the working men mean in that sentence, asking what they did. Now, looking at this Bill as it has been described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and as afterwards described by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief of the Poor Law Board, and as it has been described by several Members on both sides of the House, does it not present itself to us in some degree as a puzzle, and will it not be regarded as such by those whose interests it is intended chiefly to affect? According to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is a Bill of the widest dimensions as an enfranchising Bill. According to the President of the Poor Law Board, it is a Bill of many restrictions, and many compensations and limitations, and therefore it is a Bill of a wholly different character from that which it was introduced to us as being by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Nobody in this House knows better than the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the question we are now discussing is more entirely a working man's question than any other; but being a working man's question, after what we have seen during the last nine months, I think the House will be of opinion that it is a matter which it is not desirable, if even it be safe, to delay, and that it is not a matter on which this House can afford to deal with the working man in any other than fair and honourable terms.

The hon. Member for the Northern Burghs, who spoke very lately (Mr. Laing), dwelt much on the question of the Redistribution of Seats. There are many parts of the Bill on which much may be said; but I venture to say that every other part of the Bill can wait for a calm and fair consideration, it may be in this, or it may be in some future Session, but this question of the manner in which you propose to deal with the working man is the question of this Session. Sir, it is an unfortunate thing that this Bill is in the hands of a Government who are in a most difficult position with reference to this question. That position apparently renders it almost impossible for them to deal with this matter with that straightforwardness which the matter itself demands. I am too serious upon this matter to enter into any recriminations with respect to what took place last year; but without going over the debates of the last Session, I should like to read one passage—and it is the only one I shall read to the House—delivered in a debate last year by a Member of the present Cabinet, and who has lately been promoted to one of the most responsible positions in that Cabinet. He said he preferred to remain at the £10 franchise, but that he would be willing, if he consented to make a change, to go very much below it; and he said, referring to the opinions of the late Attorney General and to my opinions—

“And now he must part company with the Attorney General and the hon. Member for Birmingham. He was obliged with the utmost sharpness and definiteness to say that he thought to descend to household suffrage at once or at any time, with any safeguards whatever, would be a most mischievous and reckless innovation on the Constitution. Upon that ground he opposed, and should always do so, any general lowering of the franchise beyond the present limit of £10.”

And he added this—

“That being so, how was he now to deal with this Bill?”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 1534.]

Well, that being so, how has he dealt with this Bill? That is from the speech of the present Minister for India (Sir Stafford Northcote). I have not seen him in his place to-night nor last night; but no doubt he will be able to explain the position in which he stands. Now, I am not quoting this for the purpose of upbraiding the right hon. Gentleman; but I am doing it for the purpose of pointing out to the House the extreme difficulty of the position of the Government, and the extreme difficulty of dealing with a Bill of this nature when it finds itself in the hands of a Government which was so pledged last year to a policy which is in reality opposed to the professed principles of this Bill. If we look back to a time to which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer sometimes looks back, and upbraids us for our conduct in connection with it—if we look back to the year 1859 we find that the question of Reform was in the same hands, and in the same difficulty, and it met with the fate that may probably attend the measure of this year. For instance, at that time the right hon. Gentleman proposed to the House, not a reduction of the borough franchise, but a very large reduction of the county franchise—from a £50 occupation to one of £10. But what did he ask us to do? He asked us, as a compensation, to exclude from the county representation 70,000 occupiers, whose holdings were found within the limits of boroughs. He proposed that they should become voters within the boroughs, and be taken out of the counties; though only last week—I think it was—the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, in answer to a question, that five-sixths of those 70,000 persons were not resident in the boroughs of which at that time he would have made them voters. I am not going to find fault with that proposition now; it has been disposed of, and in all probability will never re-appear. I want to show the House that at that time there was a great reduction offered, but with injurious and impossible conditions. An attempt was made to disturb the ancient and universal practice of the country, and it was done because of the difficulty that a Conservative Government, opposed to Reform, was endeavouring to settle the question of Reform. Well, so now, at this moment, the right hon. Gentleman comes before the House with a measure which at first sight, in form and words, offers a large reduction, not of the county, but of the borough franchise, and he has been trading on this for the last two or three weeks. Those newspapers with which the right hon. Gentleman is no doubt familiar have been telling the world that the Conservative party have fairly capitulated; and that all those checks, whether it be of a dual vote or of the personal payment of rates, may be easily given up during the discussion; for "we," they say—speaking of that party opposite—have no more reason to be afraid of the appearance of thousands at elections than the party which sits on this side of the House. Well, but if we take the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, nothing is more clear—if he says what is true and what the Cabinet means—nothing is more true than that the right hon. Gentleman—and, indeed, as I understand, also Lord Derby, as he is stated by the newspapers to have done at the recent meeting—are preaching democratic doctrines outside the House, which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board entirely disavows. According to his doctrine, the limitations are really the principles of the Bill; and if he had said what was the true state of the case, he would have pointed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and have said, "My right hon. Friend is dealing merely in political flash notes; in point of fact, they look very like the real thing, and a man unaccustomed to handle notes would hardly know the difference; but if you present them at the bank you will find they are worth no more than waste paper."

Now, I shall confine my observations mostly to the borough franchise; for, as I have said, I believe it to be the one question which it is absolutely necessary for us, if it be possible, to come to some conclusion about. The right hon. Gentleman in his speech dwelt upon our ancient Constitution. Well, I suppose I shall be one of the few persons by-and-by who will continue to be in favour of that ancient Constitution. I recollect the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty once amused me by telling me that he was the only extant Peelite; and I sometimes think, in the unmoorings of hon. Gentlemen opposite, in their drifting from their anchorage, under the presidency of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that some of us here will at last be left the only defenders of our ancient and time-honoured Constitution. Now, what is the manner in which he reads that ancient Constitution? He says that in ancient times the franchise was based upon the payment of rates and the occupation of houses. Well, there is no doubt whatever, I believe, that that is true. I have urged that sometimes in this House, and much more frequently out of it; and ill-judging persons said I was preaching revolutionary doctrines. But he does not bear in mind that in those old times to which we all love to look back, though none of us would like exactly to go back to them—in those old times there was no such thing, so far as we read, as of the landlord paying rates, or of compounding for rates. All occupiers who could pay were, of course, compelled to pay whatever taxes fell upon them in their position as inhabitants of parishes or boroughs. At that time nothing could be more reasonable or wise than the plan which was established; because, as the House will see, the only persons who would be left out of the franchise, if the franchise was so fixed, would be that extremely poor class whose members were unable to pay, and who, not being able to take upon themselves any of the burdens of citizenship, might fairly be asked to abstain from taking part in the right of election. But at the present day everything that concerns these matters is changed. The parish is differently managed, the landlord is a more important person, the tenants and occupiers form a more numerous class; and for the convenience of all these, and of all whom they represent in the parishes, another and an entirely different system has been established, and it has been found so good that gradually it is spreading to all parts of the country—a voluntary arrangement, a voluntary contract, by which the tenant is benefited, where the landlord has no objection to act in his position, and where the parish authorities and all the ratepayers of the parish feel that their interests are concerned. The right hon. Gentleman says that he will make use of the system, which is a modern and improved system, and work it—he does not say it in words; that would be another thing; but the chief of the Poor Law Board says it in words, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer says it in effect—that he will use this system, thus changed from the old times for the purpose of disfranchising two-thirds or three-fourths of all those persons who in those old times would have been admitted to the franchise and in fact of those whom this Bill, as you look at it at first, would seem to propose to admit. But why is it that the right hon. Gentleman does this? I forget the phrase he used—he used it several times, and I am sorry I have not remembered it—but he referred to the character of the working men, and the circumstances of their settled mode of life, their responsibility as citizens in their different districts; and he assumed that this was all proved if the working man, instead of paying a small sum of, say 8s a year, to his landlord, which the landlord pays for his rate, should pay 12s. directly to the overseer of the parish; and that this 4s. paid to the parochial authority was the grand test—it made all the difference in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman between Englishmen who are entitled to be placed on the register and Englishmen in whom the House of Commons can have no confidence at all. Now I wonder the right hon. Gentleman did not add another test. The tenant may make an arrangement that the landlord should repair his house, or that he should himself repair it, and it would be as good a test that the tenant should repair the house as that he shall directly pay the rates. One of these tests would seem to be almost as reasonable as the other. There are many tests just as good, and most or perhaps all of them are worth nothing whatsoever. I take it that a man who has a house, who has a wife, who has children, who has furniture, whose life is marked by a steady industry, industry from dawn till dusk on the average of all the year, and men who obey the law as the law is obeyed in this country, men who need so little governance as the people of this country need—I say that all this is ten thousand times better as a test than any miserable difference of a few shillings in the course of the year on the amount of the poor rate, and the person to whom it is to be paid. Look at what this difference is in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He says there are 723,000 householders who are at present not on the register. The President of the Poor Law Board admits that 50 per cent will necessarily be struck off; you will come down then to 360,000 in any case. The Bill which is now before us, with the restrictions and personal rating, will cause an introduction of new voters in boroughs to the small amount of 118,000 persons. I am not quoting speculative calculations; I am quoting the words of the President of the Poor Law Board, and therefore the amount which throughout the boroughs of England and Wales the present Bill proposes to add to the existing franchise consists only of 118,000 persons. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—and here I must draw the same distinction between his speech and those of his Colleagues—said, in answer to the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, that very easy access would be afforded, and the greatest facilities given, by which persons who appear to be excluded would be admitted. But the President of the Poor Law Board, on the contrary, did not give us the least expectation that the road would be rendered smooth and easy, and he prided himself on the strength, and the force, and the completeness of the limitations of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to make so little. But the road is very rugged. It is encumbered by pains and penalties at every step. Go, for an example, to the past. We have had brought out in this discussion more than once the subject of the Bill introduced in this House in the year 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 14) by Sir William Clay. Now, may I tell the House the effect of this Bill? But for the last three lines of it, this Bill may be said to be almost entirely a failure. When the Bill was passing through this House I knew what the Mover did not, I think, and I knew its probable effect in a direction which he did not intend to meddle with. The real reason why compound-householders did not get on the register was this—opposite their names in the rate book was the composition rate and not the full rate; and although the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond says he doubts very much whether they could be excluded by law, the universal judgment of revising barristers from the time of the Reform Act till 1851, had been that, unless the full rates originally imposed, and not the composition rate, were paid, that compound-householder did not find his way from the rate book to the register. Well, when Sir William Clay brought that Bill before the House, I went to Lord John Russell, who was then Prime Minister, and I represented to him the grievance of this case. He said he did not think that the Reform Act or its framers had intended the conclusion to which the revising barristers had come, and he thought it would be a very proper thing to make an alteration in accordance with that view. He recommended me to see Sir William Page Wood, who was then, I think, Attorney General, and mainly at my suggestion, the very clause which is the last clause in that Act was introduced. I will read that clause. I do not know whether it has been read in the course of the debate—

"Provided always, and be it enacted, that in cases where, by any composition with the landlord, a less sum shall be payable than the full amount of rate which, except for such composition, would be due in respect of the same premises, the occupier claiming to be rated shall not be bound to pay or tender more than the amount then payable under such composition."

The House will see what is the result of that. If the overseers of any district could be prevailed upon to do voluntarily what, as far as I understand, they ought to do by law—that is, place every occupier's name in the occupiers' column of the rate book, with the sum opposite his name for which the landlord has compounded—when that sum has been paid by the landlord, the name of every such occupier would pass on to the register every year, just as the name of the owner of houses, or of his own house, would pass on who had paid the full rate for his house. And the result was this—that immediately after the passing of that Bill, in the city of Manchester not less than 4,000 new voters were placed upon the register in one year—although I believe in one of the townships of Manchester the overseers failed in their duty in putting the occupiers' names upon the rate book. Three or four years ago my hon. Colleague and myself, being at Birmingham, had an interview with the overseers and the parochial authorities of the town. One of them objected, on the score of trouble, to put the names of occupiers on the rate book. However, they assented to our interpretation of the law; and from that time they have placed upon the rate book all householders whose rates are compounded for, and whose rates are paid by the landlord, although the sum paid is less than the original rate upon the premises. Well, the result is that in Birmingham there has also been a very considerable addition to the number of electors and I believe in the town of Brighton the same result has followed. I hope, I am not sure, that there has been the same result in other constituencies of the kingdom.

Now, I have stated this fact to show the House this—that the road to the franchise for compound-householders over £10 is not so difficult but that it may be travelled. I want to know why it is, when we are going to extend the franchise downward to another and a large class—in profession, at least—we should not make that road just as easy to them as we make it to those above them in the social scale. Why, if you are to take in a class of householders more laborious, having less leisure—it may be, in some cases, less instructed and less acquainted with the details of all these matters—is it not a painful idea that you should place obstructions in their path which you have not placed in the path of those who are householders above the value of £10? Now, I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Colleagues, with all sincerity, whether he intends, so far as regards persons below £10, to repeal in principle, and to withhold from them, in fact, the right which this House of Commons has deliberately given to electors or householders above £10. Will he say that that clause which I have read—so simple, so clear, agreed to by the Prime Minister in 1851, drawn by an eminent Attorney General, passed in this House without a division, accepted in the House of Lords without question—shall, so far as regards these new voters, to whom he professes to give the franchise, be a dead letter, and that they at least shall take no advantage of it? If he proposes to do that, let him tell the House why. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire last year proposed, by a £7 rental franchise, to invite 240,000 men into the electoral list. This Bill, according to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, will invite only 118,000. When the late Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in his Bill he made no flourish of trumpets. He did not offer it as a great all-embracing and all-enfranchising measure. He offered it as a moderate proposition which he hoped the friends of a wider suffrage, and the great body of the people, would accept in the spirit in which he offered it. The right hon. Gentleman, with far more pretence, with the air of doing much more, of sounding deeps far deeper, and finding a bottom from which nothing would disturb him, asks merely 118,000 men to partake of the blessings of this liberal Bill.

The right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues remind me very much of the story of a man whose name I mention with anxiety and with sorrow — I speak of Dr. Livingstone. Dr. Livingstone, in his African Travels, says that he came upon the tribe of the Bechuanas. They were a people savage to the last degree, but ostentatious to a remarkable extent. As an illustration of it, he said that when his party wished to get some food from them, the Bechuana chief said, "Behold an ox;" but when they looked, they found but a miserable goat. Well, that, I think, is not a bad illustration of the tactics and conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. Now, the real object of this scheme is this—to introduce to the franchise about as many men as would be admitted if the franchise were fixed at an £8 rental. I believe it would not be in any degree a more extensive enfranchisement than that. Well, if this be so, why talk of household suffrage? Why should a great chief and a great party meet in St. James' Square, or in Downing Street, and talk of household suffrage, and offer to the people of this country that great and generous enfranchisement, when, after all, the scheme only involves what is tantamount to an £8 rental suffrage? ["No, no!" and "Hear, hear!"] If that be so, let us call it an £8 suffrage. ["No, no!"] Let us speak the truth about the matter. And defend it if you can. But bear in mind, if this be the nature of the measure, what is the step you are taking? You are renewing the error of 1832. You are about to re-enact the virtual exclusion of the working classes from the franchise. ["No, no!"] The working classes are of that opinion. ["No, no!"] But you are doing much worse than the statesmen did in 1832, for they made no pretence of admitting working men. They offered a £10 franchise, and the working men throughout the whole kingdom said, "The Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill." They took it frankly and freely when it was offered, knowing what it was, hoping that hereafter it might lead to something for them. But you, with a population far more advanced and instructed than that of 1832, after the promises of half-a-dozen Cabinets, and passages in half-a-dozen Queen's Speeches, after what you have seen during the last nine months, venture to ask Parliament to exclude the working classes.

I think there are Members of the House who have taken more alarm than is necessary; but I venture to tell them that the course they are pursuing, if this be the extent of the concession, is a very perilous course; because bear in mind that it will be viewed in combination with the spirit of your Bill as shown in other parts of it. What did the Chancellor of the Exchequer say? He said that his counterpoises, checks, and compensations would prevent the mischief that might arise from the admission of 118,000 men, and the President of the Poor Law Board said the Bill proposed to give more than 200,000 persons of a higher rank a double vote—and that these would balance the 118,000 men. All that will be understood, and will be answered by those for whom you are proposing to legislate. I say it will appear to them as an intolerable wrong and insult. I think myself it is one of the most astounding propositions that was ever made by any Minister to any Parliament. If I am free thus to speak of a condemned proposition of the Government, in what position do I stand with regard to this question? Can I propose anything which in the contest of parties possibly a large majority may agree to accept? I have always been in favour of household suffrage, for reasons which I have often stated in this House and to other assemblies. I believe that the solid and ancient basis of the suffrage is that all persons who are rated to some tax—the relief of the poor being the most general now—should be admitted to the franchise. I am quite willing to admit there is one objection to that wide measure, which exists, at least to some extent, in almost every franchise you can establish. At this moment, in all, or nearly all our boroughs, as many of us know, sometimes to our sorrow, there is a small class which it would be much better for themselves if they were not enfranchised, because they have no independence whatsoever, and it would be much better for the constituency also that they should be excluded, and there is no class so much interested in having that small class excluded as the intelligent and honest working men. I call this class the residuum, which there is in almost every constituency, of almost hopeless poverty and dependence. In 1859 I prepared a Bill which, I venture to say, in opposition to the character which has been given to the present Bill by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, was the best Reform Bill ever introduced. In speaking of that Bill I stated that there was this class which I thought it would not be any advantage to the class itself, or to the constituency, or to the public, to admit to the franchise. I am not sure that I should read this paragraph if I did not observe that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), in the preface to the volume of his Speeches, has inserted the paragraph, and has linked me with himself in a wholesale—perhaps he would not say a wholesale—want of appreciation of the character of the working classes. Speaking of that class at the very bottom of the scale, I made these observations—

“I put it to every man, I do not care what his theoretical notions are, whether he believes that throughout the boroughs of the United Kingdom it would be advantageous or beneficial to the constituency, as a whole, to include some scores in very small constituencies, some hundreds in others, a few thousands, perhaps, in the largest, of a class of which there are, unfortunately, too many among us—namely, the excessively poor—many of them intemperate, some of them profligate; some of them it may be, only unfortunate, some of them naturally incapable; but all of them in a condition of dependence, such as to give no reasonable expectation that they would be able to resist the many temptations which rich and unscrupulous men would offer them at periods of election to give their votes in a manner not only not consistent with their own opinions and consciences, if they have any, but not consistent with the representation of the town or city in which they live.”

Now, I am prepared to repeat that. I hold that in every borough with which I have any acquaintance, even with a £10 franchise, there are a few men whose absence from the constituency would be an advantage to that constituency, and I believe an advantage to themselves. But these remarks did not, and do not apply to working men between £10 and £7 rental, but to a small class at the very bottom of the scale. And I must therefore say that the right hon. Member for Calne did me an unfriendly sort of an act when he hung my picture alongside his for the observation of the working men of England. In the Bill I refer to I made this proposition—that all those persons who were rated, whether they paid rates themselves or not—in all cases if they paid the rates themselves—and in cases where the landlord paid a composition rate, down to the point of a £4 rental or £3 rating, they should find their way on to the rate book and on to the register. Now, I am not about to say that that is the exact limit that should be fixed. The House may think £4 rating, or a £5 rental, or even a £5 rating low enough. On a great question like this, when you offer to the working men a real and generous boon, you will not find them—I am sure you will not find me—intolerant of any proposition that may be made. Now, I have never changed from that view. I hold it now as strongly as I held it then. And I am willing to allow that at this moment I do not believe there is a majority in this House who are in favour of household suffrage pure and simple. But we might take this course of drawing a line which would exclude, as far as we could judge, all those who should be excluded by their non-payment of rates—if no such thing as compound-householders existed. And this seems to me to be the true policy of the House. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Colleagues would accept some proposition like this, I do not doubt that we might proceed with this Bill; and, so far at least as this great and vital part of the question is concerned, we might come to some final conclusion during the present Session. That the House may thoroughly understand me let me repeat the proposal. You would then have the household basis for the suffrage with limitations corresponding as nearly as you can get to the ancient limitations of the non-payment of the rate. That, I think, would satisfy the demands of our ancient Constitution, and therefore, I hope, the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If such a measure as this was passed, I would hold it to be a real and generous extension of the franchise; and I give you my word—whatever may be the worth of it—that I believe it would be felt that no class of the people was intentionally excluded, and that none who could be expected to be in would be shut out. And if with these you included a clause that would admit those who are settled dwellers in apartments within the district of the metropolitan boroughs, you would at once close the offices of the Reform League—and give general satisfaction to the whole of the people.

I have one or two observations to make

on other parts of the Bill, and I will dismiss them with the fewest possible words. I want to put to the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues and to the House this point in regard to the county franchise. In 1859 they brought in a Bill, to which, I presume, most of you were assenting parties, with a £10 franchise for counties. In 1860, under the Government of Lord Palmerston, Lord John Russell introduced another Bill with a £10 franchise for counties. Last year my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire—his moderation is now known to all men—introduced a Bill offering a £14 franchise for counties, to which the House on a great division assented. Now, as you are about to lower the borough franchise considerably, which certainly the House will do, whatever becomes of this Bill—what will the persons living in the counties—those millions whom the right hon. Gentleman is always talking to us about—and the people living in those villages for whom he expresses such a strong affection when he is fighting us with them, but for whom he cares so little when they ask for the franchise—what will these persons in the counties say if you leave them at a £15 rating—being equal to a £17 to £20 rental—when you are going down in the franchise in boroughs to a rating qualification of £5 or £6? I say that a settlement of this kind would be no settlement at all. I say it is not a democratic proposition, and I trust the House, when we come to that part of the Bill, will act courageously and rationally, and adopt a measure at least as liberal as that which Lord Palmerston—by no means a democratic Minister—adopted in 1860. I will say nothing about the system of voting-papers. Everybody who speaks to me about them says there could be no more effective means of corruption, and merely express this opinion and recommend it to the attention of the House, that this system would withdraw all the influence of the public eye, without setting up the dominion of conviction or of conscience. The hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) has stated what he regards as most extraordinary facts—they are not extraordinary to me, for I have gone through this schooling many a time—with respect to the re-distribution of seats. The measure of the right hon. Gentleman for the re-distribution of seats is a mere pretence—he does not offer it as a settlement. Having heard or read the unanswerable speech of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn last year, I suppose he felt bound to bring in some clause with regard to the re-distribution of seats. But when the town of Birmingham, which has now 15,000 electors, shall have 30,000 under this Bill—when Manchester, which has 20,000, shall have 40,000—when all these great constituencies shall be nearly double—do you think they will look with kinder eyes on the borough of Arundel, and on the borough of Calne, and other boroughs of that nature. Do you think that a measure which leaves such a dead limb as this encumbering the ground—if, indeed, encumbering be not a strange expression to use of anything so minute—will be received with approbation, or will be regarded as even a two or five years' settlement of this question?

Mr. Bright

There is another point upon which, at some future time, Sir, I shall ask your opinion. In this Bill there is a proposition to disfranchise four boroughs. I now speak of the two largest—Lancaster, with 2,672 male householders, and Great Yarmouth, with 6,660 householders. If this Bill is to pass it is clear that there would be created in these two boroughs, if they were not disfranchised as nearly as may be, an entirely new constituency. When you are going to double the constituencies of Lancaster and Yarmouth it seems to me a thing unheard of and new if the House will agree to disfranchise these boroughs. It is one which, I will venture to say, the House when it comes to consider the matter will not agree to. I complain of this—that in the preamble of this Bill there is no reference to the disfranchisement of these four boroughs, which have sent Members to this House for 500 years. There is not in the Bill a single word to indicate shortly to posterity how or why it was these boroughs were disfranchised. They will be swept away from the floor of Parliament, and there will not be a single record in your Parliament to show why it was these boroughs were struck out of your representative system. If the House will bear with me for a moment, I wish only to say this—that I am as much against corruption at least as the Chancellor of the Exchequer—and it has always been held in this House since I have been here, and for a much longer period, that it was a very grave matter to disfranchise any constituency—and I say that you are cutting off in Lancaster and Yarmouth, not only the population who would come in under this Bill, but their children and their children's children, who would be enfranchised and represented there if this clause be not passed. I say that if this is to be done it ought to be brought into the House by a special Bill, and that the whole question ought to receive a careful discussion and deliberate consideration; and that it should not be put into a clause of a Bill like this to enable the right hon. Gentleman to give seven more Members to counties than he would otherwise have been able to do.

Now, Sir, I believe I have said to the House what at this stage of the Bill I think it is necessary to say. The Bill, as a whole, I regard as very unsatisfactory and as very bad. I think it has marks upon it of being a product, not of the friends, but of the enemies of Reform. It is wonderful what clever men will do when a dozen of them are shut up in a room. Now, look at the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Why, he is a marvel of cleverness, or else he would not have been for twenty years at the head of hon. Gentlemen opposite to lead them into this—what shall I call it?—great difficulty at last. Take the right hon. Member who sits next him, and who represents a very learned University—Cambridge. Take the President of the Poor Law Board, who represents the wisdom, and it may be, to some extent, the prejudices of Oxford. Now, take the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich. I fear to speak of so potent a personage. Why, at this moment he directs all the armies of the Empire. There is not a soldier who shivers amid the snows of Canada, or sweats under the sun of India, but shivers and sweats under the influence of the right hon. Gentleman. Why, it was only the other day that he was Lord High Admiral of England. In metaphor—

“His tread was on the mountain wave,
His home was in the deep.”

But all these Gentlemen retired into a mysterious apartment in Downing Street, and they sat to work to concoct a Reform Bill, and with all their capacity it seems to me to come out as a Bill marvellously like that which would have been framed by the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire. The hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. B. Stanhope) last night gave us an account of his conversion. There could hardly be anything more affecting or more truthful in any class meeting; but he spoke of “we” all the time—what “we” did, what determinations “we” had come to; and, in thinking over it to-day, I have come to the conclusion that he is the author of this Bill. Well, now, I complain of this Bill, and I do not do it in anger, for I hope that I have not said a word to-night that can be considered anything but fair and just; but I say it is a Bill in which, looking at the working class question, there is nothing clear, nothing generous, nothing statesmanlike; and I believe that if the House were to pass it, there would be universal dissatisfaction throughout the country. I believe it would aggravate the wounds it is intended to heal, and that it would leave the greatest question of our time absolutely unsolved. Well, now, I grieve to say this; but it is true. I tell the House frankly, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will believe me when I say that there is not a man in this House who would be more glad to give his very warmest support, whatever it may be worth, to a fair and honest measure on this question. I regret what hon. Gentlemen opposite did, led by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his friends, last year. I shall never cease to regret it, and never cease to blame them; but still, I would help any Government to bring this question to a just conclusion. But, Sir, it seems to me impossible to assist a Government which will not tell us frankly what it intends, what it stands by, what it will get rid of; which asks us to come into its confidence, and is the most reticent Government that probably ever sat upon these Benches. If any Gentlemen on this side were to treat you as you treated us last year, I should denounce them with the strongest language that I could use. I hate the ways, and I scorn the purposes of faction—and if I am driven now or in any stage of the Bill to oppose the Government, it is because the measure they have offered us bears upon its face marks of deception and disappointment; and because I will be no party to any measure which shall cheat the great body of my countrymen of the possession of that power in this House on which they have set their hearts, and which, as I believe, by the constitution of this country, they may most justly claim.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) commenced his speech with his usual protest—a protest against Gentlemen on this side of the House presuming to deal with the Liberal monopoly. As long as the hon. Gentleman and his Friends were allowed to remain the only amenders of the representation of the people, so long we received from the hon. Gentleman all that encouragement which in his milder moments he knows how to bestow. But I have always protested against the opinions of the hon. Gentleman on this subject. I hold that we have a full constitutional right to deal by any means we think best with the representation of the people in this House of Commons, and I will assert that right at all times in spite of the dogmas of the hon. Member for Birmingham. The hon. Gentleman tells us to-night that I, on the part of the Government, have brought in a Bill which is full of false pretences—imputing to me statements which I never made, and opinions which I have never professed. But how easy is it to show the utter want of foundation for this charge. The hon. Gentleman said, “You made a statement which left the House under the impression that you were giving a large amount of enfranchisement to the people.” The statement I made must be still fresh in the recollection of the House; and what did I say? I said, if the measure which I proposed were passed—if all the persons now under the £10 line were rated to the poor and paid their rates, 240,000 men would be qualified to avail themselves of the franchise if they complied with the constitutional conditions which I explained. Now, what happened? Why, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, no doubt well informed on the subject, but acting, I am sure, entirely under a misapprehension in imputing to me that I made a statement that 240,000 men would be added to the constituency, which is not my statement; what I said was, that they would be qualified; and having allowed me to correct him, reduced the number to one-half, which the hon. Member for Birmingham has adopted for his estimate, and now says that only half the number that I alleged will be added to the constituency. I will not impeach the accuracy of this estimate. I will assume it to be true; and I will ask how is it that only half the number will be electors? We know the reason. We know that the other half are of a migratory character, or paupers; and we have evidence of that. [“No, no!”] I am not speaking now of the compound-householders; I am speaking of those who are now personally rated to the poor, and who, if they paid their rates, would be qualified to vote by this Bill. And why, then, is this amount reduced to 120,000? Because, as I have said, they are migratory and paupers. Well, then, does the hon. Member for Birmingham wish that this moiety of migratory paupers should have the suffrage, or does he not? Let him answer that. He knows very well that he does not wish the migratory pauper to be an elector. Well, then, what becomes of the charge that I am the advocate of exclusion, and that I bring in a Bill which shuts out one-half of those who should be admitted from the right of voting? The charge is utterly shallow. Well, if it is true that you must make this deduction from the 240,000 men who are at the present moment personally rated, it is equally true that the same deductions must be made from the great body of compound-householders. I never heard anybody dispute that. The hon. Member for Birmingham knows that statement is perfectly accurate; he knows well what the deductions would be, and from what cause; and he approves of the cause. Then, what becomes of this charge of exclusion? And what becomes, too, of the charge that this is a revolutionary measure—for as such it is treated on one night, and then the next night we are told that it is a measure of extreme restriction? Why, Sir, it is a measure founded upon a principle—upon a popular and a rational principle. It is of general application, without any restriction whatever; and any person who fulfils the conditions, which are conditions that are, as I believe, entirely approved by the great majority of the people, may possess and enjoy the suffrage in this country.

Well, the subject has been very little discussed. Considering the nature of the Bill before us, and the great attendance there has always been in the House when this question has been mentioned, it is remarkable how everything like Parliamentary discussion has been as it were evaded. Why, when I asked leave to bring in the Bill what happened? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire rose and delivered a speech or rather an invective against a measure which he had never even seen, basing many of his conclusions upon assumptions which when he found the Bill in his hands he saw had no foundation whatever. But if the right hon. Gentleman on the Motion for bringing in the Bill made a speech which was only adapted to the second reading, when the second reading is moved, instead of allowing a general discussion to take place upon it, he jumps up at once and immediately makes a speech which is only fitted for Committee. And, Sir, if the course which the right hon. Gentleman indicated last night had been followed, the discussion would have ended that evening, and probably at a very early hour. Now, is that a fair or proper way in which to treat a question like this, which the attendance here always shows to be one deeply interesting to the House as well as to the country, and by the due discussion of which the Government introducing a measure of this character can alone obtain any accurate cognizance of the feelings of this assembly? The right hon. Gentleman said last night in a very solemn tone that if this were a Motion for the third reading of the Bill we should all agree that it would be impossible to pass it. As if, under similar circumstances, that were not the fate of every Bill! As if on the second reading of any Bill it is treated as though it then stood for a third reading! As if a Reform Bill, of all Bills in the world, proposed to be read the second time, any one could expect it to pass the third reading in the exact shape in which it was then presented to the House! Sir, that is not fair criticism. And then the right hon. Gentleman gets up and addresses me in a tone which I must say is very unusual in this House. Not that I much care for that kind of thing; although really his manner is sometimes so very alarming that one might almost feel thankful that Gentlemen in this House who sit on opposite sides of this table are divided by a tolerably broad piece of furniture. The right hon. Gentleman, addressing me in the tone and with the air of a familiar of the Inquisition, puts me to the question and says, "This must be given up, that must be abandoned," and so forth. Sir, I will fairly say that I neither wish to accept conditions from the right hon. Gentleman or to offer them. But I will treat this House on this subject as Her Majesty's Government have always been willing and anxious to do. I have certainly never supposed that we could bring any matter like this to a conclusion without the candid and cordial co-operation of the House of Commons; and it is only by discussion, by becoming acquainted with the different views of hon. Members, by mutual concession and arrangement, that any conclusion whatever on such a question can be arrived at.

that "the lodger franchise must be conceded." Now, I thought that was a very extraordinary tone in which to address one who certainly on the subject of a lodger franchise cannot be supposed to have any very great prejudice. Indeed, if I may say so, I am myself the father of the lodger franchise. Undoubtedly, I was the first Minister who ever proposed its adoption by this House. We hear a great deal of abuse of what are called the "bye-franchises" or the special franchises. We are obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for giving a decent epithet to describe them after the phrases applied to them by the hon. Member for Birmingham. We hear, I say, a great deal of abuse uttered against those franchises; but I believe that the opinion of the House of Commons—the opinion of the majority of the House of Commons—is in their favour ["No!"]; and also that the calm opinion of the country really approves them. ["No!"] Who is the author—who are the great patrons of all these special franchises? They did not emanate from me; they did not come from this Bench. They came from Whig Prime Ministers, from coalition Prime Ministers, and from coalition Chancellors of the Exchequer. There is no doubt one of these special franchises which has recommended itself to the sympathies of a great portion of the people, but which was never invented by a Whig or by a coalition Minister, and it is this very lodger franchise which I am now sternly told we must concede, as if in being asked to concede that we were asked to make some enormous sacrifice. Sir, we had considerable difficulty about the lodger franchise. I will deal candidly with the House. I brought this subject before my Colleagues. I do not know that any of them were particularly hostile to the lodger franchise; but, of course, the first objection to it is that it is inconsistent with a Bill which is founded on the principle of rating, because you cannot rate the lodger. Well, that is an important objection; but it is not one which may not be overcome. I mean to say that my Colleagues would not have been prevented by that consideration alone from entertaining the question of the lodger franchise. Several members of the present Cabinet were in the Cabinet which in 1859 brought forward a lodger franchise; but they said, and said naturally—"The right hon. Member for South Lancashire, the Leader of the Opposition, stated last year that the lodger franchise was an insignificant affair, and that he believed it would produce very small results; and if it be an insignificant affair, and will produce very small results, what is the use of deviating from the principle of our Bill?" But now we find that the lodger franchise, which a few months ago was a very insignificant affair, and could produce only very small results, is the great question of the day. There were seven or seventeen heads of accusation, I forget which; for I may perchance have confounded what occurred here last night with what took place at some of those meetings where what is called "the mob of the House of Commons" attended on the right hon. Gentleman. But though there were these seven or seventeen heads, this one is put forward as the first and foremost, as the one great point on which the fate of the Government is to rest, on which a secretly prepared Resolution is to be moved, and on account of which we are not to be allowed to go into Committee. This is the first great cause and "it must be conceded." Sir, I dare say that the lodger franchise, if we get into Committee, will be discussed with candour and calmness; and if it is brought forward in a shape that commends itself to the favour of the House, I have no doubt the House will adopt it.

But, says the right hon. Gentleman, in the second place—and this is most important—means must be taken to prevent trafficking in the votes of the lowest class of householders. "Means must be adopted!" But what means? I should like the right hon. Gentleman to be more specific and to be more special on this point, as he sometimes is. Of course, we are all anxious to prevent this trafficking as regards "the lowest class of householders"—I must be careful of the words I use. I think also it would be very convenient if we could establish some means of controlling the conduct of the higher class of householders, and if I have an opportunity of bringing in our Bill for the prevention of bribery and corruption we shall make the attempt to do that; although I am not sure, after what has passed to-night, that it will not be opposed by the hon. Member for Birmingham. But what surprises me most in this affair is the assumption of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire that all those persons who are going to be introduced into the constituency by this Bill are anxious to be bribed. ["No!"] Well, a line, a magical line, is to be drawn to prevent it; as if clever

vestrymen and cunning election agents would not soon convert a £4 householder into a £5 householder when you have got your precious line, and so screw the figures up from year to year. But if these people are what you assume, but what I do not believe them to be, then the hon. Member who is, I will not say the great professor of manhood suffrage, but the great counsellor of those who advocate manhood suffrage, will show us that that line is the only bulwark against democracy. I remember some years ago, when the militia was about to be restored, the Government of the day, rather short-sightedly, determined to establish that force on the principle of the ballot; and Lord Palmerston, who had then left them and gone into Opposition, opposed it very much. The Government of the day, a Whig Government, of course containing many great statesmen and distinguished orators with great power in debate, established with wonderful cogency of logic and fertility of illustration, the absolute necessity, if there was to be a militia, of adopting the ballot. Lord Palmerston, on that occasion, said—

"All these arguments are no doubt very imposing; but the reasoning of my noble and right hon. Friends rests entirely on this assumption, that the people of England cannot be trusted."

It was upon that issue he took the opinion of this House, and that the Government was changed. Was he right or wrong in the view which he maintained? Why, you had a militia established on the voluntary principle, and you found that the people of England could be trusted. They received their bounty money and come back in accordance with their engagement every year, and no institution could be more successful, notwithstanding the opposite view that it was impossible to establish a militia on the voluntary principle because the great body of the people could not be trusted. I now say the same thing with regard to these frequent remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, who assumes that everybody who is about to be introduced into the constituencies is already preparing to be bribed ["No, no!"]; that every gentleman who expects to be a Member of Parliament is ready to become a briber; and that a scene of corruption will be the consequence of this popular franchise. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman of the extreme difficulty, and not only the extreme difficulty, but the immense cost, of bribery under the circumstances which will follow the passing of this Bill. Why, it would exhaust all those fabulous resources which have recently been the subject of investigation before Committees, and with results with which the hon. Member for Birmingham seems so peculiarly to sympathize. Let me take the fifty-seven boroughs in which the Small Tenements Act is universally in force, and which furnish the best test on this point. Among these boroughs there are only ten which have less than 500 occupiers within their limits, the average of the whole fifty-seven being 2,445 in each constituency. Well, those wicked vestrymen and artful election agents are to pay their rates for 2,445 men for two years certain, and if you take the average existence of Parliaments at three-and-a-half years, they must pay the rates for that number for that time, and when they have paid their rates what hold, I would ask, will they have on them? for if they consented to pay their rates for three-and-a-half or even two years, I think it very likely these electors would turn round when the hour for action came, and, in consequence of the experience which they had acquired, expect something further and upon a larger scale. Yet, this is the sort of argument—this appeal to the impossible—which is used to show that a proposal which is politic and necessary ought not to be adopted.

The third menace of the right hon. Gentleman was of this nature—He says the distinction between different classes of ratepayers must be abolished. Now that is a very serious question, and one on which a decision ought not to be pronounced by this House in haste. I very much doubt the policy in a country like England, and with institutions such as here prevail, of attempting by artificial means to obtain anything like a similarity of suffrage at a sacrifice of what I may venture to call the natural circumstances in which we are placed. It is most desirable not to deal in a Bill like the present with any privileges which happen previously to exist. If therefore you give the franchise to new classes on the condition of personally paying rates and of adequate residence, you must adopt provisions which are not identical with those which prevail at present under the law; but that difficulty has been felt before. It is not the first time, as the right hon. Gentleman reminded us the other night, that such combinations have been considered by Cabinets and Governments of which he was a distinguished member. Provisions precisely the same as those which we now proposed making a distinction between those already in possession of the franchise, and newly enfranchised classes, were contained in the Reform Bill introduced by the Government of Lord Aberdeen, and there were also provisions specially guarding the rights and privileges of old constituencies. That shows that the subject must have been considered by the wise and eminent men—some of them the most wise and eminent whom the country has produced in this century—who were members of that Cabinet. You may depend upon it that it was not idly that such regulations were framed, and framed too at a time when a £6 rental was the reduction suggested, instead of the great reduction which is now proposed. The right hon. Gentleman says that I am happy in remembering the mistakes of my predecessors. Now, that may be a taunt, or it may be a philosophic observation; but I know this—to revert to the immortal subject of the lodger franchise, which, we are told, is the great political question of the day, that, in the Bill of last year, that favourite offspring of the intellect and passion of the right hon. Gentleman, it was enacted that there should be a qualifying term of two years' residence. What, then, becomes of all this idle rodomontade about our new-fangled schemes and principles, which it is said the English people cannot endure, when eight or nine months ago the same principles and policy were professed, advocated, and recommended by the right hon. Gentleman himself? Now, I have presumed to impress on the House that this is a most important question, and I hope it will not decide upon it with any precipitation. It is of the utmost consequence, if you establish the suffrage on the principles which we recommend, that into it the element of residence, and adequate residence, should enter. There is no other condition which would give satisfaction to the people of this country generally, and permit me to say that there is no condition which has been more popularly received by the working classes. We have some means, though we may not be favoured with all the inspired information respecting the people which hovers round the head of the hon. Member for Birmingham, of becoming acquainted with the feelings and opinions of the great variety of classes in this country at the present moment. There is not a day on which, on this question of Parliamentary Reform, the Government are not in the receipt of I do not say hundreds, but scores upon scores of important communications coming from all classes of working men, individually, collectively, in assembled bodies, and committees, and I will frankly admit that very critical and shrewd remarks are in them sometimes made on our propositions, for I do not pretend that they contain nothing but eulogium. They are communications which we attend to with respect, and by which I hope we may profit; but although in some of them considerable objections are urged with regard to rating, and not unnaturally, because when a man is called upon to pay he thinks twice before assenting to such a proposal—there is observable in them this remarkable characteristic—that without exception they entertain but one opinion on the question of residence. They cheerfully propose the municipal term of residence as a qualification for the exercise of the franchise; so that all this vaunted indignation of the right hon. Gentleman is entirely misplaced, and is indulged in in complete ignorance of what the feeling of the country really is on the subject of residence. This is a condition which recommends itself to the good sense and is accepted by the integrity of Englishmen, and we shall, I believe, make a great mistake if we deviate from this proposition in the Bill. I admit that there is at first sight something invidious—though that interpretation does not seem to have occurred to those to whom I have just been alluding—in having one household qualification based on one year, and another for a longer term; but when you are dealing with complicated transactions of this kind, and when you are adding new franchises to old constituencies, there must be irregularities, from which some persons may draw invidious inferences, though the people at large do not. If you make any proposition in Committee with a view to remove this invidious character without destroying the fundamental condition, we shall, of course, be prepared to consider it. It has been suggested that the term with regard to the £10 householders should be increased to two years, reserving all existing rights, and the suggestion may be worthy of consideration; but depend upon it the House will commit a great error if it supposes that by reducing the term of residence as a test of fitness for the exercise of the franchise it will be doing that which the working classes either desire or approve.

I now approach the fourth head of the impeachment. It is said that the taxing franchise and the dual vote must be abandoned. Let me say a word first about the taxing franchise. I have already touched on the lodger franchise, and I leave that respectable franchise, the savings bank franchise, and others invented by Lord Russell—who is supposed to be the most learned man on the subject of franchises—I leave them with the dust of almost venerable antiquity on them, and I proceed to this dreadful invention of Lord Derby's Government—the franchise founded on direct taxation. But this, too, has not the claim of originality. This also is a franchise proposed by previous Administrations. Let me call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which this franchise was first proposed. It was proposed first in 1852, Lord John Russell then being Prime Minister. He had to draw up a Reform Bill. Generally speaking that is an easy task to him; but on this occasion he wished to appear with some novelty, and some new franchises were proposed. Being a man of a constitutional temperament, he determined to have a franchise founded on the greatest duty of Englishmen—that of paying taxes. He thought that duty should confer a right. When a Minister, and especially a Minister more distinguished for his constitutional than his financial knowledge, projects a franchise of this kind, of course he avails himself of the best information. He brings to his aid the intelligent views of adepts; he broaches his idea, and has it well discussed in argument by persons well versed in all the details, and it was only, of course, on their advice that he adopted the scheme, which was proposed in this House, and which died an untimely death. The House never pronounced against it; but in course of time—in the course of two rather important and troubled years—there was a new Administration, and a new Reform Bill was introduced. The question of the franchise founded on direct taxation was again brought before the consideration of Parliament. Mark what happened between 1852 and 1854 on the subject of direct taxation. The question of the income tax during those two years was the question of the day. It engrossed public attention, and made the fate and fall of Ministers. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire obtained, and justly obtained, great distinction for the manner in which he treated the question of the income tax, and showed himself a complete master of all its details.

It was a great advantage to Lord Russell when Lord Aberdeen deputed to him the task of providing a franchise founded on taxation, that he could consult the right hon. Gentleman—a man transcendent on all subjects, eminent for his knowledge of finance, but most remarkable for his knowledge of direct taxation. Any failure which Lord Russell met with in 1852, might be ascribed to circumstances totally irrelevant to the merits of the Bill; they could not again be anticipated, especially with the immense advantage of the assistance of the right hon. Gentleman, who is able to take a part in the consideration of every subject. I have no doubt he was consulted on every part of the Reform Bill of 1854. I believe he drew up the proviso which saved the rights of the £10 householders. It is in his style. It was, I say, of immense advantage to Lord Russell, when forming a franchise founded on direct taxation, that he had the assistance of a person of the great ability and strong character of the right hon. Gentleman, who was entire master of the subject. There can be no doubt, the right hon. Gentleman was the constructor of the franchise founded on direct taxation. Then, how can we reconcile with such circumstances the language of the right hon. Gentleman, that this franchise will make faggot votes; that it is the most objectionable of all propositions; and to repeat the words employed by the right hon. Gentleman last night, it must be abandoned? Whether the House will abandon it or not is a subject for future consideration; but practical men, who know as much about the incidence of the income tax and the subject of taxation generally as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, laugh at his objections, and say that there is nothing in them. They were perfectly surprised at the remarks which the House of Commons received with the natural deference and the natural credulity which it is the pleasure of the House to extend to the right hon. Gentleman. I have before me some remarks on the subject in a letter dated the 24th of March, written by one who, I suppose, the right hon. Gentleman will not hesitate for a moment to acknowledge to be a consummate judge of the subject, and whom I know personally he highly respects. I will read it—liable in almost every such case would have a vote from other sources. As regards the income tax, I think it is absurd to suppose that a man would return his income for assessment, having none, for the purpose of getting on the register. He must do it annually, and pay the tax, and he could not obtain it back on the ground of exemption. With regard to the assessed taxes, the assessment is not made until after the year in which the article subject to taxation has been kept, and will a person state in his assessment paper that he had a carriage, horses, and servants in the year preceding, having had none? I do not believe it, for persons of that class would not be supplied with the ordinary printed tax paper to make the return which would be brought into the assessment. And how could they be assessed? The revising barrister should be empowered to require the claimant to prove his bond fide liability, and a clause to that effect should be inserted in the Bill.”

Well, that is the opinion of Sir Charles Pressley, and everybody who knows him knows him to be a man of consummate ability. Here is another opinion, that of a calmer temperament, perhaps, but it is well worth the consideration of the House. It is the opinion of Mr. Stevenson, and he says that he agrees with Sir Charles Pressley in applying the remedy which he suggests. But he adds that he would be disposed to doubt whether any inquisition into the affairs of men who are to be charged with the income tax would be necessary, for it should be remembered that the assessment of men in situations are furnished by their employers, and that therefore no extensive frauds could be committed without the knowledge of their masters. Now, I ask the House, after hearing these opinions from such men, and remembering that Lord Aberdeen's Administration was the author of this very franchise, and which, no doubt, was constructed under the special advice and counsel of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, or, if not, he was remiss in the performance of his duties, as a Member of that Cabinet, whether such arguments as he used last night should have been uttered, particularly when we think of the respect due to Lord Russell, should not have been withheld. There should have been more regard for the feelings of that distinguished nobleman. I think the right hon. Gentleman might have spared the epithets he showered on this franchise. It is very possible that in the Committee it may be improved. Well, if not, what is the use of going into Committee? Some hon. Gentlemen seem to think it a wise thing to sneer at the action of their own Committee. These are questions, if there are any, with respect to which the House has the power of improving the suggestions of Ministers.

I leave for a moment, until I have touched on some slighter topics, the question of the dual vote, in order to come to the fifth article of impeachment, which was couched in the same imperative and authoritative language—"the re-distribution must be enlarged." [Hear, hear! from an hon. Member on the Opposition Benches.] The hon. Member who cheers is bound to tell us what he means by enlarging the re-distribution. I will not do as the right hon. Gentleman did last night—I will not call on the hon. Member to make his maiden speech now by way of parenthesis to my observations; but I must say that, in trying to settle the most difficult question of the day, we have a right to expect from the hon. Member, as well as from a statesman in the position of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, some indication of their views of enlarged re-distribution. That, Sir, is a very important question. We, Sir, may have contracted views and limited notions on the subject; but we have been frank in stating them. Is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, then, to sit there, with his large process of distribution, surrounded by some who think themselves his followers and his friends, while he may be prepared to stab them to the heart? I say that particularly, because I am told there is to be a large scheme of re-distribution, with which it is impossible to proceed without destroying his most intimate friends. Now, Sir, we have laid down the principles on which we think re-distribution ought to take place. If there be any Gentlemen who are of opinion that any strange and new principles should be introduced—if there are advocates of cumulative voting and other means of obtaining the opinion not only of majorities but of minorities; but which new principles cannot be applied without a great change in our whole electoral scheme; I understand, I respect those opinions, though I differ from them; but I deny that any man has a right to loll on his easy seat in the House of Commons, and only tell us when a practical proposition is brought forward that the re-distribution must be enlarged. I say the right hon. Gentleman ought to take the earliest opportunity of informing the country what are the views on which he thinks re-distribution ought to take place, and calm the uneasy feelings of all his adherents—uneasy feelings with which I sympathize, but do not wish to share.

Then we are told that the county franchise must be reduced. Well, we have reduced it; we make a proposition to reduce the county franchise. The county occupation franchise is at present £50. We propose it should be £15 on a rating basis certainly; but every one will admit that that is a very large reduction. I have not heard that any much larger reduction is proposed; at any rate, that is a matter of secondary importance. It is entirely for discussion in Committee. Did not Lord Palmerston, when he voted for the Bill of the hon. Member for Surrey (Mr. Locke King)—a Bill for a £10 county qualification—did he not say he was not pledged for £10, and in Committee would propose £20. Then, as to voting-papers; it is a very interesting question. Voting-papers, we are told, must not be pressed. So far as I am concerned, they will be pressed; but it is a question on which the opinion of the House ought to be taken; and I heard with pleasure last night that the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck)—I say the Member for Sheffield, for so he should always be described—the Member for Sheffield did incidentally remark that of the principle of voting-papers he approved. I do not say he is pledged to the application of it in the Government Bill; but every man of sense and experience must feel that this is a very important principle, well worthy of the consideration of the House of Commons. [Mr. ROEBUCK: I beg to inform the right hon. Gentleman that he makes a mistake. I never said any such thing.] I regret, Sir, that a pleasing illusion has been dispelled; but I have such confidence in the intelligence and candour of the hon. and learned Gentleman, that I will not despair that he may yet support it.

Now, Sir, let me ask the attention of the House to what the Member for Birmingham very properly described as, after all, the great question—the borough franchise. You have been trying to deal with the borough franchise for fifteen years. Five Governments have made propositions—four Governments certainly; the fifth proposed no change, but still, at least, they expressed by their policy an opinion on the subject. Five Governments have attempted to deal with the borough franchise. It has been twice attempted to be dealt with in this very House of Parliament. There is no figure, no combination of figures, there are no means by which value can be ascertained that you have not had recourse to ; and now some Gentlemen opposite are following the old track, and believe that they have arrived at a solution of all difficulties and determination of all political perplexity on the subject by taking refuge in £5 rating, when every one knows that it is as shifting as the sand for a foundation on which to rest any superstructure, and that all those election agents we hear of, and all those ambitious and cunning overseers that now occupy so much attention, could by their power or favour convert a £3 or £4 into a £5 rating with the greatest ease. We have taken the subject into consideration, and have thought it was wise to establish this franchise on a distinct principle that could not be mistaken ; and we say, if a man personally pays his rates, and has resided a certain time, that is prima facie evidence that he is a man of a regular, methodical, and dutiful course of life ; and, on the whole, in a borough, a very good test. You must have some test in all these cases. The Member for Birmingham is against all tests whatever. I think there are such things as tests. The man who has a house, who is rated to the poor, who pays his rates, and who for two years has paid his rates, these are circumstances that recommend him to our minds as a man competent to fulfil a trust. But then the Member for Birmingham, and a great many Members before him, have said your principle may or may not be a good one ; but assuming that it is a good principle, your application of it may not be good. We find that practically you are leaving out of the enjoyment of the franchise a great many men who are quite competent to exercise it and deserve it, and that in consequence of legislation not, after all, very old. Well, when we are talking of an ancient constitution, and speculating on the possibility of investing men with rights which may influence the destinies of our country for ages to come, you come and tell us of rating Acts, which, after all, were only passed in the memory of our fathers and ourselves, and these are to be the obstacles which are to prevent us from establishing the franchise of Englishmen on the ancient and proper basis. But we meet that difficulty fairly and thoroughly, I think ; and we say, Let every man who by the action of these local or general Acts is not rated to the relief of the poor have the privilege of calling upon the official person to rate him ; and let him in consequence obtain the enjoyment of the suffrage. No one pretends that the principle is not sound, and that the proposition is not large. The principle is this :—A man who is personally rated, and who has by his residence what is thought in this country a fair claim to the trust of the community, is to have the suffrage. And if by these peculiar Acts of Parliament there are classes who are, as it were, prevented from enjoying on these conditions the suffrage, we give them the right, notwithstanding these Acts, of asserting their claim and acquiring the franchise. Now, who can deny that that principle is correct in theory ? The application of it is vast and unlimited.

What, then, are the objections to this ? We have heard many ; but I think they were summed up in the speech we heard to-night from the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer). I remember—I am sorry to say one remembers too many things now—but I remember, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, who was in that Parliament, remembers also, that there was a great party struggle in this House—and the right hon. Gentleman belonged then to the same party as myself—with respect to the policy pursued by the Government in regard to China. A reference was made to the elaborate speech of a lawyer delivered during that debate by Sir James Graham, whose name is not often mentioned in this House, but is never by me to be mentioned without respect and affection ; for he was one of the most considerable men we ever had in this House. He rose in his stately cynicism, and exclaimed, “ Let us get out of the region of Nisi Prius ; ” and when we come here to offer the franchise to the people of England—notwithstanding the imputations of the hon. Member for Birmingham—in a spirit of sincerity and truth—when we offer to establish it on a principle that no one can contravert, and to apply it without limit—when I heard those observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond, I recollected the observation of Sir James Graham, and I say we must get out of the region of Nisi Prius.

But there is another spirit in which to deal with this question than that of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and that is the spirit of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who takes a more statesmanlike view of this question; for although on the subject of rating he delighted and misled the House at the same time, yet he touched on greater themes. He said this system of yours is all inequality; this is the difficulty I find in it; this is the fatal consequence I denounce. If you establish your suffrage on rating and apply it, you will not find two towns in which the same suffrage will exist. There are fifty-seven towns in which the Small Tenements Act prevails; there are ninety-two in which it partially prevails; and there are twenty-seven in which it does not prevail at all. And then the hon. Gentleman says, "Good God, what will be the consequence under such circumstances of the application of such a proposition as that in your Bill?" Why, Sir, I always thought that what we have been complaining of for years was the dreary monotony of the settlement of 1832, and the too identical character of the constituency under that Act. Every time these discussions were brought on we were told over and over again that what the country languished for was the variety of franchise that they were deprived of by the Act of 1832, and that if that had been re-introduced in any of the schemes of later years one of the great wants of the country would have been supplied. It had been said, and most justly said, that the remarkable characteristics of this assembly—the variety of character which distinguishes it—is really owing to the machinery of the small boroughs which were called into existence, partly under the Plantagenets, but certainly under the Tudors and Stuarts, and which have given to England that varied representation of interests which India and our multifarious colonies, the settlements of two oceans and of two hemispheres demanded. And I say of these Local Rating Acts, which have been so criticized—these Small Tenements Acts, which prevail, we are given to understand, with a power as secret and inscrutable as that of the Jesuits—that they can absolutely, though unintentionally, give us that variety which the country requires, and which I believe is an admirable quality. ["Oh!"] Why, how does it work? There are twenty-seven boroughs under this system in which almost household suffrage prevails. What is the harm of that? Have you not been year after year deploring that you have no longer Members for Preston and such places elected by household suffrage—that we have no longer a system that produces among us a Hunt or a Cobbett? Among the twenty-seven towns in which the Small Tenements Act prevails you have this large constituency. There is a dozen of these twenty-seven boroughs having some of the most considerable constituencies in England. There are Stockport, Bradford, and half-a-dozen others. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Stoke-upon-Trent.] That is one of the greatest arguments that I have heard in favour of it, though the right hon. Gentleman the other night, taking advantage of the position he had in the debate, appealed to my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. B. Hope), who, in consequence, delivered a fiery invective against our Bill. I will not stop to consider what would be his relative position if this £5 rating were adopted in his borough instead of our proposal. It would make a difference of only a very few thousands. There would be a difference as between 15,000 and 9,000. But every one knows that my hon. Friend is perfectly superior to any political accidents of this kind. The hon. Member is Member for the Potteries, and, in my opinion, he will always represent the Potteries, because they are filled by an intelligent population, who like men of social standing and refined taste in the arts, and who are not insensible to the charms of his rich and grotesque rhetoric.

Well now, Sir, let me ask the House to consider what is the result of our proposal respecting the borough franchise. Our proposal—I must repeat it again even at the risk of wearying the House—is that every householder who is rated to the poor and personally pays his rates, and who has occupied his house for two years, shall possess the franchise. I never wished in arguing this question that its merits should depend on the exact numbers that may be admitted under it to the exercise of the suffrage. I think that on that subject a vast misapprehension prevails. It is a mistake to suppose that mere numbers make democracy. So long as you have fitness and variety it is impossible that democracy can prevail. In our proposal we believe these two elements do prevail. Now, Sir, recurring to a point to which I alluded when I first rose in answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, I mentioned the other night that by our scheme 240,000 persons in round numbers would be qualified to enjoy the franchise, and I thought that it was the duty of statesmen and politicians in the proposal of laws to look to those who would be qualified, and not to those who would vote. I think, with great deference, that the House has rather erred in trying always to calculate the state of the poll. But this is a practical assembly, and I adopt its tone, and I will argue the case in the way in which the House, and especially the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), appears to wish it to be considered. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that my 240,000 qualified persons would only prove to be 120,000 persons who could possibly go to the poll. I believe, however, that he did not subject even them to the constitutional conditions of our Bill—that they should be personally rated, and that they should reside for two years. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I have.] Well, we expect some opposition to our Bill; but it should be an opposition on some definite ground. Is it a Radical, or is it a Conservative Bill? You must oppose it on one ground or the other. You cannot blow hot and cold upon it. I brought it forward not as a Radical, but as a Conservative measure. I brought it forward as a Conservative, but as a popular Bill, and if the word had not been objected to the other night I would say that I defy any person to show me any measure which the House has passed of a more popular, and at the same time of a more Conservative character. I admit that these 120,000 may be the most that are practically admitted to the exercise of the franchise by our proposal. We never considered the numbers, but we looked to the principle. We looked to the means by which we might unite competency and fitness with variety of character, in order to form the constitution of the country. If we have to reduce the 240,000 by one-half, the same rule must of course apply to the 460,000 compound-householders, who, according to the hon. Member for Birmingham, are excluded by this Bill. I never apprehended that the hon. Member for Birmingham was ready to enfranchise all these persons. On the contrary, no man has ever impressed upon society more strenuously that there are a great many people to whom he would not give the power of voting. Following, then, the principle to which I have just referred, those 460,000 compound-householders will be reduced to 230,000. If you apply the constitutional conditions which we ask the House to adopt, that number will be still further reduced. Upon these constitutional conditions the House ought to give an opinion. Are they or are they not of opinion that a man who is to be intrusted with the suffrage should be rated to the poor, should pay his own rates, and have, moreover, a two years' residence in the place where he is so rated? I cannot apprehend that the number that will be admitted within the pale of the Constitution, as it is called, by the scheme which we propose, will be so great as to cause any distrust or alarm. I believe that those who will obtain the franchise, and who are not compound-householders, will not exceed the number which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has estimated as the immediate consequence of our Bill. But it must be remembered that our Bill is not framed, as was the one of last Session, to enfranchise a specific number of persons. We do not attempt that. We lay down a principle and let that principle work; but if you ask us what will be the result of its working, we say—although we do not wish to found our policy on it—that we do not apprehend the number that will be admitted to the enjoyment of the franchise will exceed the number contemplated by the Bill of last Session. But there is this difference between our proposition and the proposition made by the right hon. Gentleman. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman was founded upon a state of things which was liable to be changed the next year, when the question might possibly have to be raised again, while the proposition that we make is founded upon a principle that is not liable to alteration. With regard to the dual vote, I frankly confess, when I consider how limited may be the number enfranchised by our scheme, that I am not prepared to recommend a proposition which was originally intended to protect the middle classes against an invasion of their political power. That proposition as to the dual vote was not merely brought forward as a check and a counterpoise. No such mere vulgar idea entered our minds. ["Oh, oh!"] It is all very well for Gentlemen to sneer. Nothing is easier than that; but you must recollect that for a number of years the attention of some of the most eminent men, and of some of the profoundest thinkers, has been given to the subject of Parliamentary representation; and that by many of them it has been held that it is impossible to disturb the balance of political power, as it now exists, without departing from the old system of apportioning one vote to each individual. We cannot, however, be blind to what has recently occurred. We believed that men of great mark and standing were prepared to support this view, and possibly even now, before we have finished with this Bill, we shall find more than one hon. Member rising to propose a still broader and stronger principle than the one involved in the dual vote. The question is a profound one, and one that has commanded and will command great attention. But this is essentially a practical assembly, and it is the business of Her Majesty's Government to bring forward, and, if possible, to pass a measure of Reform. We must also defer to the wishes of our supporters. What encouragements have we received from this side of the House upon this point? [Laughter.] Do hon. Gentlemen mean to say that we are to disregard the opinions of our friends? Why, Sir, we are not prepared to disregard the opinions even of our foes. If there be any one question upon which the opinion of the House has been expressed more clearly than upon another, it has been upon this. And most certainly we have received no encouragement. From first to last no one has spoken a single word in its favour. I had hoped that some stray philosopher would have risen to say something in its behalf, and to have lent dignity to our forlorn position. I had hoped that the noble Viscount the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne) would have given it his support, but even he denounced it.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I distinctly stated that I thought the proposal just.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: At any rate the noble Viscount said he believed it to be impracticable, and if practicable, would do no good. How can one fight against such difficulties? I am prepared to fight against the greatest difficulties. But we stand here as practical men, with a duty to fulfil, and that is to pass a Bill for the Amendment of the Representation of the People, and it would therefore have been worse than idle to persist against such opposition. One word before I conclude. I hear much of the struggle of parties in this House, and I hear much of combinations that may occur, and courses that may be taken, which may affect the fate of this Bill. All I can say on the part of my Colleagues and myself is that we have no other wish at the present moment than, with the co-operation of this House, to bring the question of Parliamentary Reform to a settlement. I know the Parliamentary incredulity with which many will receive avowals that we are only influenced in the course we are taking by a sense of duty; but I do assure the House, if they need such assurances after what we have gone through, after the sacrifices we have made, after having surrendered our political connection with men whom we more than regarded—I can assure them no other principle animates us but a conviction that we ought not to desert our posts until this question has been settled. Rest assured that it is not for the weal of England that this settlement should be delayed. You may think that the horizon is not disturbed at the present juncture—you may think that surrounding circumstances may be favourable to dilatory action, some of you may think, in the excitement of the moment, that ambition may be gratified, and that the country may look favourably upon those who prevent the passing of this Bill. Do not believe it. There is a deep responsibility with regard to this question, resting not upon the Government merely, but upon the whole House of Commons. We are prepared, as I think I have shown, to act in all sincerity in this matter. Act with us cordially and candidly, assist us to carry this measure. We will not shrink from deferring to your suggestions so long as they are consistent with the main object of this Bill which we have never concealed from you, and which is to preserve the representative character of the House of Commons. Act with us, I say, cordially and candidly, you will find on our side complete reciprocity of feeling. Pass the Bill, and then change the Ministry if you like.

Question put, and agreed to: Bill read a second time.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Mutiny Bill must be taken on Thursday next: on the following Monday, there are Votes in Supply which cannot be deferred. On the 4th of April I propose to make the Financial Statement, and I will therefore give Monday the 8th for Committee on this Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot think that the arrangement proposed is the one which would be most convenient to the House. The right hon. Gentleman says it is a matter of great necessity that the Financial Statement should be made on the 4th. Now, no doubt there are sometimes peculiar circumstances which render it very desirable that that Statement should be made at a very early period indeed; but we have not been given to understand that there is on this occasion any great question pending which disturbs the public mind, or which agitates trade and throws it into a state of suspension, such as would necessitate the proceeding with the Financial Statement at a particularly early date. Moreover, it is very difficult, as I know from experience, to get all the facts connected with the finance of the country into a position to be presented to the House as early as three days after making up the year's accounts. If the right hon. Gentleman would tell us whether any great change is contemplated in our financial system, or whether there is any large reduction of taxation which he is able to promise, or any other topic of extreme importance, I, for one, should not, if such circumstances exist, at all object to the proposal which he has made; but otherwise it does not appear to me convenient to the House to postpone the Motion for the Speaker's leaving the Chair until the 8th. I am far from saying that the difference between the 4th and the 8th is one on which I, for one, should think it necessary to go to an issue with Her Majesty's Government, for I do not think the question is one of such magnitude, as to justify that course; but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be disposed to re-consider his proposal. ["No, no!"] Much more ample time would be allowed for the House either to go through the discussion which may precede the Speaker's leaving the Chair, or to enter upon the consideration in some other manner of the main provisions of this Bill, if he would fix the Motion for the 4th than if he postpones it till the 8th.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: We have, of course, considered the question from every point of view, and for many reasons we are convinced that the course we are taking is the most convenient for the public interests.

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS BILL.

(Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens, Mr. Kinnaird,
Mr. Locke.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that he would occupy as little of the time of the House as was consistent with the duty he owed to the many people throughout the country who had signified their adhesion to the principle of the Bill. When he had the honour of submitting a similar measure to the House last year he was careful to state that it was introduced from no predisposition or predilection of his own for any peculiar remedy for an acknowledged evil; and that if the House chose to devote that attention to the subject which it deserved, no doubt in its wisdom it would elaborate something much better than anything which his own limited experience could suggest. Without a division, the draft Bill which he then laid before it was read a second time by the House, and referred to a Select Committee, on whom was devolved the task of elaborating its provisions. Without a division, that Committee directed him, as its Chairman, to report the Bill to the House; and the measure which he now asked the House to sanction was in ipso the Bill which left the Select Committee. That Committee, as usual, was composed of Members from both sides of the House; but what was not usual, it combined a degree of experience and ability peculiar to the subject, which fairly entitled him to claim the favourable consideration of the House for the result of its deliberations. He was quite aware that to many hon. Members around the principle of the Bill might seem novel, and a departure from that rule of non-interference in the ordinary concerns of social life which was considered one of the corner stones of our national policy in these matters, and he frankly admitted that if a case for the necessity of such interference could not be shown, he had no right to thrust the subject on the attention of the House. He would go further, and say that unless there was a general conviction in the public mind of the urgency of the measure, the House would not be performing its duty in giving its sanction to a Bill founded upon such a principle. No objection had been taken in limine to the consideration of the subject. Parliament had recognised the urgency of the evil. It had been said by many that voluntary effort in the way of enterprize, and voluntary benevolence aiding enterprize, would overtake the evil, but he did not then believe that that expectation was well founded, nor did he now, and his opinion was strengthened by the petition which had been presented to the House on the subject. The delay which occurred between the consideration of the Bill in the Select Committee and the subsequent change of Government which prevented it passing its final stage last Session, gave an opportunity for its public reconsideration; and he appealed to every hon. Member who watched the tide of popular opinion upon public questions to say whether there had not been a consentaneity of opinion in favour of this measure. He had had the honour of presenting petitions signed by hundreds and thousands of persons, some being clergymen and ministers of other denominations, others employing great numbers of artizans and labourers, and others again artizans themselves, who were to be primarily benefited by the Bill. On the other hand, it was right to say that the only objections raised to the measure this year emanated from a very small minority of those corporate bodies and local authorities upon whom it would impose additional trouble. Now, let them ask the House to consider broadly this question. They knew that the population was yearly increasing, and that increment was in the great towns, and not in the counties. They knew that the tendency of the day, which the House ought not to attempt to control, was towards the concentration of capital and employment, and the Home Secretary had daily evidence before him that there was a tendency to the congestion of population in a few great centres of industry, in which it required all the vigilance which the Government could exercise to maintain order, keep the peace, and conserve the health of the masses of population. If such were the tendencies of the age, it was not very likely that the evil of which he complained would cure itself. Many of those who on the first blush of the subject were not inclined to agree with him suggested, no doubt in the most disinterested and philosophic spirit, laissez faire principle as applied to this question. They said, "We let commerce alone, we let religion alone; why not adopt the laissez faire principle as applied to the dwellings of the poor, and let them alone?" He had been a member of the great association for the liberation of trade, and all his life a free trader. He was quite willing to give that consideration to others which he claimed for himself in all matters of conscience. Wherever they had a fair field and no favour, and wherever an evil existed which they could counteract by investigation and inquiry, whether it related to trade, or to an unpopular creed, no doubt the laissez faire principle would apply; but he, for one, did not undersand the application of that principle when they had to encounter such evils as fever dens and fever nests. He did not understand how they were in such cases to admit Mr. Carlyle's terrible maxim, enunciated in a moment of sarcasm and scorn (which he feared was literally true), that the doctrine of free competition, carried out to its logical result, meant "success to the strongest, wreck to the weakest, and in the race the devil take the hindmost." Let them ask any man who was in the habit of going amongst the poor to console, to instruct, or to relieve them, what was the universal testimony borne as to the result of their operations? Was it not that it was labour in vain?—that it was sowing the wind; that they were met by the mock of people who had not, literally, a place wherein to lay their heads in peace; who had to work from morn till night, from ten to twelve hours a day; and who on their return had to herd together in places to which not one Member of that House would consign his horse or his dog. How could they expect that a man who found himself surrounded by an infirm wife and sickly children, confined in a dismal den in which all the offices of nature had to be performed, could devote his mind to intellectual pursuits or mental improvement with a view to his regeneration in the social scale? much less could they expect a man under these circumstances to abstain from going to the public-house round the corner and getting threepenny-worth of paradise in the shape of gin. The House was not accountable for the acts of Providence; but they were accountable if, having means in their power, they neglected to use them for the purpose of giving these people a chance of moral and physical redemption. Every day they heard it said that our industry was jeopardised by competition arising around them in all quarters. He, for one, did not much fear or much regret that. In that respect he was a free trader indeed. The force of that competition no one could deny, and it was likely to be more or less advantageous or disadvantageous; but what was the greatest interest in this House or of society in this country, in comparison with the performance of that duty which consisted in keeping the skilled classes who lived by labour, in a physically, socially, and morally healthy condition? They had spent two months in debating whether they would enfranchise and give to that class political power. He was ready to go the whole length in that direction; but did they desire the franchise in comparison with a measure that would give them decent homes, without which the possession of the franchise would be a mere mockery, and might become a snare? Everybody who had fought as he had a contested election knew the difficulty and danger of giving political rights to such men. They could not apply the same principle to men in diverse conditions. To men whose extreme poverty had led to the loss of all self-respect, and who were broken down by habits of self-degradation, their patriotic speeches was as idle wind in empty space. He might be told that they could not afford still further to burden the rates, that corporate bodies were afraid to impose any additional rates; but he maintained that it would rather have a contrary effect, and he would ask whether they could afford, in the interest even of the ratepaying community, to leave these evils unredressed? He was prepared to withdraw the Bill, if any Gentleman could get up and say that, as a matter of arithmetic, it would have an injurious effect upon the rates. In the heaviest rated districts the want of such a measure was felt to be greatest. He had presented petitions from the most heavily taxed districts in the borough of Finsbury, where people instinctively knew that if they substituted decent houses for miserable hovels not worth rating, they benefited the general rate. They had instinct or common sense sufficient to know that if for a class of inhabitants living in perpetual fever nests, generating distress and pauperism, they substituted a class living on their own skilled labour in healthy dwellings, they created customers for the small shopkeepers, and by that means diminished the chances and incidences of pauperism. They saw well enough that every skilled man who was prostrated by preventible disease was so much capital withdrawn from the stock of the community which they could not supply by any Act of Parliament. It was not the rent of land or the interest upon money, but the wages of the labourer day by day, out of which the taxation of the country to the amount of some £60,000,000 annually came, and every hand struck down by fever or disease was so much destruction of capital; for he could appeal to hon. Gentlemen in that House, great authorities on political economy, whether the destruction of every hand that could construct a machine, a watch, or an article of commerce which entered into home or foreign competition, was not the destruction of so much capital, which was to be deducted from the aggregate amount devoted to the employment of labour? Therefore, as a mere matter of arithmetic, he believed that this Bill was not calculated to add to the incidence of rating. The machinery of the Bill clearly indicated that in the opinion of the Select Committee it would not increase the burden of the rates; because one of the clauses provided that whenever the local authorities of any district considered that it ought to be cleared of houses unfit for human habitation, and that no others ought to be erected owing to the crowded state of the buildings upon that particular site, they should in that case be subject to such demolition as they would be by law subject to under the provisions of the Act of last Session, which was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the then President of the Privy Council. He thought he was not stating the matter unfairly when he said that that Act was brought in with a consciousness that a proper complement to it would be found in some such Bill as the present; and when the present Government assumed office last year, he had the satisfaction of hearing from at least one Member of the present cabinet the acknowledgment that the operation of the Public Health Amendment Act alone would rather tend to aggravate than to cure the evil complained of. He believed that in many cases that Act had been wholly inoperative on account of the officers of health shrinking from the performance of the terrible duty of wholesale eviction. He had been through crowded districts in the heart of London where public improvements had been contemplated, and where with that view it had been sought to bring the Public Health Amendment Act into operation for the purpose of removing the miserable dens and hovels of the poor, and where the whole thing had come to a stand-still; because, in the event of the houses being pulled down, the inhabitants would have no refuge but the street, and the officers of health shrank with horror from reducing them to that alternative. They talked about the necessity for public improvements, and the impropriety of making any resistance to the law; but they must remember that the plough-share of improvement had been driven remorselessly through the homes of hundreds of poor men living on the process of their labour, and contributing to the wealth of the State. Was it a question beneath the notice of the House how they were to be dealt with? Was it a matter of no importance to secure contentment among that great class? They might possess generosity and benevolence; but were they to content themselves by telling these poor classes that law and order must be preserved, and that when they receive a notice to quit their homes, miserable though they might be, they must obey without complaint, although the only alternative was being turned into the streets? He would give one instance of eviction that came under his own notice last autumn. Union Court was in that way doomed to demolition last autumn, and scores of families were told they must find other shelter where they could. A deputation of the poorer inhabitants waited upon the President of the Board of Works, and pointed out that the effect would be to turn them into the streets, and accordingly asked what they were to do. The right hon. Gentleman, of course, deplored the hard necessity under which they were placed, but he could suggest no remedy; they must, he said, find other places where they could. What happened? One man, an honest industrious artisan, who was able by his labour to earn 25s. a week, and who supported his wife and a family of several children on the produce of his industry, was driven from his home. It had been said that the railways provided facilities for persons so situated, and pleasant pictures of beautiful little cottages, the doors and windows covered with honeysuckle and wild roses, had been drawn by ardent imaginations, where the tired artisan might rest from his labour and breathe the pure fresh air of the country; but he could tell the House that such things were a frightful mockery and delusion, and that the necessity for workmen to live near their work precluded them in most instances from availing themselves of those facilities were they never so great. It was a melancholy thing to reflect that the hardest things to convince people of were those which were most obvious, and it was no wonder that when this class of men found themselves turned out of their dwellings they should manifest some impatience. In the case he was alluding to, the man was turned out of his home. He looked about him a long time in vain. He was, however, necessitated to live near his work, and at last he discovered a single room, overlooking a dirty court-yard, in the neighbourhood of one of our great inns of court. He paid a heavy rent for permission to lay his head in that room. It was in the sweltering days of autumn. Fever watched his victim, tracked him to his new abode, and laid him down on a bed of death. His wife and six children had to remain in the room, breathing the pestiferous fever-laden atmosphere. Why did fever make sure of its victim? I will tell you:

it was because there were in that eight-roomed house no less than fifty-seven living human beings. After the man's death, his wife and six children were thrown on the rates, so that morally, politically, and in every way it was bad economy to allow a state of things to continue by which such results were brought about. The house in question was so full that the officers of the parish shrank from the responsibility of clearing it. It remained, the fever spread, and the great evil to be dreaded in this country was, he believed, not so much the recurrence of the cholera as the prevalence of typhus and the pauperism which, day after day, it was generating. The corporation of Manchester objected to the Bill because they said it might lead to an increase of the rates; but, on the other hand, petitions had been presented from ministers of religion, and others in that town, praying that the measure might be allowed to pass. He held in his hand the last number of the Journal of Social Science, where he found a paper by the medical officer of Chorlton-on-Medlock, in which it was stated that in the first eight weeks of this year there were in Salford and Manchester 137 deaths from fever; that in some places the deaths exceeded the births, and that the town might be said to be built over one vast cesspool. Similar testimony was borne by Mr. Reece, the secretary to the Sanitary Association of Manchester, who said that multitudes of the people had their dwelling-places, or he should rather call them their dying-places, amid the scenes which he mentioned. He had, indeed, been told that at Leeds objections were entertained to any interference there such as the Bill might bring about; but he could very well understand that corporations, which in legal phrase were said to have no soul, might in individual instances have no conscience, and he was informed by the consulting physician to one of the great institutions at Leeds that all that was most valuable in the public opinion of the town was in favour of the Bill, and that but little could be accomplished by voluntary efforts, compared with what was required to be done to meet the necessities of the case, adding that he himself was a member of a building society by which a capital of £50,000 had been raised, but that he nevertheless felt the expediency of resorting to the compulsory system proposed. As to the machinery of the Bill, he would only say that he was prepared to welcome any suggestion by which it might be made more workable. He had no parental feeling with regard to any of its clauses, and he invited hon. Members to change them if they thought well, provided they only entered into the discussion in a spirit of criticism favourable to the object which he had in view. There were those who criticized to damage and those who criticized to mend, and it was in the spirit of the latter, admitting the magnitude of the evil, and pointing out how a remedy might be provided, that he trusted the Bill would be dealt with. He earnestly invited the Government to lend their valuable aid—since they could not find time to take up the subject themselves—to render the measure workable. It had been agreed to as it now stood by a Committee upstairs, who concurred in pronouncing it to be a safe measure. In it due care was taken to protect the legitimate rights of property. It was proposed that, as in the case of Liverpool, to which an Act had been granted for the purpose four years ago, which had proved to be most salutary, the officers of health should be enabled to prosecute places unfit for human habitation as evils and nuisances, and that pro hac the scope of that Act might be extended to the metropolis. He should not recapitulate the details of the Bill, and if any of its provisions were deemed to require explanation that explanation would, he was sure, be readily furnished by his hon. and learned Friend near him, the Member for Southwark, who had so ably and cordially co-operated with him in the task which he had undertaken. In conclusion, he might observe that a general desire appeared to prevail on both sides of the House to give this Session, by some means, increased political power to those who lived by labour. He would then beg of the House in this, the last hour of the old system of representation, not to refuse its sanction to what he might term a parting blessing, and to show to those on whom they were about to confer the franchise, and who were desirous of improving their own position, that it could do as well for them, while still directly unrepresented within these walls, as they could do for themselves when they possessed the power with which it was proposed to invest them. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens.)

MR. SELWIN said, the House owed a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for Finsbury for the manner in which he had grappled with this important question, and for the spirit in which, not only upon the present, but on previous occasions, he had brought forward the claims of those who, whatever might be their prospects for the future, had at least in the past found too few who were willing to advocate their cause. The subject introduced by the hon. Member for Finsbury was one which not only vitally concerned the interests of the poorer classes, but of necessity materially and intimately affected every other class of society. Any one who had visited the dwellings of the labouring classes in the metropolis, or who had read the reports of the medical authorities, must be aware of the fearful overcrowding, bad drainage, imperfect ventilation, and lack of convenience which characterized them, and rendered them almost uninhabitable. Such a state of things stood in great need of a remedy. It was their duty to do all in their power to prevent diseases arising from bad air and polluted water. The reports of the officers of health showed that what might be called the inevitable deaths were eleven in every 1,000 of the population; but the average mortality was as high as twenty-two in the 1,000. The preventible deaths, therefore, were as high as eleven in the 1,000. A Report by Mr. Graham Smith and Dr. Lyon Playfair was published some time ago, in which it was stated that 113 preventible deaths in the 1,000 had occurred in the town of Lancaster, and that these deaths represented a loss of labour to the extent of £16,000. Taking that calculation as a basis, it would easily be seen that as the preventible deaths over the whole country amounted to 220,000 there was thus a total loss of labour to the almost fabulous extent of £32,000,000, the amount in London alone being something approaching to £4,000,000. The evil was a crying one, and demanded instant remedy. He was aware that vast sums were annually expended by charitable individuals for the relief of the poor in the metropolis; but however laudable these efforts were, they only dealt with the evil by mitigating it as much as possible after the mischief was done. What was wanted was a sweeping reform to avert the evil altogether, and this could only be done by an extensive legislative measure. Every day new sites were devoted to public improvements, and the inhabitants of the houses which remained were consequently more densely packed than ever. It might be urged that in advocating special legislative enactments to meet this case, he was overlooking and ignoring the efforts made by private persons, such as Miss Burdett Coutts, Alderman Waterlow, and our great American benefactor; but such was not the case. He accorded to these philanthropic people all the praise which they so well merited; but he could only regard them as pioneers in this great work. To make their labours properly effectual they would require to be invested with compulsory powers for the purchase of sites. There was a class of landlords who traded profitably upon the miserable overcrowding of their bad dwellings, and they would only sell their tenements to charitable persons who desired to erect improved houses at prices far above their value, so that the expense entailed upon the benevolent considerably limited their action, by preventing them doing as much as they desired. As long, therefore, as compulsory powers of purchase were wanting, the good accomplished could never be sufficient to meet the necessities of the case. The Reports of building societies and of model lodging-houses clearly indicated the incalculable advantages which improved house accommodation had conferred upon the working classes, by improving both their moral and physical condition, and largely reducing the rate of mortality among them. The societies were paying an average dividend of 5 per cent, and were immensely improving the localities where they were conducting their operations. The model lodging-houses afforded accommodation to 10,000 persons, among whom the death-rate was only seventeen in 1,000. When, therefore, they remembered, as he had stated, that the average of general mortality was twenty-two in 1,000, and that these model lodging-houses were built in some of the worst localities of London, where the death-rate was sometimes as high as thirty-five, they would acknowledge how vast were the benefits to be derived from good dwellings. The only thing to be regretted was that the sphere of the operations of these model lodging-houses was so limited. It must, however, be borne in mind that the poorer classes of the metropolis amounted to very nearly 500,000 persons, of whom about 250,000 might be set down as living in houses which urgently demanded improvement.

The hon. Member for Finsbury proposed to deal with the evil by applying to Government for a loan of £1,000,000, and he calculated that by means of that sum he would be enabled to provide dwellings for about 85,000 persons. The only fault he (Mr. Selwin) had to find with the proposal was that it was not large enough. Even if the proposal of the hon. Member for Finsbury were fully carried out, there would still remain over 200,000 poor people for whom no adequate provision of that kind would be made. There must therefore, in his opinion, be some more elastic system resorted to of meeting the difficulty. Why should not the Government adopt, to some extent, a principle similar to that which was acted upon in the case of India, where a percentage was guaranteed on the capital invested in railways? He would suggest, therefore, to the hon. Member for Finsbury, to ask for a minimum guarantee of 4 per cent, by which means a large amount of capital might be attracted to the investment he had in view. Such a guarantee might very well be given with a very small amount of risk; because experience showed that a return of 5 per cent was, in those cases, almost certain, and, if a power of compulsory purchase were added, there was every probability that that rate of interest would be increased. The advantage to the public of such a guarantee as he proposed was, that it would attract the sound capital which the commercial crisis of last year had frightened away from commercial speculations; and it was requisite that it should be attracted for this purpose, for he believed that the sum that would be needed would amount to something more like £7,000,000 than £1,000,000, if the wants of the whole population were to be met. He was of opinion that at that moment when the House was talking of reforming itself they should strive to accomplish this great social reform which was so intimately bound up with the interests of so large a proportion of their countrymen. Should the Bill be received with favour by the House he would make a suggestion in Committee that Government should give a minimum guarantee of 4 per cent, and that the amount of money to be borrowed should be largely increased.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he thought it was not so much of the premises themselves, as of the mode in which those premises were occupied that there was reason to complain, and he suggested that some amended definition of the words "contagion" and "infection" should be introduced into the Bill.

MR. GREENE said, he was convinced that if some legislation of the kind proposed by the Bill were not proceeded with, this important subject would remain merely a question for declamation at the hustings. He, however, desired to point out to the House that, although the evil of overcrowding was not so great in the agricultural districts as in the metropolis, yet in many districts there was a lamentable lack of house accommodation for the labourers. He had recently gone to reside in the neighbourhood of a village which contained 1,000 inhabitants, and he found that the number of cottages with three rooms each did not bear the proportion of 15 per cent of the whole. The percentage of cottages with two rooms was also very small, and persons of both sexes were consequently obliged to sleep in the same room. The result, in his opinion, of the overcrowded state of the dwellings in the various towns was the production of a greater amount of demoralization than arose from all other causes put together; while it tended also to bring about physical deterioration in a great degree. If better dwellings were provided for the working men, they would the better be able to labour, and for those reasons, not to enter more into detail, he hoped the efforts of the hon. Member for Finsbury would be successful.

MR. AYRTON said, that an hon. Member opposite, who had taken part in the debate, had made some observations conveying an erroneous impression of the objects of this Bill. He regretted that the hon. Member had made so many observations about the metropolis, and so few about the agricultural districts. The fact was that if the number of inhabitants in the metropolis were taken into account it would be found that it contained a smaller proportion of houses of the character referred to in the Bill than were to be found elsewhere throughout the country. In many of the rural districts a worse state of thing in that respect prevailed; but there were undoubtedly within the limits of the metropolis some places which called for the attention of the House, and which must be made the objects of legislation. One merit of the Bill under discussion was, that it did not attempt to go beyond, with perhaps one exception, that which was reasonable and practicable. It was essentially founded on the provision set forth in the 6th clause, which at once showed the distinction by which the whole of its provisions were pervaded. The subject referred to in that clause was disposed of by the Bill of last Session; and the present Bill, therefore, was not what it originally had been. It did not deal with the question of overcrowding, but with property which, owing to altered circumstances, was no longer in a fit condition for human habitation. There was a clause in the Bill—Clause 7—which would undoubtedly require careful consideration in Committee. That clause provided that on the representation of four householders that contagious disease existed in any premises, or that such premises were in a state likely to engender disease, the premises might be condemned. Now, if a house were likely to engender disease, it would be right to condemn it; but it did not follow that a house, because disease existed in it, should be condemned. In his view of the matter, the operation of the Bill was intended to be limited to property the structure and surroundings of which were likely to engender disease; and looking at the measure in that aspect, he did not think it was calculated to excite those alarming ideas which the hon. Member introduced into the discussion. It was quite clear that it was not intended to interfere with the habitations of 250,000 people, or with the erection of new dwellings for them. He was in the habit of walking daily into the back courts and alleys of the metropolis, and he believed that there were very few houses in themselves or in their surroundings unfit for human habitation, provided the number of people living in them was not too great. There were one or two provisions in the Bill which had created some alarm. It was said that if, under the Bill, any premises were declared unfit for human habitation on account of dilapidations or otherwise, the owner would take no further trouble about them, in the hope of forcing the parochial authorities to purchase them, and of getting a jury to award large compensation. Thus the measure, it was said, would enable a man to make his own default of duty the means of extorting money from the public. He trusted that in Committee on the Bill care would be taken that no such abuse should arise. He suggested that the compensation, instead of being assessed under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, should be so regulated that the value paid should be only the fair market value at the time, and that no compensation should be given on account of compulsory purchase. There was another point he wished to refer to. He did not think the pretensions of the City of London to exemption from the operation of this Bill could for a moment be entertained. The hon. Member for Finsbury, pressed, no doubt, by the influence of the corporation of London and by the power they seemed to exercise of obstructing useful measures if they did not like them, had been compelled to give way to that pressure; but could anything be more preposterous than that, in a measure for improving the general dwellings of the poor, the most wealthy portion of the metropolis should be withdrawn from the area over which the rate to be levied by this Bill was to be raised? It would be the duty of the House to treat this pretension of the City of London with the indignation it deserved. He believed that the measure, after the removal of certain small errors in it, would tend to get rid of serious evils in the metropolis and other places, and that it would be in no way inconsistent with the improvement of property.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, that he could bear testimony to the necessity which existed for the enactment of some such a measure as this; and he desired to urge upon the House the claims of 100,000 of his Irish fellow-countrymen to better house accommodation than they now had in the metropolis. In many cases a father, mother, and five children all lived and slept in one room, and it was marvellous that more contagious disease did not, under the circumstances, prevail. A good labourer might obtain employment, but the great drawback he felt arose from the miserable dwelling in which he was obliged to live. The measure was one in the right direction, and he trusted it would be carried into law.

MR. E. POTTER admitted that some measures should be taken to improve the dwellings of the working classes, and he would go to any length in the adoption of sanitary regulations; but he was fearful the present Bill proceeded too far. He thought that overcrowding was the cause of all the evil, and he was prepared to assent to any measure which would remedy that mischief; but he objected to the power proposed to be given by the Bill local authorities to compete with private persons in building houses. The evil of overcrowding could be dealt with without the adoption of any such a measure as that. He would suggest to the House to consider whether it was not desirable promptly to enact some measure prohibiting more than a certain number of persons residing upon a square acre. Corporations might clear spaces, and sell them as sites for suitable houses, but he did not think that they ought, unless when absolutely necessary, to build houses; and if they were forced to erect them, they ought to sell them as soon as possible. Even in the latter case there would be this objection, that such houses would come into private builders' hands. He did not think that this Bill would meet the evil of overcrowding, but he should not oppose its second reading, and should probably in Committee not oppose any clause except that which allowed corporations to become speculative builders of houses.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the importance of the Bill could not be overrated. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had truly stated that the Bill had nothing to do with the question of overcrowding, but only dealt with those dwellings which, from their structure or other circumstances, were not fit for human beings to live in. He did not believe that hon. Members who had not the opportunity of serving upon the Select Committee of last year on this subject could have any idea what a difficult matter it was to deal with. The Bill brought in by the hon. Member last year was first submitted to that Committee, and after some discussion two or three fresh drafts of Bills were brought under consideration, but each succeeding draft seemed to throw less light on the subject. At length the Committee heard that an Act relating to this matter was working well in Liverpool. The Committee obtained a copy of that Act, and the present Bill was pretty nearly identical in all its main provisions with it. He believed that the Bill with the limited operation, which it was now intended to give it, would work satisfactorily in this great metropolis. Whether or no the clauses about compensation should be more guardedly worded, was a question to be considered in the Committee on the Bill. He was quite certain, when he knew that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had looked into the Bill, that the City of London would not escape criticism. He freely gave his assent to this Bill, because if buildings were unfit for human beings to dwell in, it would be a great advantage to pull them down, and, as they could not be pulled down without somebody paying for them, he thought that the payment of a moderate rate, spread over the whole surface of this great city, was not too great a sacrifice to make for such a purpose. It might be a question, whether the provisions as to the re-building of houses by the local authorities on the sites of those pulled down should be persisted in. That portion of the Bill was not in the Liverpool Act. Of course, if houses were cleared away, and no others were built to supply their place, the evil now complained of would be increased, because people would then be driven to inhabit improper dwellings. It would therefore be necessary to make some provision for the erection of houses in the place of those that might be pulled down. At the same time, he should be sorry to give his assent to any principle so wide and dangerous as that the public was, under all circumstances, bound to provide dwellings for the labouring classes. If the public was once brought into the matter you would stop the private enterprize which was now to a certain extent at least meeting the difficulty. But, as far as he understood the Bill, he thought that it did not go too far, and that the principle was safe. He should therefore give the measure his hearty support.

MR. BRUCE said, he had listened with great gratification to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire. The Bill undoubtedly involved a slight invasion of the rights of property as hitherto understood; but it was an invasion sanctioned by common sense and approved of by the right hon. Gentleman, whom no one would accuse of being indifferent to the rights of property. This was not a Bill to enable local authorities to build cottages wherever they were wanted; but was simply a measure empowering them to pull down houses which were unfit for habitation, and then, after allowing due time, if the owner neglected to do what was necessary, to construct new habitations in the place of the old. It had been argued that the Bill did not deal with the evil of overcrowding. To a certain extent, however, it would; because no doubt the new houses which replaced the condemned buildings would be more spacious and better adapted to the wants of the working classes than the old ones. Undoubtedly the legislation of last year was very severe; but the House showed its reliance upon the humanity and discretion of the local authorities, and its confidence had been justified by the result. That which had occurred in Glasgow and Liverpool would occur in other places. In Glasgow it was found that no sanitary regulations, no vigilance on the part of the authorities, could expel typhus from many overcrowded parts of the city. The corporation found it absolutely necessary to make wider streets; but they could not effect that object without depriving a large portion of the population of their residences. They came to Parliament and obtained power to raise in the course of a year no less than £1,250,000, to be expended in the removal of old and the erection of new dwellings. Liverpool had done the same thing. Money had been laid out in the purchase of spaces, and he believed that a small sum would be applied to the building of houses. It was competent for any town in which private enterprise did not supply the wants of the population to come to Parliament and ask for powers as great or greater than those which these two places had obtained, and the House would deal with each case according to its own merits. Such powers would in many cases be a very useful supplement to private enterprise; but he confessed that he should in all places prefer to rely upon private enterprise in the first instance. He was glad to see that this Bill contained provisions which were not in the original measure, enabling local authorities not only to pull down houses and to build others in their place, but also to pull down houses and employ the space upon which they had stood for the purposes of general ventilation. That was, in his opinion, a most valuable and a most necessary power; because in the case of a town already overcrowded, to build up new houses on the sites of the old houses pulled down would only be continuing the existing evil. The enormous mortality which existed in many of our towns, was due not to the neglect of any sanitary precautions, but to radical defects in the structure and arrangement of the buildings. Look at Liverpool. The deaths in that town last year amounted to forty-one in 1,000, which meant that one in every twenty-five of the population died. The deaths were 2 per cent in excess of the births. If Liverpool was in a proper state there was no reason why one half of these deaths should not be prevented; and let the House consider what an immense amount of human suffering would be saved if such a reduction could be effected. There was no reason to fear that the powers which would be conferred upon the local authorities by this Bill would be abused. Those bodies were in most cases the representatives of, and elected by, the ratepayers; and as the expenditure to be incurred under this Bill was not likely to be remunerative, it was fair to suppose that it would not be incurred unnecessarily. Under the most favourable circumstances, private societies which had invested capital in the erection of dwellings for the labouring classes only obtained a return of about 5 per cent. In this instance the property was to be taken compulsorily; and as public bodies were always dealt with rather hardly by juries, the purchase money was likely to be excessive. It might, indeed, be necessary to insert in the Bill some provisions to prevent as far as possible the awarding of excessive compensation. The most valuable principle contained in the Bill was that the rights of property were not to be exercised to the detriment of human health and human life. He was happy to say that the sanitary legislation of last year was, as he had heard from various quarters, working well wherever it had been put in force. The provisions against overcrowding had already produced great improvements in some of the most crowded districts; but great inconvenience was still occasioned by the want of proper dwellings in sufficient quantities. This Bill took a step towards removing that evil, and he looked to a great public effect being produced by the eloquent and powerful speech in which the second reading of the Bill had been moved by his hon. Friend. After all, it was not so much by legislation as by convincing the public generally of this want of improved habitations, which existed alike in town and country, that they must look for real improvement; and that was likely to be greatly promoted by appeals so eloquent and so well grounded as that which the hon. and learned Member had addressed to the House.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, that judging from the speeches made that morning, nine-tenths of the mischief referred to was mischief which the Bill did not touch at all. Notwithstanding the speech of the hon. Member who represented that £7,000,000 would be required to correct the evil which this Bill was intended to remedy, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets contended that when they came to contrast the metropolis with the rural districts it was not open to the reproach which had been implied; and if the houses in the metropolis were examined, the number of houses to which this Bill would apply would be very few. He contended that there was a two-fold reason against the Bill, first because it did not address itself to overcrowding, which was the great cause of the evil in question; and secondly, because the real object to which it did address itself was one of very limited extent. The evil complained of was caused by very special circumstances, caused partly by the introduction of railways into the metropolis, north, south, east and west, and partly by the promotion of great public improvements. If the evil complained of were the result of special, temporary, and local causes, that was a reason why the House should hesitate to take an entirely novel step in legislation. But, further, the list was already in course of being rectified by the legitimate and wholesome operation of private philanthropic enterprise acting on sound commercial principles. More was being effected in large towns to remedy this class of evils than had been done in fifty years before. They would stop the good that was being done by attempting to do it in a way which he thought experience had shown to be highly objectionable. To give local authorities the command of funds for the purpose of effecting such supposed public improvements as were contemplated under the Bill would be highly objectionable. The true remedy would be to give every local authority power to abate nuisances, and when the owner of house property kept it in a state to create or propagate disease he should be treated as a misdemeanant. He earnestly hoped that this measure, if it went into Committee, would be seriously altered, otherwise he should be inclined to give it his opposition.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, the real question before them was whether the object sought by this Bill—namely, better dwellings for the poor, would be accomplished by its provisions. In his opinion it would not. No one could doubt that the local authority in every town ought to have power, for the public benefit, to restrain the owners of houses, unfit for human habitation, from spreading disease in its neighbourhood. But this was all the power it ought to have, and, as he should endeavour to show, was all that was required to meet the evils complained of. This Bill, however, provides a most cumbrous and expensive process. Every local authority is to appoint an officer of health. The officer of health shall report any premises in a state unfit for human habitation to the clerk of the local authorities, and to the clerk of the peace. The clerk of the peace shall lay the report before the grand jury. If the grand jury make a presentment the local authority shall cause a survey to be made. Notice shall be given to owners of property. If owners will not execute sanitary works the local authority shall do them. For this purpose two surveyors shall value the premises. If owners will not accept the valuation, then the premises to be assessed by a jury under Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Compensation is to be paid to the tenants for quitting dwellings pronounced unfit for human habitation. The houses are then to be taken down and re-built by the local authority, who are to be entitled to loans from the Public Works Commissioners for this purpose; but the local authorities must sell such houses within seven years, or they will be forfeited to the Crown. This Bill would introduce a system involving new and expensive establishments in every locality, and open the door to extensive jobbery and fraud, while it would fail in creating increased and better dwellings for the poor. It appeared to him that the objects sought could be attained without infringing the principles of political economy. It was no part of the business or duty of a local authority to buy land to build houses. What was wanted was more houses; but how could it be expected that anybody would enter into competition with the local authorities who sought no profit on building them, and whom, we are told, are only to get a return of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on the money laid out? Capitalists, instead of building houses would wait to buy, from time to time, at half price those built by the local authorities, which they will be obliged to sell within seven years. The true remedy to provide healthy dwellings for the poor was to give power to local authorities, when proper ventilation is wanted in streets, alleys and courts, to purchase land for the purpose of opening them out. To prevent the future building of houses, except upon proper principles of drainage and ventilation. They should also have the power instead of buying dwellings unfit for human habitation, to shut them up, and thus force the owners either to render them habitable or to sell them. Thus the objects sought would be attained without violating any economic principle. Unless the Bill could be altered in Committee, so as to get rid of the objections which had been pointed out, he should vote against it.

MR. LOCKE was satisfied that if his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Thomas Chambers) had represented any other part of the metropolis than Marylebone, his feeling would have been to support this Bill. He was, no doubt, right in saying that there were other things besides good dwellings which the working classes required, and that amongst them was good food. But the House had legislated already in reference to food; though in consequence of the strong dislike to rates, the Adulteration of Food Act had not been carried out. The parishes would not go to the expense of having a laboratory and a proper person to test the quality of articles of food. The hon. Member for Marylebone seemed to have shut his ears to the observations which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, and by other hon. Members who had addressed the House during the debate; and when the hon. Gentleman spoke of the overcrowding of houses, he seemed to have forgotten that a Bill for the purpose of remedying that evil had been brought forward last Session. This Bill had nothing to do with overcrowding, from which he said that nine-tenths of the evils complained of arose. Overcrowding was met by the Health Bill of last Session, which he was glad to learn from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bruce) was acting so beneficially in Glasgow and other large towns, many of the provisions of which were opposed by the hon. Member. The Public Health Act, however, gave no power to remove dwellings in which people could not live without incurring the danger of fever, though it gave power to close houses if they were overcrowded. That was a great benefit; but it did not altogether meet the case. The present Bill, consequently, did not propose to deal with houses that required to be closed for a time for renovation, but with houses that were condemned as unfit for human habitation. It proposed simply the abatement of a nuisance upon a large scale, and with higher powers than were possessed under the ordinary law; and it provided that, in addition to the houses which were a nuisance being removed, other houses should be raised in which people could dwell with comfort to themselves and with benefit to the community. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down raised an objection to the Bill upon the score of political economy; but it seemed to him (Mr. Locke) that political economy was a thing which was more abused than anything else. If you wanted to be disagreeable, political economy would fit you for it; and if you wanted to be uncharitable, you had only to say that it was contrary to the principles of political economy to give away your money without receiving an equivalent. He did not say that his hon. and learned Friend wanted to be disagreeable; but he began by opposing the Bill on the ground of political economy, with an energy that would probably lead to his object being defeated. Then he said that he was afraid of the expense; and, indeed, a rate was one of the most painful things known of in Marylebone. But in this city we must have rates, seeing that we had not, as they had in Paris, an octroi duty; and the collection of such a duty in London would certainly be inconvenient, for you could not go down to the Crystal Palace and back without having your pockets searched to see if you had brought back a roast fowl with you. The truth was that rates were at the bottom of the parochial mind; but it was of no earthly use for any hon. Member to contend that the persons who dwelt in these houses would not be benefited by the proposed rate. There was no doubt the measure would be expensive; but he thought that matters of political economy had better come on when they were in Committee, so that they might see whether they could not find some better mode of awarding compensation for property taken. He was no admirer of the Lands Clauses Act, and compensation was to be awarded under the powers of that Act; and it was a very important question whether there could not be found some better mode of awarding compensation, and at the same time of preventing frauds from being perpetrated upon the local authorities. This, however, was matter of detail. The great object of the Bill was to remove those dreadful blots that existed upon the face of our towns—the fever nests, in which infectious and contagious diseases were bred. When the question was as to removing these places, he did not think that they ought to be influenced by the consideration of the cost of the removal. This was a thing which sooner or later must be done, whatever the pecuniary cost might be. It was all very well to propose to take the labourers by railway from their work in the metropolis to dwellings in the country; but the labourers were not desirous of leaving the localities in which their work was performed; and it would be far better to afford them proper accommodation in the neighbourhoods where they now resided than to transport them, like so many oxen, to some place outside the metropolis when they had done their work, in order that they might be brought back again to resume their occupations on the following morning. Working men, like other people, wished to enjoy themselves when their work was done, and they should be enabled to live near to their work as well as their recreation. He hoped that the Bill would be read a second time without a division, and that they might go into Committee with the desire to improve the Bill, and not to evade the operation of the provisions in it.

MR. GRAVES said, he was glad to have it in his power to give some interesting information to the House as to the operation of an Act on which this Bill had been mainly modelled. About three years since, Parliament had passed a local Bill, having for its object the sanitary improvement of the town he had the honour to represent. That measure gave the local authority power to deal with ill-ventilated and ill-constructed courts in the town of Liverpool. The promoters of that Bill knew well they were dealing with a new principle, and did not venture to go beyond the simple act of demolition; but from the operation of the Act he was justified in saying that the House would do well to pass the present Bill, which proposed to complete the work in the metropolis which, in the case of Liverpool, had been only half done. During the time the measure had been in operation in Liverpool there had been only three presentments, embracing 900 houses. There had been no difficulty in settling with the owners of property, for they and the local authorities had mutually arrived at agreements as to the sums to be paid. Nor had there been an appeal in any case from the decisions arrived at. It might therefore fairly be presumed that no danger need be apprehended from this Bill. The machinery of the Bill did not in any way interfere with the rights of property. Over £100,000 had been already expended under the operation of the Act in Liverpool, and a further sum of the same amount was now being applied for in order still further to carry out its operations. He thought rating in such a case might be regarded as simply an insurance duty, or as a premium paid in order to improve the sanitary condition of the town, in which every inhabitant, whether high or low, had the deepest interest. Such a measure as this had become a political necessity. It was as much the duty of local authorities to prevent disease as it was to cure disease, and this prevention was the principle of the Bill. The necessity, therefore, was shown for this measure; but he hoped that in many of its details the measure would be improved in Committee. The hon. Member for Marylebone had thrown out the suggestion that private philanthropy might effect the purpose of the Bill; but private philanthropy could not deal with private property in the manner in which the Bill proposed to deal with it. Private philanthropy could not deal with a strong hand with ill-lighted and ill-ventilated courts; it could build up, but it could not demolish. The corporation of Liverpool had lately voted £20,000 for land to be appropriated to the erection of labourers' dwellings; but not a single builder could be induced, even on the most advantageous terms, to build the houses on his own responsibility, and the corporation had now decided to erect the dwellings on their own account. He believed, however, that in time, when it was shown that it was possible to build up such houses as this Bill comprehended, and to make them remunerative, the whole question might be safely left to private enterprise. After duly considering the whole circumstances of the case, he had come to the determination to give his most hearty support to the Bill.

COLONEL SYKES said, he entirely concurred in the object of the Bill, which he believed was calculated to promote the health of the working classes. Care must, however, be taken that that object was not defeated by the overcrowding of the new buildings it was proposed to erect in the place of those which were to be demolished. The miserable condition of the inhabitants of the present dwellings was not caused so much by the inherent defects of those buildings as by the fearful extent to which they were overcrowded. There was great need for such a measure, for he recollected one occasion when he himself had seen, when inspecting lodging-houses, as Chairman of the Committee to inquire into the condition of the poor, no less than twenty-two persons inhabiting one room in which a corpse was lying.

MR. POWELL said, that when a Bill similar to the present was introduced into the House last Session it was divided into three branches—the first of which related to sanitary arrangements; the second to the destruction of old and condemned houses; and the third to the construction of new buildings. The provisions respecting the first branch were framed according to those of the Sanitary Act of 1865; but that Act was said to be unworkable. Now, he was a member of the Select Committee to which that measure was referred, and if there were any defects in its provisions he, as well as the other hon. Members of that Committee, would be ready to concur in any measure that would remove every blemish and obliterate every complaint. It was the intention of the present Bill to create a machinery for an extensive system of re-building by the municipal authorities. He, however, thought that the handle by which the authorities were to get hold of those buildings was far too meagre and too weak to accomplish the objects in view. This Bill, as now framed, could only operate where there were houses infected with contagious diseases. Now, the term “contagious disease” was an ambiguous expression, and he would suggest the introduction of the word “dangerous” before “contagious.” He confessed he regarded with great jealousy any interference with private property, and he hoped that such checks and safeguards would be provided as would remove any apprehension on that score. Remarks had been made in the Report of the Public Officer of Health in 1865 which were full of instruction. When it was proposed to extend the Liverpool Act to other districts objections had been taken that a measure which was enacted to improve the sanitary state of towns like Liverpool, in which the death-rate was extremely high, was inapplicable to other towns in which no such evil existed. Dr. Hunter remarks with wisdom—

“When the extension of the principle of the Liverpool Act to other large cities is thought of, it is impossible to avoid a degree of apprehension that officers able to carry it out are not easily found. The officer might be made the instrument in the hands of shrewd speculators.”

Colonel Sykes

In Bills of this character great precautions were necessary to prevent owners of house property wantonly allowing their property to fall into decay and ruin, speculating upon the probability of their being purchased by the corporation of the town, with a view to their re-construction on approved sanitary principles. That was a great and serious danger. In this respect the Bill might create more mischief than its machinery could cure. He did not think that the power of private enterprize with regard to this question had been sufficiently appreciated. It had been proved that the best way of supplying the people with sufficient and wholesome food was to allow to trade its free and unimpeded course. The same argument might be applied to this subject of healthful habitations for the working classes. But if public capital were brought into competition with private capital he believed that the latter would retire altogether; and they would only be increasing the mischief which they were endeavouring to cure. What was the case of Bradford, which was referred to last Session? In the houses of that town there had been great overcrowding—an evil which had arisen in a great degree from the action of the corporation in placing restrictions upon the obtaining of sites for building purposes. An improved state of things having since taken place, a considerable number of dwellings had been built by large owners of property and employers of labour. A friend of his own was at present building no less than 300 houses for workmen, and several other gentlemen were following his example. Notwithstanding his confidence in private enterprize, he wished success to the present measure, after the introduction of needful amendments. He, however, suggested an Amendment in the 7th clause, which as it stood proposed to enact that when buildings were once taken down under the powers of the Bill, no other structure should ever be raised upon the site. Now, it might so happen that in the course of a few years the district where those houses had stood had been wholly re-modelled, and it might be necessary, in order to complete the public improvements in contemplation, to rebuild houses upon the vacant spot for the benefit of the workmen themselves. Surely in such a case no such clause should be allowed to operate. He hoped, however, that in Committee this and kindred blemishes would be removed from the Bill.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES said, he had hoped that it would not have been necessary for him to trouble the House on that occasion; but as he was informed that the opinion of the House upon the Bill was to be ascertained by means of a division, he felt that he could not give a silent vote upon the question under discussion. The object of the Bill was twofold. It was framed, in the first place, to authorize the pulling down of habitations which were confessedly unfit for human occupation; and, in the second place, to enable the municipal authorities to erect upon or near the sites occupied by such houses suitable dwellings for the accommodation of the poor. It was upon the latter provision that it was intended to take the opinion of the House. It was suggested that the Bill should be allowed to be read a second time, and that that portion of it authorizing the construction of new buildings should be struck out in Committee. But he thought that this portion was a most important part of the Bill, seeing that if the existing buildings were demolished their inhabitants would have to squeeze themselves into the remaining houses of the same class, and that thereby the evils of overcrowding would be greatly exaggerated. The hon. Member for Marylebone desired that it should be left to private enterprize to build the dwellings required to replace those demolished under the provisions of this Bill; but it would be many years before private enterprize would build a sufficient number of houses to meet the daily increasing demands for labourers' dwellings; and in the meanwhile the ejected inhabitants would lose all sense of decency and morality, in consequence of being forced to seek refuge in houses which were already overcrowded. Otherwise, they were driven into the villages in the neighbourhood of London to the destruction of their business connection and their morals as well; for the places to which he referred were little better than brickfields filled with a wild and lawless set, whose characteristic was an absence of the civilization supposed to belong to England. They would neither have a church to go to, nor the influence of the higher classes around them; but they would grow up indiscriminately and become blots on our civilization, and a great curse to the metropolis. Therefore, he felt it absolutely necessary that when the houses of the poor were destroyed others should be built in place of them.

The Bill did not propose to give the municipal authorities power to rebuild until the owner of the destroyed property had declined to do so; and he thought that no hardship towards a proprietor who refused to do his duty. In view of the noble example of the Marquess of Westminster, and the improved state of public feeling with regard to this matter, he assured the House that in passing this Bill it would only be keeping pace with the spirit of the times, and responding to the most emphatic call made by the present state of the metropolis.

MR. HUBBARD said, that if the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down considered this to be a matter to which the rules of political economy ought not to be applied, he dissented from that opinion. Political economy in its true sense, and properly understood, could not discourage any object from being carried out concerning the welfare of the people. In this particular instance no view of political economy ought to arrest the convictions of hon. Members from going entirely with the principles of this measure. The measure was divided into two parts. The first twenty-six sections of the Bill had reference to sanitary objects, and their object was directed to the demolition of houses unfit for habitation. To that portion of the Bill there could be no possible objection; but the sections which followed were of a more questionable character, inasmuch as they interfered somewhat arbitrarily with the rights of property; but the defects of the Bill in this respect could, he thought, be easily remedied in Committee. It should not be forgotten, with regard to the question of re-building, that some houses which should most certainly come down were built upon sites unfit for any dwelling whatever, such for instance as houses standing on the brink of stagnant water, and it would be unwise to insist that the new houses should be built on precisely the same site as was formerly occupied by the houses displaced, for not even if they were to be built of marble, would it be possible to render them wholesome and fit for habitation in insalubrious sites. With regard to the borrowing provisions of the Bill, he thought it would be best if the promoters conferred with the Government with a view to see whether it was not desirable, instead of creating new borrowing powers, to avail themselves of the Act of last Session for the improvement of labourers' dwellings as a means for raising money. He found that the Bill contemplated the raising of money by seven years' mortgages. Such a mortgage would, he thought, lead to embarrassment in the future, and land the corporate bodies in much the same position as those unfortunate railways who were unable to take up their debentures or prevail upon the public to renew them. In the hope that the promoters of the Bill would be prevailed upon to trust to past legislation for all purposes connected with the raising of money, and would confer with the Government upon the subject, he would promise to vote for the second reading of the measure.

MR. BAZLEY said, he thought it would be impossible for the municipal authorities of themselves to give effect to all the provisions of the Bill. Two things were needed to bring about a reform in labourers' dwellings. In the first place, labourers must be induced to appreciate good dwellings and to pay the rent; and in the second place, capitalists should be willing to erect such dwellings. Without these two conditions existed the labouring classes would not find themselves adequately provided for; because it was impossible, in his opinion, for private benevolence and corporations fully to minister to the wants of the poor in the matter of dwellings. At Manchester a sum of £100,000 had been accumulated for improved dwellings by a single club; but that was a paltry sum for the purpose, as some millions of pounds would be required for the erection of healthy and commodious dwellings. Corporate authority had certain duties to perform; but he denied that it was the duty of corporate bodies to become dealers in land and buyers and sellers of houses. He desired especially to call attention to one clause in the Bill which provided that in case the owner of condemned property objected to its removal the local authorities were to remove it, and pay compensation to the owner for the loss and damage sustained by such removal. That, he thought, was nothing less than offering a premium to negligent proprietors; many, who would otherwise attend to their property, would, in the hope of getting a high price from the local authorities, proceed to neglect it. With regard to the question of nuisances, he felt that a much more rigid inspection was required than existed at present; he thought even Imperial inspection was necessary to correct the evils that had been spoken of during the debate. He was anxious to see the working classes occupying good houses; but, on the other hand, he did not wish to see the ratepayers oppressed. Altogether he felt the Bill was at fault, inasmuch as it did not go sufficiently on the principle of self-help, the mainspring of all healthy action in the kingdom; still, he hoped the Bill would be committed, and when in Committee, he trusted that his hon. Friend who introduced the measure would consent to certain desirable improvements in its provisions.

MR. WALPOLE said, he wished to say a few words upon the Bill before the discussion closed. That something was needed to stop the frightful consequences of overcrowding no one for a moment could doubt; and he felt that it was imperatively necessary that powers should be given to some local authority with a view to get rid of those dwellings which permitted overcrowding, and led to the spread of disease. It was equally undesirable that new houses should be built to replace the old, so that the poor might not be unnecessarily inconvenienced; but it would be worth while considering in Committee whether provision should be made not merely to erect new and better houses on the sites of old ones, but also to secure new sites for labourers' dwellings. However, in pursuing that object, care should be taken not to go too fast, and they ought to be very watchful, as had been pointed out by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, that they did not by one of the clauses of the Bill put into the pockets of those landlords who had neglected their duty anything more than the market value of the property which was taken from them. The clauses in the Bill relating to loans to be granted, as to the security to be taken, would require re-consideration; and he thought it would be better if the hon. Member who had charge of the Bill would communicate with the Treasury upon that point before going into Committee. In conclusion, he thanked the hon. Member for having introduced what he thought would prove to be a very good Bill.

MR. M'LAREN said, that as one of the Committee to whom this Bill was referred, he cordially approved of its leading provisions. He thought a misapprehension had taken place on the part of the hon. Member for Buckingham about the objection to the paying off the debentures at the end of seven years. If Members would look at the structure of the Bill, they would see that the local authority were obliged to sell whatever houses they might erect on the sites acquired within seven years. The Committee were anxious to have made the period a shorter one; but if they had fixed the number of years at three or five, parties intending to purchase might have waited until the end of the term, in the hope of making a good bargain. The Committee therefore fixed the period by which all the houses to be erected must be sold within seven years, a period which secured that the property would be in good condition, and that no very extensive repairs would be required. If the property was sold within the seven years it necessarily followed that the mortgages must be paid off within that period. All the Treasury was asked to do was to advance money to the value of the buildings, and not to the value of the site, and there was no possibility of danger as regarded the repayment. He did not at all sympathize with those who thought that corporate bodies would be going out of their province in carrying out the provisions of the Bill. There was nothing more important for the health of large towns than that the corporate bodies should deal with these centres of contagion; and unless the houses were uninhabitable they were not meddled with at all. He held that it was the duty of corporate bodies to take possession of such buildings and pull them down; but it might be better to keep open spaces on the sites of the destroyed property. When new buildings were required, they should be of such a class as would benefit the poor. It had been explained that three or four draft Bills had been drawn up. In one of those drafts a clause existed which he should have liked to have seen incorporated in this Bill, and that was that the local authorities, in place of purchasing the site, and erecting buildings thereon, might require the party to whom they belonged to put them in a proper state of repair, on pain of having the premises shut up, as being unfit for occupation; and being subject to a fine for every day this rule was violated. That was an alternative provision which he thought might still be introduced with advantage.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that the Bill proposed a metropolitan rate of 3*d.* in the pound, and called the attention of the House to the fact that, although many of the people of London were exceedingly poor and kept their heads above water by means of great economy, the course of recent legislation had been to impose heavy burdens upon them. The Metropolitan Poor Bill would increase the rates, so would the Metropolitan Improvement Bill, and now this measure proposed to add another 3*d.* in the pound. Where was it proposed to put the poor who would be evicted from the dwellings that were proposed to be pulled down during the process of the removal and re-building of those houses, and how would the new buildings be managed? Was it intended that the Board of Works should have a large staff of agents for this purpose, and was it thought desirable that a powerful body like the Board of Works should be put into competition with private enterprise? He regarded the measure as one that would be exceedingly expensive, and he had no doubt, from what he knew of the tendency of juries to award large sums in compensation cases, that much more than the real value of the dwellings proposed to be taken from the present owners would have to be paid. Notwithstanding the House jealously examined the National Estimates every year, it was content to give enormous powers to the Metropolitan Board of Works for raising money, and refrain from adopting any means of auditing that Board's accounts to see that the money was not wastefully expended. He was willing to give local authorities full power to condemn any dwellings unfit for habitation, the owners of which would thus be obliged either to sell them or put them in repair; but he objected to making the Metropolitan Board of Works or other corporations great building speculators, with no risk to themselves, but with great risk to the ratepayers, many of whom, by reason of their poverty, were hardly able to keep their heads above water. Private enterprise, which was being more and more directed to the erection of artizans' dwellings, might be safely trusted to provide what was required, whereas if it were exposed to competition with public bodies it would become paralyzed.

MR. KINNAIRD said, there was no intention to compete with private enterprise, for in nine cases out of ten the owners would themselves carry out the necessary improvements, and not throw the property into the hands of the local authorities. Nor would the rates be increased, for what was proposed was in the nature of a guarantee fund, and the money expended would ultimately be recouped. It was rather calculated to lessen the rates; because the mortality which took place in these unhealthy dwellings was one cause why rates were high. He sympathized with the Members for Marylebone, who only represented the views of the particular locality with which they were connected; but the experience of Liverpool showed the fallacy of the apprehensions which had been expressed, and the suggestions which had been offered could be duly considered in Committee.

MR. DAVENPORT BROMLEY said, it was quite time that some interference of the House should take place with regard to the long-continued and uncompensated destruction of labourers' dwellings. If a railway through Grosvenor Square were projected, many hon. Members would assuredly come down in order to upset the scheme; but during several years past Bills had been passed without a single remonstrance sanctioning the demolition of the dwellings of tens of thousands of the poorer classes. He was not prepared to express entire approval of the Bill, but he should certainly vote for the second reading.

CRIMINAL LAW BILL.

(Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Coleridge.)

[BILL 8.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 5 (If Witnesses for Accused, bound by Recognizance, appear at the Trial, Court may allow Expenses).

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY moved an addition to the clause, providing that "such allowances and compensation shall be paid as part of the expenses of the prosecution."

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the Amendment would effect a great improvement in the Bill; but on one point it did not go quite far enough. The object of the Bill was to put the defendant or prisoner and the prosecutor upon equal terms. The prosecutor might now bring witnesses upon the trial who had not been before the committing magistrate, and if the defendant satisfied the court that the witnesses whom he likewise brought up on the trial could not have been brought before the magistrate, it ought to be in the discretion of the court whether those witnesses should be allowed their expenses or not. As it was, the defendant was put in an inferior position.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, he agreed in the propriety of the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion; but being desirous of feeling his way in this matter, he was afraid of attempting more than he had already proposed. It should be recollected, moreover, that while it was the practice for a prisoner's legal adviser to be informed of any additional evidence that was intended to be offered against him, the prosecutor did not obtain corresponding information from the prisoner.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 8, inclusive, agreed to.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY proposed a new clause, giving Judges a discretionary power of allowing the expenses of the prosecutor and his witnesses in all cases of misdemeanour except those of a local or personal nature.

MR. CHILDERS asked the House to pause and give the Bill further consideration before they allowed it to pass. He specially called the attention of the House and of the Government to what they were now doing with respect to expenditure. In certain cases expenses were paid not only for the attendance of witnesses, but for counsel and attorneys engaged in the prosecution. Those cases were limited to certain charges of felony and a few cases of misdemeanour. But by this Bill not only were all the expenses of the prosecution to be paid, but also all the expenses on the part of the defence, even in cases where a person was charged before the magistrates but not committed. This was taking an enormous leap, nor would they rest there, for the next step would be to throw the costs of the attorney and counsel on the public. They were getting into a flood of expenses of the amount of which they knew nothing whatever, for no estimate had been made as to what the expense would be. All criminal cases would, in a year or two, come to this, that prosecution and defence would be a little game carried on entirely at the expense of the Consolidated Fund. The House, before sanctioning this measure, ought to have an estimate of the expenditure which it would involve, and this, he apprehended, would be considerable. In the Jamaica prosecution, for example, the whole of the costs would be saddled upon the public, although the parties were undoubtedly in a position to bear their own costs.

MR. HUNT said, that he could not on the present clause reply to the remarks of the hon. Member for Pontefract. With regard to the particular cases in which expenses were proposed to be allowed, he detailed several in which the expenses of the prosecution were paid by the public at present, and recommended his right hon. Friend to pick out those other cases which he thought ought to be included in the list and introduce them. He objected to such an allowance for all misdemeanours, and the reservation of cases of a local or personal nature was not sufficiently explicit.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, it was rather for his hon. Friend to point out the cases in which the principle proposed should not apply. It was surely better to leave the matter to the discretion of the Judges, reserving only cases of a local or personal nature, the expenses of which ought to be defrayed out of local or individual funds.

MR. BARROW said, he strongly objected to the clause, being of opinion that it would encourage trivial prosecutions, with the expense of which it would be most unjust to mulct the public. He thought, also, that misdemeanours under the Game Laws ought to be excepted, and that persons who chose to preserve game should themselves bear the costs of proceedings to which they might have recourse.

MR. HURST said, that whenever persons were bound over to prosecute, the magistrates should have power to make them pay costs. He also thought there were cases in which expenses should not be allowed, as, for instance, in proceedings under the Local Government Act.

MR. HENLEY said, they were opening the door to almost unlimited expense. He thought that to bring in all misdemeanours under this clause would be too wide.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY also proposed a clause for giving power to Justices to allow costs to witnesses for the defence.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clauses added.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Tuesday next.

SELECT COMMITTEE.

Order for nominating Select Committee on Protection from Fire, read.

MR. HUNT said, he thought this was a fitting occasion on which to call the attention of the House to the very heavy expense thrown upon the country in the payment of witnesses summoned to give evidence before Select Committees. Much of that expense was caused by the needless detention in London of witnesses whose examination occupied only a comparatively short time. The control of this matter lay very much with the Chairman of the Committee, and he hoped hon. Members in that position would exert themselves to put a stop to what had become a great abuse. If the Chairman only took the trouble beforehand to ascertain the time which the examination of each witness was likely to last, very large sums might be saved. He would state to the House a few facts disclosed by a Return for which he had moved. Last Session, during the sitting of the Committee on the Edinburgh Annuity Tax, one gentleman from Leith was paid for ten days' attendance, though he was examined on only one day: a witness from Edinburgh, who was examined on three days, was paid for ten; another from Edinburgh was paid for twelve days, but examined only on two. During the sitting of the Mines Committee last Session a gentleman from Barnsley was paid for ten days, but was only four days under examination; a gentleman from Glasgow was paid for eleven days, having been examined on two; a gentleman from Sheffield was paid for eight days, and examined on one day; a gentleman from Wigan was examined on one day, and paid for eight days. If hon. Members looked at the list of witnesses, they would see, as a general rule, that there was not the slightest attempt made to control the expenses in such cases. During the sitting of the Committee on Irish Land Tenure, in the year 1865, a gentleman received the sum of £81 12s. for his attendance before the Committee. He was examined on only two days, but he received payment for thirty-two days' attendance. He thought those were monstrous abuses. He found, too, that the periods of the year during which the attendance of the witnesses was greatest were those at which the Derby and Ascot meetings took place, and these gentlemen went about London amusing themselves at the public expense. He hoped this matter would engage the serious attention of the hon. Gentlemen appointed to serve as Chairmen of Select Committees, and that they would do what they could to keep the expenses of witnesses within ordinary compass.

CLERICAL VESTMENTS BILL.

OBSERVATION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, after presenting petitions in favour of the Bill, said: My Lords, I was not in the House the other evening when the most rev. Primate announced that the Bishops had abandoned their Bill on this subject because Her Majesty's Government contemplated the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into certain ritualistic practices. I now wish to state that, notwithstanding that announcement, and with all respect for the right rev. Bench, I shall persist in the Bill which I had the honour to lay upon your Lordships' table.

RECOVERY OF CERTAIN DEBTS (SCOTLAND) BILL—(No. 14.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for going into Committee read.

Mr. Hunt

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that since he introduced this Bill, his noble and learned Friend (Lord Colonsay), who was thoroughly acquainted with Scotch law, had taken his seat in this House, and had his attention called to the Bill. His noble Friend had made suggestions for the amendment of some of its provisions, which suggestions he (the Lord Chancellor) had adopted. He had also been in communication with the Lord Advocate on the subject of the Bill, and he had recommended other amendments, which he had also acquiesced in. Under these circumstances, he was of opinion that the best course he could pursue was to propose to their Lordships to go into Committee on the Bill pro forma, and to have it re-printed with all the Amendments.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported without Amendment; Amendments made, and Bill to be printed as amended (No. 66).

PRIVATE BILLS—BOARD OF TRADE REPORTS.—QUESTION.

LORD TAUNTON wished to know, How it happened that the Board of Trade had discontinued their Reports upon any Private Bills except Bills on tidal waters and harbours? There was a class of Bills, such as those relating to the Liverpool and Birkenhead Docks, which were quite as important as Bills on tidal waters; and he thought it would be well that the Board of Trade should continue to exercise a general superintendence in reporting upon Bills of this character. Such a change should not have been made without a special Report by the Board of Trade. With all respect to the Chairman of Committees of their Lordships' House, and the Chairman of Ways and Means of the other House of Parliament, he could not help thinking that matters of this importance should be watched over by a responsible Minister of the Crown, and not merely by officers of the two Houses. He wished to know what reasons had induced the Board of Trade to discontinue the Reports—because, though they had no doubt involved a great deal of trouble, this was not a sufficient reason for the alteration.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the Chairman of Committees in that House was communicated with before the alteration was made, and on the 15th instant the Vice President of the Board of Trade explained the reasons for it to the other House. Mr. Cave stated that the preparation of the Reports involved considerable labour and expense, that they were usually consigned to the waste paper basket, and that in future only Bills affecting tidal harbours and rivers would be reported on. The House of Commons sanctioned the alteration, and Colonel Wilson Patten privately expressed to Mr. Cave his entire concurrence in it. Of late years the Reports had been confined to noticing small matters of detail, in which the ordinary rules and practice of the Legislature were transgressed; but these underwent investigation elsewhere. The Reports on tidal harbour Bills were presented in pursuance of an Act of Parliament, and were therefore under a different category from other Bills, and would therefore be continued. The Board had reported on the Liverpool case at the instance of the noble Lord (Lord Taunton), as Chairman of the Committee, and in any special matter they would undertake to do so.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought their Lordships' consent ought to have been asked to the change; and expressed a hope that the Reports would be continued, since they contained much valuable information; and unusual proposals affecting harbours might otherwise, if unopposed in Committee, escape attention.

LORD REDESDALE said, that he entered into communication with the President of the Board of Trade about a month before the meeting of Parliament on the subject of these Reports, stating that in his opinion the Reports with regard to metropolitan railways, to the grouping of railways, and to tidal harbours, ought to be continued; but that anything more useless than the general Reports could not well be conceived.

LORD TAUNTON admitted that there might be good reasons for abandoning the Reports on Railway Bills; but he hoped that those on schemes which affected the general interests of trade would be continued.

DUBLIN UNIVERSITY PROFESSORSHIPS BILL—(No. 48.)—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that its principal object was to repeal a clause in an Act passed by the Irish Parliament before the Union, which required that the professors of anatomy and surgery, chemistry and botany in the University of Dublin should be of the Protestant religion. It had been found inconvenient to limit the choice of that University with regard to these Professorships to persons of the Protestant religion, and he was sure there would be a general concurrence of opinion on the part of their Lordships that the Protestant character of Trinity College would not be endangered by the appointment of Roman Catholic teachers of scientific subjects; and there would probably be no objection on the part of their Lordships to the Bill, which had already received the sanction of the House of Commons. The rest of the Bill was concerned with certain arrangements between the College of Physicians in Dublin and Trinity College, and certain obsolete regulations with respect to the well-known institution, Sir Patrick Dun's Hospital, which it was proposed to amend. The provisions of the Bill had, he believed, the entire consent and concurrence of the Board of Management of Trinity College, of the College of Physicians, and of the Governors of Sir Patrick Dun's Hospital.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES ACT.

ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

LORD LYVEDEN rose to move an Address for a Return of any Actions brought or Penalties recovered under the 2nd clause of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 60, commonly called "The Ecclesiastical Titles Act." He avowed that he believed the answer to such Motion would be nil, and that if he were to enlarge his inquiry he should be informed that it would be impossible to bring any action under the measure. He thought it right, however, to call the attention of their Lordships, and through them of the public, who did not appear to be sufficiently aware of the circumstances, to the condition of the Act. In the year 1851 there broke out in this country a sort of moral fever, which sometimes affected the body politic as a cattle plague or cholera would the animal body. It broke out in the shape of a "No Popery" cry, in consequence of a bull issued by the Pope, which roused all the Protestant bigotry against the Roman Catholic bigotry of the country. A Bill was then brought in by his noble Friend (Earl Russell), not now in his place, into which the most objectionable clauses were introduced by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and it was carried by considerable majorities. He was happy to say that there were some who were not carried away by the cry which was raised at that time. Sir James Graham took a great part in resisting the measure, and he himself (Lord Lyveden) had the satisfaction of thinking that, though a humble follower of the noble Lord who introduced the Bill, he on that occasion voted against him. Well, the Bill had been perfectly inoperative and inefficient, as might have been expected. In the meantime, it had been violently declaimed against. Dr. Manning said that he thought it his plain duty, as a Christian and a gentleman, to violate the statute law of the country every day of his life. He had been told that the Roman Catholic Bishops were not very anxious to see the Act repealed; but with that their Lordships had nothing to do. If the Roman Catholics were agitating about any question, their Lordships would be told that they should not yield to Roman Catholic clamour; if they were perfectly quiescent, then it would be said it was better to leave things undisturbed. Now, it appeared to him that to keep up a useless cause of irritation was always unseemly. Their Lordships would be told that what the Irish Roman Catholics wanted was not to see this Act repealed; but they wished for some alteration in the position of the Church of England in Ireland. He should be willing to act with them on that subject if he saw any possibility of success; but it seemed to him so hopeless an attempt to try to accommodate the Church of England in Ireland to Irish tastes that he must recede from the task. With the views entertained by members of the Church of England here, and also by Dissenters, nothing could be done. They had to consider whether, since they could not relieve the greater grievance, they should not remove the less. In his opinion it would be beneficial to have it known that the reverend Prelates of the Church of England were not unwilling to remove this cause of irritation, which could not be considered as any security to the Church, but had rather the effect of rendering it weaker. He had great hopes in the First Lord of the Treasury for the repeal of this Act; because on the occasion of the Oaths Bill last year being brought forward a second time he very wisely, after an opposition, yielded to the wishes of his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, and upon the passage of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act the noble Earl, he found, expressed no approbation of it. In the present state of Ireland it was the duty of their Lordships especially to consider every possible grievance that tended to keep the Catholics in a state of uneasiness and disaffection. The Roman Catholic priesthood had acted in a most exemplary manner during the late insurrection, and anything which deprived them of the position which they ought to enjoy in the eyes of Irishmen ought to be removed. He was quite aware that a Bill on the subject had been brought into the other House, but that was no reason why their Lordships should not entertain the question; and, as no member of the Government had been present to express an opinion on the Bill in the House of Commons, he hoped some of them would do so now. He had always thought the Act in question a most impolitic piece of legislation; it had been totally inoperative, and he would ask their Lordships whether it was well to maintain it upon the statute book? Its removal would be no step towards the destruction of the Church of England; but, on the contrary, would rather strengthen it, by showing that Parliament, whenever it had an opportunity, was willing to conciliate the Roman Catholics, and would not insist upon the continuance of an Act which had been passed in a time of fever and excitement.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Return of any Actions brought or Penalties recovered under the Second Clause of Cap. 60., 14th and 15th Vict., commonly called "The Ecclesiastical Titles Act."—(The Lord Lyveden.)

THE EARL OF DENBIGH, as a humble member of the Roman Catholic body, wished to tender his best thanks to the noble Lord (Lord Lyveden) for the manner in which he had brought this question forward. The noble Lord had said that some of the Roman Catholic prelates were not anxious that this question should be pursued at the present moment; but the reason was that they thought its discussion inopportune, because the public mind was occupied by so many other things of greater importance, and they believed that to raise the question now might irritate some ultra-Protestant minds. But it was no reason why their Lordships should not repeal an objectionable law that the public mind was in a state of quiescence upon the subject. The operation of the Act caused great inconvenience in framing deeds relating to charities. Supposing that in such deeds a Roman Catholic bishop were constituted a trustee, there was a difficulty in indicating him, except by all sorts of circumlocution, otherwise Roman Catholics ran the risk of rendering some of their charities legally inoperative. This was the only inconvenience felt in England; but in Ireland the subject was felt to be one of great importance. It was admitted on all hands that during the late disturbance the Roman Catholic prelates there had shown themselves entitled to the confidence of the Government from their loyalty and their anxiety to maintain the cause of good government and good order; and therefore any means of bringing them into closer relation with the Government would be of advantage. Now, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) must, during his Viceroyalty, have desired to see at his levées some of the Roman Catholic prelates; but it was impossible for them to go there unless their proper status were recognised, and they were called by the titles by which they were usually known, neither could they fill a position of adequate usefulness while this law was in force. It was surely a small thing to ask that this Ecclesiastical Titles Act should be repealed; and he hoped that his Protestant fellow-countrymen had come to the conclusion that Roman Catholics did not, by the assumption of these titles, make any territorial claims. These titles were taken according to canon law, for the purpose of designating individuals in a regular constituted hierarchy. The Ecclesiastical Titles Act had been utterly inoperative, and he fully believed that the Return now moved for, if it were made, would be nil; but the existence of this statute was irritating and positively inconvenient, as he had shown, to Catholics, while it afforded no commensurate security to the Anglican establishment, and its repeal would be received with gratitude by the Roman Catholics both of England and Ireland.

THE BISHOP OF DOWN AND CONNOR, being the only representative in the House of either the English or Irish Prelates, desired to express his entire concurrence in the views expressed by the noble Lord (Lord Lyveden). While the Ecclesiastical Titles Act was inoperative, it was irritating to a large number of the members of the Roman Catholic Church, and he was quite sure that its repeal would be viewed with satisfaction by all right-minded members of the Protestant communion. Had he had the honour of a seat in their Lordships' House when the Bill was brought forward there he should certainly have recorded his vote against it; and it was a pleasure to him now that the subject was again before their Lordships to express his entire concurrence in the suggestion that it should be repealed.

THE EARL OF DERBY: So far as the Return which has been moved for is concerned, there cannot be the slightest objection to its production. It would involve no considerable expense or delay, for as no proceedings have been instituted under the Act, the Return will be nil. But I hope I shall be forgiven if I decline to enter into a discussion of the policy of the repeal of this Act. If the noble Lord intends to propose the repeal he will no doubt give notice to the noble Earl the author of the Act (Earl Russell), whose absence from the House I notice with great regret. Now, my Lords, what has been said by my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Denbigh) seems to me to indicate the expediency of proceeding with great caution in this matter; because my noble Friend told us that, except in regard to certain cases of charities, no practical inconvenience has resulted from the operation of the Act in England. Well, so far as any practical inconveniences are or may be complained of by the Roman Catholic prelates, I am quite sure that at all times both this and the other House of Parliament have every desire to remove everything of that kind. But my noble Friend went further, and pointed out one question which I think he will see, upon consideration, is just the question likely to raise again those strong feelings of irritation which first led to the passing of the Act. My noble Friend argued that the Act, though only inconvenient in England, had a very different effect in Ireland. Now, what is the cause of this difference? Because in England the Roman Catholic Bishops have not adopted territorial titles in rivalry with the Bishops of the Church that is recognised by the law; whereas in Ireland the Roman Catholic titles are in a position of antagonism and rivalry to those recognised by law. I remember a fact which shows how our own Church acts in such cases. When a Protestant Bishop was about to be appointed at Malta it was objected that there was already a Roman Catholic Bishop of Malta, and that the appointment of a Protestant prelate might appear to be an invasion of the rights of the Roman Catholic Bishop. The title of Bishop of Malta was therefore dropped, and that of Bishop of Gibraltar substituted. My noble Friend said that in Ireland the Roman Catholic Bishops have only adopted the titles to which they are entitled by the canon law. But I must observe that this just touches the sore point—is the law of the realm, or the canon law to prevail with regard to ecclesiastical titles in Ireland? It may be a matter of insignificance in itself; but it is just the point which, if agitated, is likely to raise all the ill-feeling between the two Churches which, happily, is subsiding day by day, and which, as far as this particular question is concerned, has sunk into absolute indifference. I repeat I will abstain from expressing any opinion as to the expediency of repealing the law, which I admit, and am happy to admit, is practically a dead letter in all respects; but I should very greatly regret that this question, which at present excites no feeling at all, should be made an occasion of bitterness and acrimony which I am most anxious to see disappear altogether between the members of the two Churches.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : My Lords, as I have been appealed to on this question I am unwilling to allow the occasion to pass without saying a few words. In the first place, I think it right to confess that I was one of those who voted for the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill in this House. I was at that time a very young Member of the House, and since then I have regretted, and shall never cease to regret, that vote, for I think the Act was a great mistake. As it is now the law of the land, no doubt, as the noble Earl at the head of the Government says, so grave a subject ought to be approached with great caution. It cannot be treated lightly; because there is no doubt that the policy which dictated the passing of that Act did express the feelings of a large portion of the English people; and, as the noble Earl reminds us, there is a great danger lest in touching such a question you may revive the acrimony which all of us, on whichever side of the House we may sit, wish to see buried for ever. But, unfortunately, besides England, there is another country called Ireland, and in that country the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, which here, I believe, excites no animosity, still creates very considerable heart-burnings, and does, I am quite convinced, stand in the way of some substantial improvement in the relations between the British Government and the Irish people. Owing to the great influence which the Roman Catholic prelates exercise in Ireland, everything which prejudicially affects their dignity and status has a great effect upon the feelings and opinions of the Irish people; and I am sure that, slight as this question of dignity may appear to some of your Lordships, the repeal of this law would give great satisfaction to the hearts of all the members of the Roman Catholic communion in Ireland. As to what fell from the noble Earl upon the question of admitting that Roman Catholic prelates may take the same titles as those held by Protestant prelates, the fact is that they are so designated, and that the law is, in practice, violated day by day. Of course, the Irish Government are careful in addressing them to keep within the strict bounds of the law, and invariably avoid giving these titles to the Roman Catholic prelates. But, in point of fact, they do assume these titles, which are generally given to them by the people, and they are universally recognised in spite of the Act. The reason is that they have been continuously assumed in Ireland; while in this country there were no Roman Catholic Bishops for some time, and consequently when they were appointed they abstained from taking the titles of the existing Protestant Bishops in this country. Having said thus much, I confess I shall see with the greatest pleasure the repeal of this Act; and I do hope that the good sense of English Protestants will lead them to see that in this country the Act furnishes no security whatever for the Protestant religion, and that so far as it operates at all it operates in a direction that is very undesirable. No man values more than I do the principles of Protestantism; but I do not wish to continue on the statute book an Act which is a dead letter, which is irritating to a portion of the subjects of Her Majesty, and which I believe serves no good object whatever.

EARL GREY : My Lords, I freely acknowledge, with the noble Earl who has just spoken (the Earl of Kimberley), that the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill was a very great mistake. At the time I reluctantly acquiesced in it, because I was assured that it was necessary to do something to soothe the excited feelings of the moment; but I did not assent to the passing of the Bill until I had fully satisfied myself that it could not lead to any practical result whatever, and that it could impose no practical hardship upon those to whom it applied. Even so, I think that it was a mistake to have been a party to that Act; I did not sufficiently consider that, although it would inflict no practical hardship upon Roman Catholics, it was calculated to irritate their feelings. But I must observe that the Act was not quite so objectionable as my noble Friend (Lord Lyveden) supposes; because it made little practical difference in the state of the law as regards Ireland. The Emancipation Act of 1829 had already prohibited any Roman Catholic prelates in the United Kingdom from assuming titles borne by prelates of the Established Church. The appointment of Roman Catholic prelates which had then just been made in England by the Pope, was not illegal under this part of the Act of 1829; because the titles conferred upon them were not those borne by prelates of the Established Church, in which there is no Archbishop of Westminster or Bishop of Birmingham or Hexham. The assumption of these titles by Roman Catholic prelates was not therefore contrary to law until the new Act was passed. But in Ireland the Roman Catholic prelates almost all take the title of sees of the Established Church, which had been already prohibited in 1829, so that little or no practical change was made as regards that country. Granting the Ecclesiastical Titles Act to have been a mistake, and granting that it is generally wrong to allow to remain on the statute book a law that is entirely inoperative, still I am inclined to agree with the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) in doubting the expediency of raising the question of its repeal now; because we are informed that the prelates of the Roman Catholic Church are not anxious that it should be brought forward. We also know that this is a subject of much delicacy, and it is possible that in dealing with it we might rouse feelings in this country which it would be far better to leave in quiet. My principal reason for expressing the opinion I do is that I am convinced the time must come, and come speedily, when you will have to look into the whole question of the state of the Church in Ireland. I adhere to the opinion I expressed last year that if Parliament does its duty not many years, or even months, ought to elapse before the question is brought forward. This being the case I much doubt whether it would be wise to interfere with the Ecclesiastical Titles Act now, since it would hardly be worth while to raise the feeling which might be aroused by attempting to deal with this subject until there is some real and substantial object to be gained. When you are prepared to consider and deal with the whole question of the Irish Church as it requires to be considered, no fear of popular prejudice that may be excited ought to prevent your doing justice; but, in the meantime, and looking forward to the ultimate settlement of the whole question, I feel that it would be more wise and prudent to allow this matter at present to remain in abeyance.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND: My Lords, I am in a somewhat different position from my noble Friend, having been one of the small minority of the House of Commons who voted against the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. I was of opinion that the passing of that Bill originally was a great error, and I have since been confirmed in that opinion; but while I think we made a mistake then, I agree with the noble Earl that it would be unwise to open the question now when no practical object can be gained by so doing, and that we may well postpone it until such period as we consider the whole question of the position of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. Although I think it was an error to pass the Act, and it has been inoperative, still I think it inexpedient to raise questions now which may cause some irritation of feeling.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he was one of those who supported the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill when it was brought in, and now he was ready and anxious to support the repeal of it, and he was as sincere in supporting it as he was now in desiring to see it repealed. They had been reminded that the Act was passed in a moment of great excitement. There was indeed at that time a great outcry, which was not entirely groundless; and he certainly thought, until he heard what fell from the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), that it had been entirely harmless. But while there was some justification for passing the Act originally, it was perfectly reasonable to repeal it now, to let bygones be bygones, and to let Roman Catholic bishops be legally designated by the names of the sees which they essentially governed.

EARL STANHOPE said, he desired to add his name to those of the noble Lords who, in 1851, voted for the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, and would repeal it now. He had since seen reasons to doubt the propriety of the vote he gave, and to regret that he should have been a party to the passing of an Act which seemed to him to have caused a great deal of irritation on one side without giving corresponding security on the other. For all practical purposes the Act had remained inoperative, and there was nothing he thought more open to objection than the willingness to leave upon the statute book Acts which were a dead letter, and were meant to be a dead letter, without the smallest practical effect. He should therefore be ready at any favourable opportunity, and in accordance with the public judgment, to vote for the repeal of this Act. He would allow that there was some weight in the argument of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), that the repeal of the Act would cause some irritation in the minds of those who originally proposed it, if they could be sure other questions would remain in abeyance; but their Lordships should remember that a cognate question had just been raised in the House of Commons, where a Bill had been introduced proposing to modify one of the clauses of the Catholic Emancipation Act, which required that the holder of the Great Seal in Ireland should always be a Protestant, that Government had supported that Bill, and that the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Lord Naas) had voted for the second reading. This was one of the questions that would probably cause some irritation, and if encountered in respect of that question it might as well be met in relation to this Bill. He thought the good sense of Protestants might be appealed to, not to contend for the retention on the statute book of an Act which afforded no valid security to their religion. His argument, then, was that as similar subjects were continually, month after month, being raised in the House of Commons, it might be advisable that in this, as in the other matter, satisfaction should be afforded to our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects.

LORD REDESDALE said, the policy of

the repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act required grave consideration. Their Lordships should remember what led to the passing of the Act. It was the appointment of Bishops to sees in England by the Pope; and the Act of Parliament was a protest on the part of the people of England against such an assumption of power of the Pope, and against his right to create territorial ecclesiastical titles in this country. This being so, the repeal of the Act might be taken in some quarters as an admission of the right thus protested against. This was a question that should be gravely considered.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of correcting a misapprehension of the noble Lord (Lord Lyveden) who introduced this subject. The noble Lord attributed to me the authorship of the penal clause of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act. This penal clause existed in the Bill, as originally introduced, and I moved an Amendment, the exact effect of which I do not recollect; but it was designed to render the clause more efficient; but which has remained inefficient like the whole of the Bill. It was directed only against the assumption of titles, and therefore persons might give titles as much as they pleased; but if a prelate did not assume titles no penalty could be imposed. I think the noble Lord ought to enlarge his Motion, and ask for a Return of the cases in which the law has been broken.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am reluctant in this very candid discussion not to take my part and make a candid confession myself. I cannot say I wish to recant. At the time the Ecclesiastical Titles Act was passed I was not in the Cabinet, though I held a subordinate office in the Government. I know at that time I held exactly the same opinion of the Bill I do now; yet I never voted more conscientiously for any measure than I did for that measure. I remember hearing at that time a speech made by Sir Roundell Palmer in the House of Commons, which I thought was conclusive as to the merits of the Bill. But what was the position? I do not know what passed in the Cabinet at the time they were considering it; but it was obvious that, rightly or wrongly, the country wanted the measure. The Pope had erected dioceses in this country, and whether that was right or wrong, I think that it was done in a very injudicious manner. That act of the Pope's led to great excitement and resentment in this country—indeed, I hardly remember a more universal feeling to have existed among all classes of Englishmen than was excited by that measure—and it was very doubtful whether we should not be driven into very intolerant action with regard to our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. The Ecclesiastical Titles Act did not really trench in any way on the religious liberties of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, and many persons were quite delighted to give that kind of sop to the people of this country, in order that they might have time carefully and seriously to consider the real merits of the question. As to the expediency of moving in the matter at the present moment, I quite agree that it ought to be made the subject of careful consideration; but, at all events, the noble Lord must be very much pleased at having raised this discussion, as it has been carried on in a spirit which will show all our fellow-subjects who differ from us in religious belief that we have made a considerable advance in regard to religious toleration.

LORD LYVEDEN, in reply, said, he could not agree with the noble Earl at the head of the Government that no practical grievance was created by the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill; because he thought it no small grievance that ecclesiastics of the highest distinction should be continually obliged to violate the law of their country. For instance, Dr. Moriarty called himself Bishop of Kerry, and all the other Irish Catholic prelates assumed the titles of their sees. With reference to the provision which had been referred to, of the Catholic Emancipation Act, he presumed that the Irish Members thought the Ecclesiastical Titles Act inflicted some grievance on Ireland which did not exist before.

EARL GREY said, he had not stated that the Ecclesiastical Titles Act did not apply to Ireland. It did apply to Ireland; but that was of no consequence, because the Act of 1829 had already prohibited the assumption by Roman Catholic prelates of the title of any see existing in the Established Church. The sees of Roman Catholic prelates did in Ireland take their names from sees in the Established Church, and therefore they came under the provisions of the Act of 1829. In England, however, the Roman Catholic Bishops took their titles from places—such as Westminster, for instance—the names of which were not given to sees in our own Church.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he believed he had proposed the Amendment to extend the Bill to Ireland. He was, however, speaking from memory only, and could not be quite certain on this point.

TURKEY AND CRETE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH rose for the purpose of inquiring whether Her Majesty's Government had been invited to join with France, Austria, and Russia in a simultaneous note to the Sublime Porte recommending the cession of Candia to Greece. The noble Earl said, he wished to explain briefly his reason for asking the question. In common with many others he had watched with considerable anxiety and no little apprehension, the course of policy pursued of late in the East, and the systematic disintegration—he might almost say spoliation—of the Ottoman Empire upon different pretexts, one being the doing justice to the Christian subjects of the Porte. By the Treaty of Paris it was provided that the Ottoman Empire should be preserved in its integrity, and one of its provisions was that the Hospodar of the Danubian Principalities should be a native. That provision, however, had been violated, when, through the machinations of certain foreign emissaries, the Native Prince was driven from his throne, and there was substituted for him a foreign Prince of that family whose dominions were now of such vast extent as to threaten to disturb the balance of power in Europe. When a treaty could be violated in this way without protest, there was no reason why it should not become waste paper. The next point he wished to refer to was the action of the Protecting Powers with regard to the fortresses in Servia. It was said that the Servians had a continual sore rankling in their minds caused by seeing an infidel flag floating over their fortresses. Now, according to the theory of nationality, it was admitted by our Government that it was a grievous thing for a foreign flag to float over a fortress. We had already given up the Ionian Islands, and on that theory there was no reason why we should not also cede Gibraltar and Malta. There could be no doubt that it was weakening the Ottoman Empire to take away its point d'appui in case of any attack from the Servian frontier upon its provinces of Bosnia and the Herzegovine, from which it would have its communications completely severed. And now he came to the question of Candia. It seemed to be now admitted that the insurrection had been chiefly fomented by foreign emissaries, and kept up by filibusters from Greece. Indeed, the noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government, in the discussion the other evening, had said there was no adequate cause for the Candian insurrection. And here he could not refrain from remarking that the tone of some of the despatches of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs might be parodied by some foreign Powers, such, for example, as France and America, if they took Ireland for their theme, in a way very far from palatable to us. Then, he would ask their Lordships to consider who were the parties to this policy in the East. First there was Russia. He did not wish to use unkind expressions towards a country with whom we were, and he hoped would continue to be, on friendly terms; but he believed it to be allowable to direct attention to her political action as it regarded this country, and, if necessary, to point out its immorality. The geographical position of Russia had, no doubt, an important bearing on this question. Russia had only three outlets for her commerce—the Sound, the Dardanelles, and the White Sea. It was of the utmost importance to Russia to have these outlets at all times free to her, and her conduct must have been remarked in reference to the ultimate succession to the Danish Crown, and the marriage of the Czarewitch to a Danish Princess. As to the Dardanelles, it was no secret that Russia had been doing all she could to weaken the Turkish Empire, in order, ultimately, to obtain Constantinople. Russia was not in a position, financially or socially, to go to war; but she had means of attaining her end without drawing the sword, and, indeed, she had gained more by the pen than the sword. She was not very scrupulous in her efforts, but pursued her objects per fas aut nefas. Then, too, she had a wonderful instinct in choosing her agents, and persuading them that they were only serving their own interests when they were in reality serving hers. She was indifferent whether they wore the Prussian uniform or the red shirt of the Garibaldians. He was not aware that Russia had any pre-eminent claim to be considered a Christian Power. Certainly if, as the apostle indicates, charity is the basis of Christianity, her conduct to her Polish subjects had not entitled her to it. Her Christianity was but a political engine, and her love for the Christians was something like the love the cuckoo bore the hedge-sparrow, that she might lay her egg in her nest, and in due time eject the original proprietor. The next Power concerned in the matter was Austria; but, beaten down as she had recently been, she scarcely could be called a free agent. She required quiet and time to staunch her wounds and recover what she had lost; but, in the meantime, if the accounts which appeared in the papers were correct, forces were gradually being collected on her frontier. There seemed to be a pressure put on her, in order that she might support the views of Russia, and it was significant that Austria was about to propose the revision of the Treaties of 1856, by which Russia was prevented from rebuilding Sebastopol and maintaining a fleet in the Black Sea. It was not necessary for him to attempt to account for French policy in the question; but it appeared to him that to encourage Russian designs on Turkey would be a policy suicidal to our interests, commercial and political. If Russia got to Constantinople, the balance of power in Europe—which was the only security for the liberty of the States of which it is composed—would immediately be destroyed. This opinion was supported by a much higher authority than his, because M. Thiers, referring to the pre-eminence of Russia, had expressed the views which he (the Earl of Denbigh) had now repeated. It was suicidal commercially to neglect the interests of Turkey; and on reference to the reports of the Board of Trade, showing the value of Turkey to England, he found that the articles of export from Turkey were raw cotton and corn, and by far the most important articles imported into Turkey were manufactured cotton and cotton yarn. In the last thirty years the exports from this country for Turkey had increased 850 per cent, and the imports from Turkey had doubled since 1858. The total of imports to, and exports from, the whole Ottoman Empire, exclusive of the Danubian Principalities, was, in 1858, £13,057,552. In 1864 it had risen to £35,208,017, having nearly tripled in eight years. Mr. Farley, an authority on the subject, stated in his book that the debt of Turkey was only equal to three years of her revenue, and that the whole of it might be cleared off in thirty-seven years by a sinking fund. There were not many countries of which so favourable a financial account could be given. He had heard with much pain the noble Earl at the head of the Government say on a recent occasion that, while it was no part of our duty to accelerate the fall of Turkey, yet, if her destruction was inevitable, it was our duty to assist in making it as gradual as possible. Now, he did not think we should be looking forward to the ruin of Turkey, nor could he see what cause we had for such an anticipation. There was a limit to what was called non-intervention. If we enjoyed the advantages of being a first-rate Power, we must take the responsibilities of that position; and if we had valuable allies, we ought to be prepared to support them. With nations, as with individuals, noblesse oblige; and we should not shrink from maintaining that support, even though it should cost us active intervention.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, from the Notice placed on the paper by the noble Earl (the Earl of Denbigh) I hardly thought it was his intention to enter into the question of the commercial importance of Turkey to this country, to comment on the intentions, or supposed intentions, of all the Powers of Europe, and to go into a general discussion of what is generally known as the Eastern Question, or into a general discussion of the affairs of Europe such as the noble Earl has introduced to your Lordships. I came down prepared to answer what I thought was the very simple question about to be put by my noble Friend; but not, certainly, to go into the Eastern Question. I shall not therefore follow the noble Earl through all the topics which he has brought under your Lordships' notice. In all the language I have ever held with regard to Turkey, I have always considered that it was a country with which we were on the most friendly relations, and to which it was desirable we should give every support in our power. On the occasion referred to by my noble Friend, what I said was, that it was no part of our duty to accelerate the ruin of Turkey; but that if her ruin was inevitable, it was our duty to use means to prevent the disruption from being sudden and violent, and to make it as gradual and as little felt as possible. Now, I cannot agree with the noble Earl that the course at present taken by foreign nations tends towards the disintegration of the Turkish Empire—generally it tends, I believe, to the maintenance and security of Turkey. And though I think the appointment of a foreign Prince to govern the Moldavian-Wallachian Provinces was contrary to the arrangement previously made by the European Powers, yet we did not consent to the departure from that arrangement until it had obtained the sanction of the Turkish Government. They sanctioned the proposed appointment because it was represented to them, and they believed, that it would be a source of strength instead of weakness to Turkey to have those Provinces united as quasi-independent Principalities, acknowledging the suzerainty of the Ottoman Porte. The same thing applies still more strongly to Servia. My noble Friend has spoken of a foreign flag floating over the fortress of Belgrade. He has taken an unlucky point with regard to that. It was not the Turkish flag floating over it that was considered an insult to Servia, but it was the Turkish garrison holding the fortress of Servia. That fortress, as was proved in former wars, could be of no possible use for the defence of Turkey against foreign Powers, but was a mark of subjection and constant source of irritation to Servia. The Servians desired that the garrison should be withdrawn, or the fortress itself should be demolished. That fortress is connected with all the most glorious recollections of Turkish history; but now, so far from being of any use to them, it is a constant source of expense, annoyance, and illwill to Servia. It is suggested that the fortress is now to be abandoned from compulsion or dictation. So far from that, my noble Relative at the head of the Foreign Office has sedulously and absolutely repudiated any such interference on the part of the British Government; but he has not hesitated to intimate his own opinion—and very truly and very wisely as I think—that the interests of Turkey lay in making a friend rather than an opponent of Servia, and I am happy to add that an arrangement in this spirit has been entered into; while Turkey still holds the fortress of which she is justly proud, the Turkish garrisons will be withdrawn, to be replaced by a Servian garrison, thereby removing occasion for illwill and earning the honourable and cordial sympathy and goodwill of the Servian Provinces. The Prince of Servia has proceeded to Constantinople to settle the terms on which Servia is in future to maintain its relations with Turkey; and the only condition made as to the fortress is that the flag of the Sovereign Power shall float upon the fortress in common with the Servian flag. By this means additional contentment, additional security, and additional strength have, I believe, been added to the Turkish Empire. My noble Friend then proceeded to deal with the case of Crete, detailing the views of Austria, Russia, and France, with which I do not pretend to be acquainted. He says, "I can understand the policy of those three Powers; but that England should consent to the disintegration of the Turkish Empire and the annexation of Crete to Greece is a matter that I cannot understand."

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: I merely asked the question. I did not venture to suppose that England had yet consented.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Then if my noble Friend asks me whether, seeing what has been done by the Porte for Moldavia and Servia, the Porte will not extend the same advantages to Crete, all I can say is that if a foreign Prince were appointed there under the same circumstances as those to which I have alluded, whatever Her Majesty's Government might think of the wisdom or otherwise of that step, it would not feel called upon to raise any serious obstacle in the way of such an arrangement. The matter concerns Turkey herself; but I am not sure, except for the great difficulty of dealing with a mixed population of Mussulmans and Christians, that autonomy conceded to the Crete subjects might not be a source of weakness rather than of strength. My noble Friend, after talking of the disintegration of the Turkish Empire, and after giving us the views of Europe, says it is suicidal to the commercial relations of England with Turkey; but that appears to me something like an assumption on the part of the noble Earl that England has adopted some policy at the suggestion of Foreign Powers. My noble Friend asked me, have Austria, Russia, and France addressed any invitation to this country to join them in a simultaneous, as he calls it, or, as it is more commonly called, an identic note, calling on Turkey to annex Crete to the Kingdom of Greece? My answer simply is that no such proposition has been made to Her Majesty's Government—that we have never been invited to join in any identic note, nor have any propositions of the kind supposed by my noble Friend been made to Turkey on behalf of this country.

The Earl of Derby

This is what has taken place:—The French Ambassador in this country called on my noble Relative at the head of the Foreign Office, and stated that the French Government either had or were about to instruct their Ambassador at Constantinople to advise Turkey to cease from the struggle in Crete, and consent to the annexation of Crete to Greece, and he asked whether Her Majesty's Government were prepared to issue similar instructions. My noble Relative expressed great regret, because Her Majesty's Government did not feel themselves justified in issuing similar instructions to their Ambassador at Constantinople; but he added that if the Turkish Government thought fit voluntarily to surrender the island of Crete to Greece, Her Majesty's Government, whatever they might think of such a transaction, would not feel it their duty to throw difficulties in the way. Since my noble Friend gave notice of his Question a similar proposition has been made, not by despatch, but in conversation, on behalf of Russia; to this my noble Relative gave the same answer which had been already given to the Ambassador of France; and so the matter stands at present. I know not what course has been taken by the Austrian Government; but if Russia and France either have advised or intend to advise Turkey, by a voluntary act of its own, to permit the annexation of Crete to Greece, Her Majesty's Government decline to be any party to offering such advice. In the first place, my belief is that the advice, if given and not supported, as I trust it will not be supported, by any stronger measures, is not likely to be taken. And I must confess that I entertain very grave doubt whether, if it was taken, the proposed transfer from the Turkish Government to the Greek dominion would be favourable either to the prosperity or contentment of the Cretan population. The policy of this country has ever been, while giving to Turkey any advice which it may think beneficial or advantageous for that country itself, to refrain from pursuing any policy or advising any act inconsistent with the independent jurisdiction of Turkey over its own provinces. I certainly shall not join in pressing upon her any policy contrary to that which she, herself, would be disposed to adopt in reference to matters as to which we acknowledge her own sovereign rights to deal with as she thinks proper.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH expressed his entire satisfaction with the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government, and, after what had fallen from the noble Earl, would not propose the Motion of which he had given notice.

TOTNES ELECTION COMMISSION REPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. MORRISON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the following passages in the Report of the Totnes Election Commission :—

"1. While we were sitting John Heath, who had been the principal briber on the Conservative side since 1857, who, when examined as a witness before us, gave evidence the falsehood of which he afterwards admitted, who was accused by two witnesses of subornation of perjury, and who was under the imputation of being, with others, unable to account for the distribution over £1,200, was not only re-elected a member of the town council, but was, during the next week, offered the mayoralty of the town. 2. We find that a sum of over £3,700 passed into the hands of persons engaged in directly bribing voters, and that £3,450 has been accounted for as thus distributed, while of the remainder no account has been given to us. The persons who ought to give such account are Mr. Edmonds, Mr. J. Heath, and their inferior agents. It was alleged before us by John Heath, and considerable time was taken up in searching into the truth of the allegation, that this money had been in truth placed in the hands of an unknown stranger, and that he must account for the deficiency, but after considering all the evidence taken before us, the contradictory statements made, and the falsehoods told by John Heath and other of the witnesses, who swore to the existence of such a stranger, and the final avowal of two of these witnesses that they had invented the story of being paid by a stranger at John Heath's instigation, we much doubt whether there was any such person as the stranger at all, or if there were, whether had he been called he could have accounted for all the deficient money.

3. We think it right to report to Your Majesty that the following witnesses made statements on oath before us, the falsehood of which was afterwards either acknowledged by themselves or made plain to us in the course of the subsequent inquiry :—John Heath, senior, George Griffiths, Thomas Blank, Henry Crawford, Richard Norrish, Thomas Gillham, William Satchwell, Robert Harris, Jubal Bartlett, Nicholas Manning, John S. Screach, junior, and Frederick Evens. Thomas Jacob Searle confessed himself guilty of subornation of perjury in trying to prevent witnesses from telling the truth before us; and John Heath, senior, was accused by two witnesses, and Samuel Parnell was also accused, of the same offence ;" and, if it is the intention of the Government to take any criminal proceedings against the said John Heath, senior, or others, for perjury or subornation of perjury?

MR. WALPOLE replied that the Law Officers of the Crown had been directed by the Home Office to inquire into the cases mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, with a view to ascertain what proceedings should be taken with respect to them.

METROPOLITAN POOR LAW RATING. QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, If his attention has been directed to a recent Return made by the Poor Law Board, purporting to show the rate in the pound of the Expenditure for the Relief of the Poor in each of the thirty-nine Unions and Parishes within the Metropolitan District during each of the ten years from 1857 to 1866 inclusive; and, if so, whether he is aware that the said Return is for the most part incorrect, in consequence of the ten columns of figures showing the rate in the pound of each Union and Parish during each of the ten years having been all calculated upon the rateable value of the year 1866, instead of upon the various rateable values of each of the ten years from 1857 to 1866, so that only one of the ten columns of figures is correct; whether he is aware that all the results that may be drawn from the said Return of the rate in the pound are exactly contrary to the actual facts; and, whether he will direct a corrected Return to be made forthwith?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that the Return in question had been made out in strict conformity with the Motion of the hon. Gentleman who had asked for its production. That Motion was for a Return of the rateable value of each union and parish in the metropolis according to the latest valuation; and that was, of course, the information which had been furnished. But if the hon. Alderman desired to learn the rateable value of the different unions and parishes during each of the preceding nine years, he (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) should have no objection to such a Motion beyond that which applied to the production of any Returns which would involve great expense and trouble.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he would therefore give notice that he should move for an amended Return.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the table of the House the Report of the Committee on Transport for the Army which sat last year, and of which Lord Strathnairn was President?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, he could not then give a decided answer to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member. He believed that Report was drawn up, but it had not yet been signed by the President of the Committee, and he (Sir John Pakington) had not therefore yet seen it. After he should have had an opportunity of examining it he should be prepared to state whether he thought it desirable that it should be published.

IRELAND—MILITIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he intends to call out the Irish Militia for training this year?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, he was sorry that he could not give the hon. and gallant Gentleman a decided answer to his Question. In the Estimates a sum was taken for the Irish militia; but the period of the year at which they assembled for training was generally later than that at which the English militia were called out for the purpose, and no time had yet been fixed for calling them out this year.

THE INSTRUCTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether instructions have yet been issued to the Civil Authorities and to the Commanding Officers of the Volunteers respecting the employment of Volunteers in the suppression of disturbances; and whether he will undertake to lay such instructions upon the table of the House before the Vote be taken for the Volunteer Service?

MR. WALPOLE replied, that instructions had been drawn up on the subject by the War Department. Those instructions had been sent to the Law Officers of the Crown, to be put into the shape of regulations, which, when they were approved by those Officers, would be transmitted by the War Office to the lords-lieutenant of the different counties, and by the Home Department to the various civil authorities throughout the Kingdom. When that was done—and he hoped it would be done at no distant day—he should take care that the regulations were laid on the table of the House.

MR. BRIGHT said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it would not be better that they should be laid on the table before they were sent to the lords-lieutenant of counties and the civil authorities, in order that any hon. Member might, if he thought fit, bring them under the consideration of the House before they were finally determined on. Otherwise, the authorities at the Horse Guards might say it was too late to interfere in the matter, as they had repeatedly done in other instances?

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought it was the usual and the preferable course that the framing of the instructions should be left to the Executive Government, on whom the responsibility which they might involve must naturally rest. They could afterwards be laid upon the table of the House, and that would be the proper time for hon. Members taking any notice of them they might think desirable.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to know, whether the right hon. Gentleman will undertake that those instructions should be produced before the Vote for the Volunteer Service is submitted to the House?

MR. WALPOLE said, he had no doubt that that would be done. The instructions would, he believed, be laid upon the table before the Easter recess.

NEW LAW COURTS.—QUESTION.

MR. LANYON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Commissioners of the new Law Courts to accede to the request of the competing architects to the effect that two professional men, selected by the competitors, be added to the judges?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that a request of that description had been addressed to the Lord Chancellor, who had asked the opinion of the Government upon the subject; and they considered that it was at present too late to alter the arrangement which had been previously adopted.

CEYLON.—BARRACKS AT POINT DE GALLE.—QUESTION.

MR. OLIPHANT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to build fresh barracks for European Troops at Point de Galle?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied, that in consequence of the recent transfer of the Straits Settlements, it was considered necessary that a wing of a European regiment should be settled at that station, and it was intended that barracks should be built for their accommodation. But there was at present a question pending between the colony and the Colonial Office with regard to the proportions in which they should respectively contribute to the expenditure which would thus have to be incurred.

MUTINY ACT—FLOGGING.—QUESTION.

MAJOR JERVIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, having in view the proposed alteration of Clause 24 of the Mutiny Act, it is proposed to give the Military Authorities power to discharge men guilty of felony, or of disgraceful conduct which has rendered them liable to flogging, on the completion of their sentence?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, it was not his intention to propose that any additional powers should be given in the direction referred to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, because he did not think such powers were necessary. Under the 22nd Article of War it was now competent for Commanders-in-Chiefs, Courts Martial, and Generals commanding in the colonies to dismiss from Her Majesty's service such men as those to whom the hon. and gallant Gentleman referred.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—SPECIAL FRANCHISES.

QUESTION.

MR. THOMAS CAVE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will be willing to introduce into the Bill for the amendment of the Representation of the People a provision giving the Franchise to male persons having had for two full years prior to July in each year, a sum not less than £50 deposited at interest in any duly constituted Freehold Land or Building Society?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, the Question of the hon. Gentleman is based on a misapprehension of the circumstances on which the special franchises in the Reform Bill are founded. The franchises which are founded on the possession of a certain sum in the public funds, for example, or in the savings banks, and on direct taxation are founded on circumstances which are as it were in the eye of the Government, and over which they have control. That character does not apply to the franchise to which the hon. Gentleman refers, which is one that I cannot for a moment countenance.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS. REMOVAL OF MAGISTRATES.

QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the Postmaster General will remove Samuel Parnell, Postmaster, Totnes, convicted of bribery and corrupt practices at the Elections of Totnes in the years 1857, 1859, 1862, 1863, and 1865; and, if the Lord Chancellor will remove from the Commission of the Peace for that borough Charles Webber, Esq., and Webber Chaster, Esq., declared guilty by the Commission of corrupt practices and bribery?

MR. WALPOLE, in reply to the first Question, said, he believed the Postmaster General was in communication with the Treasury, with which Department the person mentioned was connected, and that the cases were under the consideration of that Department. In answer to the second Question, he might state that the Lord Chancellor was engaged in considering all those cases which came within the scope of the Address of this House, which had recently been presented to Her Majesty on the subject of corrupt practices at elections. When the noble and learned Lord had fully considered all those cases the result of his deliberation would be communicated to the House.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said he should give notice that he would, on a future day, call the attention of the House to the Report of the Commission of Inquiry respecting corrupt practices at Totnes, and to the conduct of the Duke of Somerset and his agents.

THE OWNERS OF THE "CYCLONE." QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring to justice the owners of the Cyclone for their violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act?

LORD STANLEY, in reply, said, he had been in communication with the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject, and he was informed that the facts at present within their knowledge did not afford sufficient evidence to justify the taking proceedings against the owners.

CATTLE DISEASE.—QUESTION.

MR. H. E. SURTEES said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is true that a disease has recently appeared amongst Cattle in Cornwall; and, if so, if he will inform the House what is the nature of the disease?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU replied, that a disease did break out among cattle in Cornwall, and Professor Simonds was sent down to the spot. That gentleman stated that on his arrival there he found that the disease first appeared on the 8th instant, and between that time and the 13th instant eighteen cattle were attacked in a herd of forty-six. In the course of nine days twelve of the cattle died. The Professor caused a post-mortem examination to be made, and after noting its result he continued—

"The disease has been entirely confined to this herd, and no fresh cases have occurred since my visit. The cessation of the malady, and its limitation to eighteen out of forty-six animals, are sufficient evidence that it is not of an infectious nature. A microscopic examination of some parts has been made by Professor Browne, and did not lead to the detection of the presence of parasitic bodies, either vegetable or animal."

CHOLERA CONGRESS AT CONSTANTINOPLE.—QUESTION.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, At what time the labours of the Cholera Congress at Constantinople were concluded; and (as the Report has not been received), whether any Paper in the form of a Report from any of the Commissioners has been received, and whether it will be distributed?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that the Cholera Congress at Constantinople closed its sittings in the month of October last. The Report of the Congress had not yet reached the Foreign Office. They had only received through the British Commissioner a kind of abstract of the work which had been performed. He did not know why the full Report had not yet arrived, and if it should be much longer delayed he would write for it; but he thought it would be better to wait for the entire document rather than to publish an abstract which might not give an accurate or complete idea of its contents.

ARMY—THE HOUSEHOLD CAVALRY REGIMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Under what peculiar Law or privilege commanding officers of the Life Guards and Royal Regiment of Horse Guards discharge men from the regiment without the previous consent and authority of the Commander-in-Chief, in accordance with the General Instructions for the Army contained in the Queen's Regulations?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, the answer he had to give to the question of the hon. Gentleman would, he thought, be satisfactory. There was no doubt as to the existence of the power referred to. For a long period of time all colonels of regiments, in consideration of bearing the expense of recruiting, had the power to dismiss soldiers. This power was put an end to in 1784, by an Act passed on the Motion of Mr. Burke, but a special exception was made as respects the Household troops. Consequently, the power to dismiss still remained to the colonels of the Household troops. So lately as 1865 an action was brought against Colonel Marshall, who now commanded the Second Life Guards, on account of dismissing a soldier without cause. The case was tried in the Court of Common Pleas, and the defence was allowed to be perfectly good.

TRIAL OF FENIAN PRISONERS.
QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether there is any truth in the rumour that it is the intention of the Government to prosecute any of the Fenian Prisoners under any of the Whiteboy Acts, by the provisions of which flogging may be inflicted?

THE O'DONOGHUE said, that before the Chief Secretary for Ireland answered the Question, he wished to ask, whether the noble Lord would lay upon the table of the House a Copy of the Circular recently addressed to the Irish Magistrates, in which a very pointed reference was made to that power of inflicting corporal punishment under the provisions of the Whiteboy Act?

LORD NAAS: There will be no objection, Sir, to lay that Circular upon the table of the House. It was issued in consequence of the Government having received information that offences were being perpetrated in different parts of Ireland which for many years had happily ceased—namely, the offence of unlawfully assembling and going through the country in considerable numbers, for the purpose of demanding arms at the houses of the peaceable inhabitants. The Circular merely called the attention of the magistrates, and of the public generally, to the existing state of the law; and I am happy to be able to inform the hon. Gentleman that I believe the issuing of that document was attended with the most salutary results. With regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), I have to state that it is quite impossible for me to say under what particular statute or statutes the Fenian prisoners are likely to be indicted. That is a question which must be left to the Law Officers of the Crown, and their decision will depend on the nature of the evidence and depositions which may be laid before them. But I must remind the hon. Gentleman that sentence in these cases must entirely rest with the presiding Judges, and that it is a matter with which the Executive Government has not in any way to deal. I will only add, that looking at the ability, the experience, and the high character of the Judges selected to preside at the Special Commission, I think the House may feel perfectly satisfied that the sentences which they may pronounce will be sufficient, and not more than sufficient to meet the justice of each case.

THE PREROGATIVE OF MERCY.
QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he wishes it to be understood that, in all cases which have fallen under his consideration since he has been in office, he has adopted, and intends in future to adopt, the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners on Capital Punishment as a test and guide for the exercise of the Royal Prerogative of Mercy, before any legislation by Parliament has taken place on the subject?

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I think it right, before answering the Question of the hon. Member, to state specifically what were the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners, which I have endeavoured humbly and faithfully to act upon. Those recommendations were three—

“1. That the punishment of death be retained for all murders deliberately committed with express malice aforethought, such malice to be found as a fact by the jury; 2. That the punishment of death be also retained for all murders committed in or with a view to the perpetration, or escape after the perpetration, or attempt at perpetration of any of the following felonies—murder, arson, rape, burglary, robbery, or piracy. 3. That in all other cases of murder the punishment be penal servitude for life, or for any period not less than seven years, at the discretion of the Court.”

Those three recommendations were unanimously adopted by the Commissioners. I have never heard them found fault with because they restricted the punishment too much, but questions have been raised whether they might not have restricted it somewhat more. When I succeeded to the office I now hold I felt it my duty to act upon the unanimous recommendations of the Commissioners as far as I could, and I propose to do so in future. Might I take the liberty of adding one word? There is no duty which the Secretary of State has to perform so painful as that of advising Her Majesty with reference to the exercise of the Prerogative of Mercy. In the discharge of that duty no one who holds the office can ever have or ever has had any other motive than honestly and faithfully to execute the law in the manner in which he believes that it was intended by the Legislature to be administered. But difficult as that duty is, its difficulty will be ten times—aye, a hundred times—increased if those who wish to question the conduct of the Secretary of State in advising upon cases of this description make attacks upon him without information, and before explanations are given, without even the common courtesy of applying for such information. I can assure hon. Gentlemen, whoever they may be, who question my conduct that information would be freely and willingly afforded to them, and after it has been given, and they still see reason to find fault with me, then, but not till then, comes their opportunity to do so.

CATTLE MARKET AT GLOUCESTER.

QUESTION.

MR. MONK said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the time has not arrived when the Cattle Market at Gloucester may be re-opened, regard being had to the fact that the port of Gloucester is an inland port, at which no foreign cattle have been imported during the last twenty years, and to the offer of the Mayor and Corporation of Gloucester to set apart land and sheds for the detention and slaughter of all foreign or sea-borne cattle which may arrive at that Port?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU stated, in reply, that under the general provisions of treaties with foreign Powers, cattle, as well as other goods, cannot be prohibited from landing. In order, therefore, to prevent foreign cattle from mixing with British cattle, it was necessary to stop the markets at all ports. The Law Officers had it under consideration whether, under the exceptional circumstances of cattle plague and for the well-being of the country, the Privy Council might issue an order to prohibit importation, and therefore to open the markets at particular ports. In the case of Gloucester, however, another case arose—namely, whether such an Order of Council would override the local Act which gives free navigation along the canal to Gloucester. This case had only just been submitted to the Law Officers, and therefore he could not yet give a decided answer to the Question of the hon. Member.

Mr. Darby Griffith

NAVY—GREENWICH HOSPITAL
ACCOUNTS.—QUESTION.

MR. SEELY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, When an account of the yearly income and expenditure of Greenwich Hospital will be laid upon the table of the House, in accordance with the forty-ninth section of the Act 28 and 29 Vict. c. 89.

MR. CORRY replied that objections were entertained by the Admiralty to the form of audit provided by the clause referred to; it was therefore intended to introduce a short Bill to alter the form of audit, when the accounts would be audited and laid on the table.

CANADA RAILWAY LOAN.—COMMITTEE.

Paper relating to Canada Railway Loan [presented 26th March] referred.

(In the Committee.)

MR. ADDERLEY said, that in moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice, not one word would fall from him approving in the abstract of guarantees of colonial loans. He had always thought, and whenever the subject was under consideration, as it had been too often, he had expressed his decided opinion that they were a feature of the worst possible relations between this country and the colonies, bad enough for this country, but still worse for the interests of the colonies. He sincerely hoped that this colonial guarantee would be the last proposed to Parliament, or if proposed, the last that Parliament would be disposed to grant. This particular guarantee was an exceptional case, which, under the circumstances, it was absolutely necessary for the Government to propose. It was expedient, most expedient and advantageous both to this country and to the colonies, and on the other hand it might be granted by Parliament without the slightest risk. He had stated, in moving the Confederation Bill, that Parliament would come to the consideration of this proposal perfectly unfettered and unpledged. He now asked them to consider it freely, and if he did not make out that it was absolutely necessary as well as most expedient the Committee would be perfectly free to reject it. He thought he should best show the Committee the necessity of the proposal by giving a history of the subject. So far back as 1838, this country had to send troops to Canada in the depth of winter to resist the invasion of the sympathizers, as they were called, who had no doubt the intention and were equipped with the means for the conquest of that country. We had to embark troops at Halifax and send them across the country to Quebec, in the depth of winter, with the greatest difficulty and hazard, and at enormous cost. It was then forced on the attention of everybody that merely in a military point of view, to say nothing of commercial interests, it was necessary that railway communication should be opened between Halifax and Quebec. They had had, as the Committee knew, even more recent proof of this necessity only a short time ago. This was so evident that we proceeded at once to survey the country of New Brunswick lying between Nova Scotia and Canada. Major Robinson was sent out, and made a complete survey of various lines of railway that might be constructed between Halifax and Quebec. That able surveyor, who spent three years upon it, presented an elaborate Report to the House, and any Gentleman who was not acquainted with it had the opportunity of consulting it in the Library. He trusted that no one who had not availed himself of that opportunity would oppose the Bill. The survey ended in a preference announced by Major Robinson, on grounds principally military, for what was called the Eastern line, which was the longest. At that time Lord Grey was Colonial Secretary, and he did not hesitate, in the interests of this country, to offer to the colony a guarantee for the railway on two grounds—first, that it was essential to Imperial interests, and therefore that England ought to share the expense; and secondly, that the colony, even if called on, could not without the assistance of the guarantee and credit of this country, raise the requisite sum without a most unnecessary drag on its revenues. The offer then made by Lord Grey was first made on the part of the Imperial Government. He believed the intention of Lord Grey was that this country should not only guarantee the line but undertake the work itself. We had now different views of our relations to the colonies; and the colonies had taken a much more spirited view of their own responsibilities. The proposal since made was that whatever sum of money the British North-American Provinces should raise for that purpose the Imperial Government would guarantee the interest on the loan. He would not weary the Committee by referring in detail to the correspondence with every Colonial Minister—Sir John Pakington, Mr. Labouchere, and the Duke of Newcastle. It was sufficient to say that in 1862 the Duke of Newcastle, while rejecting a proposal of the colonies, made a proposal which was very much that which he now recommended. It was that the Imperial Treasury should guarantee the interest at the rate of 4 per cent on the loan to be raised by the Government of the North-American Provinces for the construction of a railway. Nothing had passed since then except the very material circumstance of the late Government having considered the proposal on the subject made by the delegates of the provinces assembled in Quebec, and drawn up a Treasury memorandum, which formed the basis of the measure to be brought in. In 1864 the late Secretary for the Colonies expressed some regret at the delay which had taken place in proceeding with the scheme, for though New Brunswick and Nova Scotia both passed Acts on the basis of the memorandum, Canada had not; but, ultimately, their delegates adopted the proposal of the Imperial Government. An agreement was then drawn up between the Duke of Newcastle, the then Colonial Secretary, and the colonial delegates, which was to subsist for five years, and which expired next December, and it was upon that agreement that the present Bill was based, although several alterations in favour of this country had been introduced into the present Bill. The scheme had now become part of the proposed Confederation of the North-American Provinces. The two schemes of the Confederation and of the construction of the railway were bound up together. It was now clear that the one could not stand without the other, and every argument that had been cordially accepted by the House of Commons in favour of the union between the provinces applied with equal force to the guarantee of a loan for the construction of the line. It was impossible that the question of the construction of the line could be separated from that of the guarantee, inasmuch as the colony could scarcely raise £3,000,000, the amount required for the construction of the line, at less than 6 per cent on their own security, whereas with the guarantee of this country they could borrow that sum at 4 per cent. At present colonial stock was at par at 6 per cent, and to throw £3,000,000 of fresh stock on the market would be productive of great embarrassment. The construction of this line was the key to the success of the Confederation, and was essential to it in a commercial and a defensive point of view. Without this line for six months in the year, the inland portion of the Confederation would be entirely cut off from communication with the sea; and this country could not use it for the passage of troops, while the long line of frontier would be in an absolutely defenceless condition. The only way of making the new Confederation independent of the United States was to construct this important railway, which would enable Canada to develop itself, and rely entirely upon her own resources. Whatever risk the Imperial Government might run in guaranteeing this loan, it would run a still greater risk in refusing its assent to the only proposal that would enable the colony to maintain itself. If this guarantee were refused, the North-American States would remain in their old condition, in which they could hardly fail to invite aggression which they would be unable to repel. On the other hand, the guarantee might be given without running the slightest risk. The proposal now offered in the Bill was far more favourable to this country than that contained in the agreement which was assented to by the late Government, who had to deal with the question under much less favourable circumstances than at present existed. The late Government had to deal with three separate colonies, and to apportion the charges among three distinct revenues, whereas the present Government had to deal with one Confederated body politic, and with one revenue. It was possible, under the old conditions, that one of the colonies might have become exhausted before the scheme was completed, whereas now the scheme formed part and parcel of the united policy and enterprise of Confederation. The colonists were more deeply interested in it than they could have been under distinct Governments. Canada no longer looked to Portland for her outlet. Another alteration in the engagement favourable to this country was that instead of—as proposed by the late Government—the sinking fund being based on decennial periods, so that during the first ten years there was no provision made towards it, it was to begin from the very moment the line was commenced, and was to be calculated at the rate of 1 per cent upon the whole sum guaranteed, so that the entire loan would be repaid by annual and easy instalments, in about forty years, thus greatly reducing any possible risk incurred by this country. In one point, however, the present proposal was not so favourable as the former agreement. The late Government were enabled to stipulate that Parliament should not be called upon to legislate until the line of railway was actually fixed, whereas under existing circumstances it was necessary that Parliament should assent to the conditions required of them before they could know which of the three proposed lines was to be adopted. When the new Parliament of Canada assembled they would form a judgment as to which of the three surveyed lines it would be best to carry out, and would then refer their decision to Her Majesty for Her approval. Again, the security offered for the loan was a new revenue, instead of the three old ones; but he could show that the maximum of liability was more than covered by the minimum of security. The line involving the largest expenditure in its construction was the Eastern line running on the borders of the St. Lawrence, which was the one recommended by Major Robinson and by Mr. Light, who was for many years Chief Engineer of Works at New Brunswick. They had reports from these gentlemen and also a report from a gentleman who had been engaged in making a special survey by the Canadian Government. The calculation of Major Robinson gave £7,700 per mile as the greatest average cost of constructing either of those lines. The estimate of Mr. Light was rather higher, amounting to £8,300 per mile; but then Mr. Light acknowledged that Major Robinson's estimate would be perfectly sufficient to provide for the opening of the line, and stated that he had fixed upon a higher sum because he had taken into consideration some solid works which, after all, a railway might safely do without at its first starting. Some judgment might be formed from the cost of existing railways. The cost of the railway from Shediac to St. John's, in the construction of which the greatest engineering difficulties had to be overcome, averaged £8,300 per mile. It was true that the Grand Trunk Railway, in its Eastern branch running to Quebec, cost £8,800 per mile; but that line was made under great disadvantages, not only from the disturbed state of the money-market at the time when means were raised for it, but also from other contemporary circumstances. Some hon. Members might, perhaps, think that the proposed railway was in itself an unpromising speculation. Hon. Members might possibly believe that it would be unprofitable, because it would be blocked in winter. Certain portions of the Grand Trunk Railway were much more liable to such accidents than any of the lines proposed, and yet that railway had scarcely ever been stopped in winter, the longest stoppage not exceeding three days. It was not, however, a guarantee of profits that he asked, but only of interest on a fixed loan to be paid off in forty years. He asked for the guarantee of interest, independently of the success of the railroad, and irrespective of any dividend upon shares. The security was wholly independent of the profit or success of the undertaking— independent even of the completion of the railway, though the Bill would take ample means to secure that object. Although the highest average sum expended upon any railway in Canada was £8,800, he would go still higher, and take the cost of the proposed line at £9,000 per mile. The length of the longest of the proposed lines was 470 miles, which, at £9,000 per mile, would give a sum exceeding £4,000,000. That would throw upon Canada the raising of an extra £1,000,000 beyond the £3,000,000 guaranteed, and they would have to raise it on their own credit, which they could not do at a less interest than 6 per cent. The maximum and greatly outside calculation of charge on Canadian revenue which he was offering was therefore a payment at the rate of 4 per cent on the £3,000,000 guaranteed, which would amount to £120,000 a year; a sinking fund at 1 per cent, which would amount to £30,000, and the interest at the rate of 6 per cent on the extra £1,000,000, which would be £60,000, making in all an annual payment for forty years of £210,000. He would ask the House next to consider the security—the consolidated revenue of Canada—upon which it was proposed to charge the interest of the sum guaranteed and of the sinking fund, and any sum this country might have to pay, and any extra sum Canada might have to raise. The only charges upon the revenue of Canada which would have precedence over these charges were those specified in the Confederation Bill—first, the cost of collecting the revenue; second, the interest of Canada's present debt, about £12,000,000; and third, the future salary of the Governor General, £10,000 a year. There was a difficulty in determining what the revenue would hereafter amount to, inasmuch as the interoceanic duties between one province and the other would cease under the Confederation scheme—a deprivation of revenue, however, which was attended with the certain advantage of conducting greatly to the development of the Confederated commerce and industry. The future Canadian revenue would, he believed, be fully able to bear this charge of £210,000, only £21,000 more than the separate Governments as surplus last year were able to devote in the payment of debt. But the revenue of the United Government was not a fixed sum, but was made to correspond with the requirements of their Government year by year. The revenue of Canada was likely to rise to its requirements. The debt of Canada was £12,000,000. But how was this debt created? The public debt of the country, unlike the debts of other countries, which had been, as a rule, incurred to meet the charges of war and of unproductive expenditure, had been incurred in the promotion of public and remunerative works. It had, too, been met by the establishment of a sinking fund, and under the operation of that fund the debt was gradually decreasing every year. Canada upon all occasions had been able and ready to meet her engagements, and he would ask the Committee to consider the important fact that when in 1842 this country guaranteed the loan of £1,500,000 for public works, the revenue of Canada was only £300,000 a year. The revenue now amounted to £2,500,000. With the former revenue of £300,000, however, Canada paid off the loan nine years before it became due. As it was, the taxation per head of the population was annually decreasing, and at this moment it was not more than 15s. per head—no very alarming amount compared with that of almost every other country. A short statement which he would give the Committee would show the progress and the state of the country. Between 1851 and 1864 the tonnage of vessels entering the North American ports had increased from 1,250,000 to 2,500,000, the exports from 4,000,000 dollars to 40,000,000 dollars, and the imports, exclusive of bullion, from 9,000,000 dollars to 21,000,000 dollars. During the same period the number of letters had increased from 3,500,000 to 7,000,000, and the number of post offices in the country from 843 to 2,197. The population, also, had nearly doubled in the same period. The increase of growth in a young colony like this went on not at an arithmetical, but a geometrical rate. The Confederation would take away the languor of dependence upon England which had hitherto paralysed the divided Governments. Having clearly shown that his exaggerated estimate of liabilities which he had set down at £210,000 a year, including the principal and sinking fund and any possible extra charge, would be more than counterbalanced by a yearly increasing revenue, and amply supported by growing wealth, he would proceed to state the provisions of the Bill. In the first place, it would enable the Treasury to guarantee interest at 4 per cent on £3,000,000, to be strictly appropriated to the construction of a line adopted by the Canadian Parliament and approved by Her Majesty. But the guarantee would not be given by the Treasury unless the Canadian Parliament had, within two years, passed Acts—first, for the construction of the line; secondly, for its constant use at all times for the conveyance of troops of Her Majesty; thirdly, for the prevention of any charges on the Consolidated Fund and security of the whole of the charge in respect of the loan on Canadian revenue; and lastly—he wished particularly to call attention to this—for the postponing, in order of security, of any other charge for any public works undertaken by the Canadian Government. Whatever public works might be from this time undertaken by the colony, to be charged on their revenue, such charge must come after the charge for the guarantee of £3,000,000, after the charge for the sinking fund, and after any extra sum which might be necessary to be raised by the Canadian Government for the completion of the railroad. A more complete and sure guarantee for the speedy and faithful completion of the railway could not, in his opinion, be framed. All the local as well as the central governing bodies of Canada, would unite in urging on the rapid completion of the scheme, in order that the revenue of the country might be at their command for the furtherance of other works. Objectors to the scheme had magnified the possibility of unfortunate contingencies in the future fate of Canada. They had said that the new scheme of Confederation was an experiment, and that it was impossible to tell whether Canada would be independent in the course of a few years, or be annexed to the United States. But such gratuitous considerations as these should not, in his opinion, weigh with the Committee. If Canada were ever annexed to the United States, which this Confederation would render most improbable, our separations would take place either amicably or hostilely. If amicably, Canada's liabilities would be taken by her new connections with Canada's assets. If it were attempted to wrest Canada from the mother country by the sword, England must trust to success in war for the power to make terms at its conclusion. Upon this point he wished to offer one remark. If England desired that Canada should remain with her—and he, for his part, hoped that the two would long be connected—the way to bind their interests was by taking a liberal view of any common enterprise. If Canada were one of the United States at the present time, they would not have to apply to the Central Government for a guarantee—Congress would furnish the required means as for a national undertaking. The right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) appeared to doubt that statement; but there could be no doubt that this railway would be of far more value to the United States, if Canada were joined to them, than the Great Pacific Railway, for the opening of the far West, and they knew what Congress was doing for that. How unwise, then, would it be for England to disappoint the expectations which successive Home Governments had raised among Canadians with respect to this guarantee. He would make no further observations with respect to the risks and contingencies conjured up by objectors to the measure; they were all infinitesimal in character, and to the last degree improbable, if not wholly chimerical.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury be authorized to guarantee interest, at a rate not exceeding four per centum per annum, on any principal money, not exceeding £3,000,000 sterling, to be raised by Loan by the Government of Canada for the construction of a Railway connecting Quebec and Halifax."—(Mr. Adderley.)

Mr. AYTOUN said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman's remark that he had the greatest possible dislike to guarantees was a very extraordinary introduction to an argument in favour of this particular guarantee, notwithstanding he had spoken of it as one of exceptional character, calculated greatly to benefit the colony. A very weighty objection to the Motion was that guarantees were diametrically opposed to principles of political economy. It had been said that this guarantee would not entail any loss to this country; but he should not be at all surprised if England had eventually to pay every penny of it. But whether she did or not, the proposition was unsound in principle and unfair to the taxpayers. At the present time money was exceedingly dear, railways at home were in difficulties from want of money, some having to pay 6 per cent for it. It would be a great advantage to them if they could get money at low interest and a Government guarantee; yet the Government denied them relief, and made English taxpayers liable for the debts of colonial undertakings. The proposal was totally contrary to the policy by which those on the chief Opposition Benches had gained their reputation, yet he was afraid that they also had given their consent to the scheme. It had been said that the Colonial Office had given pledges that almost amounted to a convention to do this thing; but he protested against the House of Commons being bound in matters of money by any such promises. He maintained that in a commercial and military point of view it was not expedient to depart from principle and grant a guarantee in the particular instance of that railway. The trade of Canada naturally flowed through the St. Lawrence, and its products were so bulky that they could not be advantageously conveyed by railway. An experienced railway engineer had stated that the line could never possibly pay one farthing. Then, in a military point of view, it would not only not be beneficial, but would be positively injurious to accede to this proposal, because it would hold out hopes to the colonists which it would not be in our power to fulfil. That railway traversed several hundred miles of country, and a portion of it passed in a line parallel with the St. Lawrence, at a very short distance from the United States frontier. It would be easy for the Americans, if they ever had the desire to invade Canada—which he hoped they never would have—to advance a force sufficient to cut the line and render it perfectly useless. We had difficulty enough already in obtaining an adequate supply of recruits for our army.

We could never send out the forces requisite to protect that railway, or to cope with the enormous masses of men that would be thrown across the American frontier, if the United States ever seriously contemplated the invasion of Canada. Moreover, troops alone would not suffice for such a purpose. He believed the late Duke of Wellington had said that if they had not the command of the Lakes they could never defend Canada. We had now on those Lakes three gunboats, each with a crew of thirty-five men and an armament of one gun. The Americans had six vessels of double the tonnage of ours. The question was, which nation could increase its armament in the shortest time? It would be in the power of the United States Government to bring from their arsenals and sea-ports vessels of war, guns, and stores, and everything requisite for the speedy construction and equipment of a fleet, and thus obtain the command of the Lakes. He would be glad to hear from the Under Secretary of the Colonies in what manner he thought it was possible, under such circumstances, to prevent our flag from being driven from the Lakes of America within one year. They were asked to construct railways to convey troops when they had no troops to send and no fortresses in which troops could be concentrated. It would be of no use sending troops unless there were fortifications. Quebec was a strongly fortified city, and had been called by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) "the door of Canada;" and a proposal had also been made to fortify a strong position on the Lakes; but the defence of the country would have to be left to the colonists. Would the right hon. Gentleman tell them whether any military men of eminence were of opinion that it was possible to defend Canada, with their reasons for their opinion, and the amount of force they thought would be sufficient? The House had not been put in possession of such information; neither had they positive information in regard to the estimated cost of the proposed railway. The right hon. Gentleman had made a statement with regard to several lines; but he did not tell them that any line had been fixed upon. The House should be satisfied that no other guarantee would be required, and that no further cost should be incurred. The line was not fixed upon because the Parliament of Canada—that was to meet next year—was to fix upon the line to be adopted.

MR. ADDERLEY: I mentioned that there are three lines from which the selection is to be made, and that the plans are in the Library.

MR. AYTOUN: But we do not know which of them is to be the line fixed upon.

MR. ADDERLEY: I have mentioned the most expensive.

MR. AYTOUN said, they should have an estimate of the cost for each particular line, and the basis on which the estimate was founded. He objected to the proposal of the Government because the proposed line would be useless in a commercial point of view, and worse than useless as a means of defence, and because they were not in possession of the estimated cost of the works to be constructed. He begged to move, as an Amendment, that the Resolution proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary be rejected.

MR. THOMAS CAVE said, he had enjoyed considerable experience with reference to the cost of railways, and begged to second this Motion. He begged to explain that he had some local knowledge of the place through which the proposed line would pass. He had listened with attention to the right hon. Gentleman, and was quite unable, with his experience on the subject, to agree with him. The only advantage he could see in the whole thing was that it would be a colossal job. He did not mean to say it would be a job on the part of the right hon. Gentleman or on the part of the Government; but from his knowledge of the conduct of the colonists and of the local authorities, he believed it would be a job for them—not merely during the period over which it was proposed to extend the construction of the railway, but for a generation at least. He believed that most of the stations led from nowhere to nowhere—and most of the residences referred to along the line were wooden huts. The circulating medium was greatly made up of grain, meat, and poultry, and he did not envy the ticket porters. The Colonial Government originally proposed that they should not only pay for the construction of the line, but work it. The projectors must know that it would never pay its working expenses at all, and that in a few years they would pass out of existence as a railway company, whatever guarantee might be given. The right hon. Gentleman said that this proposal was part of the Confederation scheme. He did not see the connection. The right hon. Gentleman said the Canadian Government could not borrow money under 6 per cent. That should be a proof to any man's mind that the security they offered was not good. Representing taxpayers of England, he could not see the advantage of guaranteeing a loan for men who could not raise money under 6 per cent, and he very much doubted if they could raise it at that amount. The right hon. Gentleman said that it would make the Canadians independent of the United States. He could not see how this country could have such a great interest in so entirely severing the Canadians from the United States. He thought the safety of that country consisted in friendly communication with the United States. Anything that would cause dissension would only provoke the very danger they were always apprehending. What produced most humiliation on the part of Englishmen in communicating with the people of the United States was the weakness of the Canadian frontier. It would be better to have the whole onus of its defence thrown on Canada itself, and no such measure as this so likely to produce the very danger they wished to avoid. If, instead of giving the colony £3,000,000 with the view of separating it from the United States, we were to give £10,000,000 of money to join and unite them, it would be more patriotic. The Americans knew the weakness of our Canadian frontier, and in the time of our trouble they would not forget it. The right hon. Gentleman said in one part of his speech there would be no risk, and in another part he said there would be a minimum risk. He said that Canada had paid a previous debt; but that was what was always done by men wanting to borrow money. They always paid small debts with the view of incurring large debts. The right hon. Gentleman said there was a surplus of income over expenditure in the colony; but if he (Mr. Thomas Cave) knew anything of figures, the reverse was the fact. In the way that some of the balance-sheets of railways were made up it was excessively easy to show anything plainly. He was reminded of his experience in America in connection with certain railways. Speaking to a railway director after dinner, he (Mr. Thomas Cave) complained that he had induced him to invest his money in a certain part of the world on certain promises made in a certain prospectus. To this remark the hon. director replied: "Why, you don't understand it, evidently. When we have to get up a railway, we draw up a prospectus and promise to the European public as much interest as we think they would like to get. We put down the estimated population between the two points, and we make the first issue of shares, and get the money." He (Mr. Thomas Cave) begged to remark that this director did not state to him what he (Mr. Thomas Cave) afterwards heard, that the director bought the land between the two places and sold it at an enormous profit. He (Mr. Thomas Cave) did not mean to say that these gentlemen would do anything so fearfully wicked. The director further stated that with the prospectus in his hand he applied to London financial men, and was able to get enough of money to make one-third of the line. Then he published a statement announcing that in consequence of the difficulties they had to encounter, and the morasses through which they had to pass, they required more money, and proposed to raise it on first mortgage bonds. They always got this money on first mortgage bonds. Then they made another one-third—and, added the director, "We then always leave it to the shareholders and first mortgage bondholders to finish." He (Mr. Thomas Cave) feared that that must really be the result of this proposition. He had been selected as one of four Members of the House to investigate the affairs of the Atlantic and Great Western Railway, and that railway, with all its advantages—being able to carry all it wanted—running through a coal-field, and having its own coals—cost £24,000 a mile. He did not say all that money had been spent on the line; part of the money had been spent in jobbery; but there was jobbery in all parts of the world, and there might be jobbery on the railway they were going to make. In seconding the rejection of the Resolution he must express his belief that this money was nothing more nor less than lush-money.

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friends who have just addressed the House have both spoken with great ability. My hon. Friend who spoke last, especially, has made good use, and very naturally, of the authority which belongs to his American experience for the purpose of discrediting a proposal which does not, I think, fall exactly within the category which he has described. Of course, upon the question of the natural obstacles in the way of the commercial success of this railway, it would be unpardonable presumption on me to enter into a contest with my hon. Friend. I am not competent to pronounce an opinion on that part of the case. But I may, I think, without detracting from his authority, say, in reply to a charge that this undertaking is tainted by a spirit of jobbery, that it is not a device and contrivance of certain gentlemen meeting together on their own private responsibility, and trusting to their own wits for the purpose of taking in the public. It is a scheme that has had the sanction of a series of free Governments for a long period of years, who, representing a population of our own birth and race, have adopted it as calculated to be beneficial in its results. The amount of authority which may be brought in support of the plan is of such a character, that I do not think we should simply observe the rules of prudence, in the attitude we assume, in the face of the colonies, or that we should be justified, if we set down at zero the whole of the assurances already given, and all the practical steps taken by the responsible authorities of the colonies. Some confidence and trust we must have in the mechanism of free Governments. The devising of this plan has been the work of a long series of years, and now it comes before us with, at any rate, the recommendation which can be drawn from a sanction of that kind. At the same time, the question we have to consider to-night is one entirely different from that of the goodness or badness of this railway as a commercial speculation. Should my hon. Friend be accurate in his estimation of the paying qualities of the railway when he says it will never, or at any rate will not for a long time, discharge its own working expenses, still I hold that it would not be wise in us to enter too minutely into an investigation of that matter. The guarantee which we are asked to give does not relate in any way to the productiveness of this undertaking. It is a guarantee to be given for the Colonial Government, and the safety of that is to be estimated by the credit, revenue, and good faith of that Government. Therefore I am not over-scrupulous with respect to the paying qualities of this railway, and I do not wish to see the debate turn on such a consideration; for then, if the augury of my hon. Friend proved true, we should give an excuse to our fellow-subjects to turn round on us and plead their disappointment and ask for the remission of this debt, which I do not believe they will do. This is a proposal with respect to which the late Government are just as responsible as the present; and therefore I am desirous of taking an early opportunity of stating the view which the late Government took, and which I hope the House will take of this proposal. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman first distinctly stated that neither we nor anybody are entitled to hold a free Parliament engaged or trammelled in any degree by the promises of two Administrations to apply to Parliament for a guarantee in respect of this proposal, which undoubtedly is brought forward in immediate connection with the great scheme already sanctioned by Parliament for the union of the British North-American Colonies. It was always made clear to the colonial authorities that it was not within our power or inclination to fetter the judgment of the House of Commons with respect to the liability to be fixed on the British Exchequer, and therefore I trust that hon. Gentlemen will look at this question with the feeling that they are about to exercise a free, and therefore a responsible judgment. It was always understood that this, which is called a guarantee on a loan to be raised for the construction of a railway, was, in point of fact, a financial transaction in respect to which we have no cognizance of railway companies, or anybody connected with them, but we deal simply with the exchequer of the State about to be created in British North America. I cannot but agree with those who are anxious to draw attention very fully to the serious nature of this proceeding. We may say with truth that we fairly expect that all the engagements about to be contracted with the province of Canada will be rigidly and exactly fulfilled; but it does not follow that the gift which the House is solicited to confer is a nominal or an empty gift. When we pledge the credit of England, we are laying an additional burden on the financial resources of this country. It matters not whether in a particular instance there will or will not be a call for the actual payment of the money. The principle is clear that a guarantee is a real obligation and burden undertaken by us. The real test of that circumstance is this. If, on the same day when in the City of London a large guarantee by the British Government was announced, it likewise happened that the Government had to go into the market and borrow £5,000,000 or £10,000,000 on their own account, they would not be able to raise the money on the same terms as they might have done before the guarantee was known. Therefore, let us not attempt to conceal from ourselves that the guarantee is a real burden. Many things have been said in this discussion in relation to the principles applicable to the military expense of the colony, in which I cannot but agree. The natural interpretation to be given to an expression which fell from the hon. Member for the Fife Burghs (Mr. Aytoun) is that it is to be inferred from this measure that the intention of the Government is to undertake increased responsibility and charge in reference to the military defence of the British North-American Colonies. A sentence, too, fell from my right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley) from which, if criticized minutely, it might be inferred that, whereas Canada is without the means of defence, the construction of this railway is intended to enable this country to make greater efforts and undergo greater sacrifices in the ordinary and usual defence of that country. It appears to me beyond doubt that the construction of this railway will considerably increase the means of military defence or military aid to Canada if a case of necessity should arise. But while I say this, I must add that so far from considering this guarantee as an expression of the will and readiness of any Government of this country, or of Parliament, to undertake additional responsibility with respect to the ordinary work of the defence of the Province of Canada, I place on it exactly an opposite construction; and but for that opposite construction I should find it impossible to justify the proposal now made. I look on this guarantee as a measure auxiliary to the great work of Confederation. It is collateral to that great work the purpose of which is the development of the resources of the colonies, the increase of their wealth and strength, and along with that the gradual and, I trust, the speedy development of their self-reliance. I do not conceal from myself that we have been for a long time, to a great extent, in a false position with respect to the condition of colonial defence, and nowhere has it been so seriously exhibited as on the Canadian frontier. If Canada is to be defended, the main element and power in the defence must always be the energy of a free people fighting for their own liberties. That is the centre around which alone the elements of defence can be gathered, and the real responsibility for the defence must lie with the people themselves. But we have had a colonial system, which attempts have been of late made to modify, the characteristic of which was to throw the whole responsibility for defence not only on the Exchequer, but on the mind and thought of this country, and to place on our military department the charge and expense of the military service for the colonies, just as much as if those colonies were a portion of the three kingdoms, and just as if they were not inhabited by an intelligent and free population. The escape from a false position of that kind is no easy matter. You cannot do it by a simple arbitrary modification of your military system. You must look to giving a higher civil and political position to these communities themselves. Much has been done in that way. We have for a full quarter of a century acknowledged absolutely the right of self-government in the colonies. But while we have made great advance in that sense, we have made very little advance with regard to many of the legitimate consequences of that position. It is impossible to conceive anything more complete than our acknowledgment of those rights of self-government. We do not expect the laws of Canada or of Australasia to be modelled according to our own ideas. We grant them a greater freedom from interference than as amongst the three kingdoms the Legislature grants to the peculiar ideas that may happen to prevail in one of those three. We have carried it to this point, that as far as regards the Administration, I believe it may be said that the only officer appointed by the Colonial Secretary is the Governor; and I believe there cannot be a doubt that if it were the well-ascertained desire of the colonies to have the appointment of their own Governor, the Imperial Parliament would at once make over to them that power. We have gone further: because if there is any one thing which we are entitled to insist upon as a limit to that self-government, it is that British merchandise should enter into these provinces upon certain terms; but instead of that, the assent of the Queen has been given to Acts imposing duties of 10, 15, 20, and 25 per cent upon products of English industry entering Canada. These, Sir, are very serious matters, and I hope that their very magnitude will secure for them attention according to their gravity and importance. How are we to rectify what requires rectification in our relations with British North America? I must say we are in the path of reason and prudence as well as equity and liberality. We have passed a measure by the unanimous assent of the House, and with a promptitude which if it had been a matter of legislation affecting ourselves would have been precipitancy. But when one thinks it was an acknowledgment of the title of these colonies to deal practically with their own affairs—with a speed of which there is hardly an example—we have passed a measure for uniting these colonies together, and we hope—nay, I feel confident—that the result of that measure will be the development along that great extent of territory of a stronger sense of political existence, more self-reliance, and more self-relying habits. For we must not conceal it from ourselves, that if up to this time the sentiments of British North Americans with regard to self-defence has to some extent separated the burdens of freedom from the spirit of freedom the fault has been mainly ours. It was the overshadowing power and design and determination of this country which formed our colonial system by placing on us the responsibility of its defence. We have to bring about a different state of things. The best way to do it is to raise their political position to the very highest point we can possibly bring it, in order that with that elevated position their sense of responsibility may likewise grow. It cannot be too distinctly stated that it is in this light that we look upon the plan for uniting the Provinces of British North America. The evil which attends the old system, casting the burden of the responsibility of colonial defence wholly, or almost wholly, on this country, is not to be measured by the amount of pecuniary drain on our resources. Even if we were so to look at it it is a very serious thing. If we were to reckon and apportion the charge of our military Estimates occasioned by keeping a British force in these provinces it would startle many hon. Members. It is a very heavy charge indeed; and it is our duty in every way to get rid of it. But the evil in this particular case is by no means limited by that view. The system of vicarious defence—the system of having the burden of its frontier defence borne by another—enervates and depresses the tone of the country in which it prevails; and its withdrawal is necessary in order to bring the country to the full possession and enjoyment of freedom. Nay, more, in this instance who can doubt that the defence of the colonial frontier mainly by the force, and wholly on the responsibility of England has been recently a source of actual danger to Canada? Does any man believe that that most wicked outrage—hardly, I think, to be paralleled in the annals of piracy itself—the Fenian invasion of Canada, would ever have taken place if it had not been known that there was precisely the same power of wounding British honour through the medium of some success vainly hoped for against British troops as in case of an invasion of Great Britain herself? It is not necessary to pursue this line of remark. That illustration is a sufficient demonstration that for Canada to take on herself, as circumstances shall open themselves, the management and control of her whole frontier will be not only a means of raising her position in the world by the fulfilment of the duties of freedom, but it will be an escape from actual peril. I know of no objection that can be urged to the contemplation of a gradual, yet, I hope, speedy change of that kind, unless it be the idea that when you cease to take upon this country the ordinary burden of defence for the colonies you weaken the tie between them and the mother country. Now, when I have stated that it seems essential that British North America should largely undertake not only the charge but the responsibility of her own defence, I do not mean to say that in the event of the occurrence of danger the arm of this country would be shortened, or the disposition of this country to use its resources freely and largely in aid of that colony would be in the slightest degree impaired. On the other hand, my belief is that there would be no bounds to the efforts which this country would make for the purpose of aiding and supporting the North-American Provinces in their willing and energetic efforts to maintain their connection with this country. But that is a totally different thing from saying that this connection is to be maintained by the expenditure of large sums of money from the British Treasury, either by way of pomp and display in the colony or by way of attracting favour there by a lavish charge. No, Sir; the connection of this country with the British colonies is to be maintained on totally opposite principles. If there are those who think that the expenditure of money through the means of little standing armies kept in the colonies is to be the security for the maintenance of colonial connection, I ask why not do that with Australia? Has our connection with Australia been in the slightest degree weakened by the almost total withdrawal of British troops from the colony? The connection between this country and her colonies is not a selfish and sordid connection, and ought not to be so on one side or the other. No; it is at once a connection of interest, of honour, feeling, and duty. That feeling is never more recognised than at the present moment; and the more it is understood that there we are to look for the basis of the connection the more secure that connection is likely to be. These are the views that appear to me applicable to the present case. It is not administration, it is not interference, it is not imposing burdens on the colonies in any shape, to which we now look for maintaining our influence there and preserving the colonies as parts of the Empire. But if this be so—if our demands on them, such as they used to be, have been not reduced and diminished, but long ago abandoned, then undue demands on the other hand should not be made on the people of this country—more especially unjust and undue demands—as they do not belong to us and are mischievous, not more to us than to the people of the colonies themselves. This, Sir, is opening a very wide political discussion; but it is only by a survey of that field that the key to a measure of this kind can be obtained. It is not fair to say, how can you connect the construction of this railway with the development of these sentiments in the colonies—the creation of habits of self-reliance and the growth of the full tone of freedom? The ground on which it may be supported is this—that following the sentiments and convictions of the colonists themselves, this plan for the construction of a railway, for which we are now asked to guarantee a loan to the Colonial Government, has been associated with and incorporated in the scheme of Confederation itself. Consider it with reference to this scheme of Confederation, and if you believe the objects of that Confederation are such as are vitally important and beneficial to the relations of this country with our North-American Colonies, give the benefit of that consideration to the proposal now made. It is only on grounds of that kind that I support the proposal before the House. The general system of colonial guarantees is one which has come into just discredit within the walls of Parliament; and I would hope that only motives of the highest order will induce any money, to enter into a particular form of Government is fraught with this evil, that we represent ourselves to them and to the world as taking a peculiar interest in the manner in which they choose to regulate their internal affairs and their relations with the United States. Now that we have given them self-government, let them manage their affairs their own way, and do not let us make ourselves responsible for the manner in which they regulate their internal or foreign relations. The management of our own affairs is quite sufficient for us without our mixing ourselves up in matters with which we have no concern, and over which we do not for a moment profess to exercise the slightest control. I think the reason given by the hon. Member for Barnstable (Mr. Thomas Cave) against entering into this arrangement is of immense cogency. We are setting up this Confederation—or, at least, we shall not be acquitted of such an intention in the eyes of America—as a rival to the United States. ["No, no!"] It is said that we are setting up the Confederation in order that they may defend themselves against aggression; but I say that we are setting them up as a rival to the United States. ["No, no!"] To my mind nothing could be more foolish or more unworthy of us as a nation than such an attempt; while, at the same time, nothing could be more fatal or more ridiculous than such an act on our part. I am not going to repeat all that I have said on previous occasions upon this subject, as to the absurdity of thinking that we can defend these colonies against any attack by the United States; but I must repeat that I object to any step being taken that can be construed into a sort of challenge or defiance to the United States, or that would lead them to suppose that we contemplate by any act, by making a railway, or by any other job, to make these colonies a match for them. You have on the one hand a country like Canada, using the word in its new sense, with 1,500 miles of frontier, and a population of 3,800,000, and do you think you can make her a match for the United States, with its population of 35,000,000, merely by the aid of a few thousand men, whom, in all probability, in the event of a war you would not be able to send to her assistance? The idea is the most ridiculous and chimerical that can possibly be. It is because this scheme does point in this direction, it is because the ominous word

"defence" is mixed up with it, that I more especially object to this House being dragged into this guarantee. The position I wish to maintain with regard to the American colonies is to do our duty towards them as far as in us lies, but not to undertake impossibilities. We are in America somewhat in the position of the Plantagenets in France about the time that the French Monarchy was consolidated—namely, encumbered with large dominions which a mistaken sense of honour forbade them to get rid of, although unable to defend them. What we ought to do is to cultivate the most peaceful relations with the United States, and for that purpose we should abstain from taking any measures which could be construed by that country into a hostile attitude. We are not able to carry it out, and therefore had better not attempt it. We are at peace now with the United States, and my hope is that Canada may be preserved from invasion by that country—in the first place, by the good sense and moderation of the people of that country, and next by a similar reason that would prevent Italy invading Norway—namely, by the climate. I hope the House will consider seriously the step they are about to take, and that if they determine to enter upon this step they will put in this Bill some very stringent securities to provide that the money spent under our guarantee shall be applied to the purpose for which it is voted, and that it shall not stick to any one's fingers in its progress to this charming railway that is to be constructed. Agreeing as I do mainly in principle with my right hon. Friend, I submit that I draw the more logical inferences of the two. Our principles are common; our conclusions are exactly contrary. It is for the House to judge which conclusions are better founded. I was examined before a Committee of the House of Commons three or four years ago on the military defence of the colonies, and I made an observation, which I beg to repeat—

"In the time of the American Revolution the colonies separated from England because she insisted on taxing them. What I apprehend as likely to happen now is that England will separate from her colonies because they insist on taxing her."

MR. WATKIN said, that in following the right hon. Gentleman he felt very much as a quiet Roman citizen must have done on passing the chief gladiator in the street—inclined to pass over to the other side, and to have nothing to say to him for fear of the consequences. But some years ago he was requested by the late Duke of Newcastle to make inquiries, which convinced him that the hobgoblin fears expressed that night in regard to the construction of this 375 miles of railway were unfounded. Let hon. Members remember that Her Majesty's American dominions extended over an area equal to one-eighth of the habitable globe. This railway gave us communication not only with Canada, and with 10,000 miles of American railways, but with the vast tract of British territory extending across to the Pacific. The consequence of making this railway would be that two days would be saved in going from England to the Northern Continent of America, including the great corn-growing district of the west. If the House had seen, as he had seen, the Canadian Volunteers turn out in bitter weather to repel a threatened invasion without a red coat near them, they would think that the right hon. Gentleman's taunts might have been spared. The British provinces had taxed themselves £360,000 a year for the execution of their portion of those works which Lord Durham had proposed in 1838, with the object of binding together by the means of physical communication the varied sections of the Queen's American dominions. The evidence of every military man, including Sir John Michell, the present Commander-in-Chief in Canada, was that this railway was absolutely necessary for the military defence of the colonies. It was, however, to be defended not merely on that ground, but on that of its great commercial advantage. There were now in the Government offices memorials from many of the large towns in the three kingdoms concurring in the commercial necessity and advantage of the measure which the House was now asked to agree to. Therefore, originating as it did with Lord Durham, sanctioned as it was by Lord Grey's proposals of 1851, adopted by the late and the present Government, demanded for purposes of defence, as also for the more genial and generous objects of commerce and of peace, he hoped the House would support the construction of the railway by a guarantee which would not cost this country a shilling.

MUTINY BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir John Pakington.)

Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished, before the Speaker left the Chair, to make a few remarks generally on the way in which this Bill had always been treated by successive Governments. He was far from imputing blame to the present Administration, who had merely followed the example of their predecessors; but he must blame on public grounds the habit that had grown up and been followed for a long series of years of treating with neglect one of the most important Bills that could be passed by Parliament. It was regarded at the Revolution as the very foundation of the liberties of Englishmen, and was estimated as the great bulwark of the Constitution; but in modern times it was treated as a mere matter of form, with no greater respect than an old almanack. Upon the principle that they should not look a gift horse in the mouth it was put before them on official authority, as if they were to swallow everything wholesale that might be tendered them at the hands of the officials. So much was this the case, that it was considered as a great favour when consent was given by the late Administration to place a few copies in the Vote Office to make this Bill accessible to Members. Last year his attention had been roused by a particular clause in the Bill, and he thought it his duty to look through it, and it was only by making a vigorous complaint that the Bill, which was not then printed, was made available to Members. Why should such a measure be treated in this cursory manner, when even a turnpike Bill was printed and circulated before the second reading? On many occasions the Bill had not been in print when the House was called upon to pass its early stages, and such conduct he considered was derogatory to the House. The officials had treated the Bill as a mere form. They produced it as they liked, and the question arose, were the officials superior to that House? The great office which had been established in Pall Mall, at a cost to the country of £200,000 a year, appeared to be under no control, and transacted its business in a manner no one could understand. The War Office was originally intended to act as a check upon the Horse Guards; but it appeared that the Secretary at War was nothing else but the humble servant of the Horse Guards. They could not tell at that moment with whom the chief command of the army rested, and all that they knew was that the authority of that House was almost set aside. A Motion was carried in that House the other day for the abolition of military flogging, and with what degree of respect was it treated? The Secretary for War (Sir John Pakington) announced that no manner of notice would be taken of it, and that everything would go on in the usual way. Since that he had heard that the right hon. Gentleman had not even the authority of the Horse Guards to make that announcement to the House. The right hon. Gentleman would be able to tell them how that was; but, if so, it was a very grave affair, and showed that the co-ordinate authorities were not in harmony with each other. The Mutiny Bill was generally passed at a late hour of the night and went through its succeeding stage next day. He contended that it should be circulated amongst Members in the usual way, and that proper intervals should take place between its different stages.

MR. HADFIELD said, he quite concurred in the complaint made by the hon. Gentleman as to the non-distribution of the Bill. He believed the reason given was that it was to save the expense of a few additional copies, and the Yearly Indemnity Bill was treated in the same way. At present the arrangement was that the Bill was printed and deposited in the office, where a copy might be had by any Member who applied for it; but they were not distributed like other Bills, though in his opinion none that came before the House deserved more serious consideration than the Mutiny Bill. The passing it was a mere farce. He was glad that the flogging clause was to be modified.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he entirely concurred with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, and with his hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Darby Griffith), with regard to the great Constitutional importance of the Mutiny Bill; and he could assure his hon. Friend that he had not the slightest wish to treat the House with anything like disrespect, or to undervalue the importance of the question. He would remind his hon. Friend that the Mutiny Bill was introduced, if he was not mistaken, before he had entered upon his present office, and his experience was so short that it could hardly be expected that he should make any change in the usual practice. He believed his hon. Friend would find that the mode in which this Bill had been introduced in the present year was exactly in accordance with the practice of former years. The noble Lord opposite, who held the same position in the late Government, would confirm him when he said that the Mutiny Bill was not treated like other Bills, only because, year after year, it was, with some slight alterations, essentially the same Bill. [THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Hear, hear!] His hon. Friend had expressed some strong opinions as to the present relations between the War Office and the Horse Guards, having gone so far as to say that the Secretary of State for War was subordinate to the Horse Guards. Speaking from a very brief experience, he would say that his hon. Friend had taken a very erroneous view of the actual powers of the two Departments.

On Question that the Preamble be postponed,

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that what he meant when he spoke of the relations between the War Office and the Horse Guards was that it was difficult for the House and the country to understand which was responsible. He had spoken of the two Departments as co-ordinate, not of the War Office being subordinate.

Clause 6 (Power to constitute Courts Martial).

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to take that opportunity of noticing a fallacy which prevailed very much in military minds—namely, that it was by reason of the prerogative of the Crown that the power of the Sovereign over the army was established. That was not so. It was established by express Act of Parliament, without which the Crown could not make Articles of War or order courts martial.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (Powers of Regimental or Detachment Courts Martial).

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON moved the addition of the following words:—

"but no sentence of corporal punishment awarded by a Regimental Court Martial shall, except in the case of mutiny or aggravated insubordination next hereinafter mentioned, be put in execution in time of peace without the leave in writing of the General or other officer commanding the district or station in which the Court may be held."

MR. WHITBREAD said, he objected to the use of the words "aggravated insubordination," and he proposed to substitute "insubordination accompanied with personal violence." He did not think it would be an answer to say that "aggravated insubordination" was a technical term in use at courts martial. It was doubtful whether the term had a strict and well-defined interpretation even there. But as this was one of the three offences for which flogging was to be inflicted in time of peace, the House and the country ought to know distinctly what was meant by it. The words he proposed did not admit of a wrong interpretation. Taking into account the views held in the army with respect to flogging, he admitted that the concession made by the right hon. Baronet was a liberal one. He felt, however, that the definition of this particular offence ought to be put down in black and white, so that the most illiterate person might understand it. If the words, "insubordination accompanied with personal violence," were adopted, while he did not abate one jot of his opinions on the subject of flogging, he should be no party to pressing the matter further.

MR. MOWBRAY said, that the Government would meet the hon. Member in the spirit in which he had proposed his Amendment. The phrase hitherto used had always been "gross insubordination." That was nothing but a vituperative epithet. [MR. OSBORNE: And so is "aggravated insubordination."] He admitted that there was some vagueness about it, and would therefore accept the words proposed by the hon. Member.

Mr. Darby Griffith

MR. HORSMAN said, he would suggest the postponement of the clause. The question to be hereafter raised was whether corporal punishment in time of peace ought to be discontinued; but this clause anticipated the question. He thought it would be better to postpone this clause till after the new clause to be proposed by the Secretary at War had been discussed. As the question stood the House had expressed its opinion that flogging in the army should be abolished, and the clause if adopted would be inconsistent with that vote.

COLONEL NORTH said, he thought it would be better to postpone the clause. He hoped that before the Bill passed every officer and soldier in the army would know for what offences flogging might be inflicted.

MAJOR JERVIS said, he was of opinion that the Committee should not hastily postpone the consideration of the clause. There was no necessity to postpone it as it related to courts martial to be held in time of war, whereas the other clause referred to time of peace.

Clause postponed.

Clause 11 (Courts Martial on Line of March or in Troop Ships, &c.) postponed.

Clauses 12 to 21, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 22 (Power to inflict Corporal Punishment and Imprisonment).

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON rose to move that Clause 22 be omitted, in order to substitute the clause of which he had given notice.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the proper course would be for the right hon. Gentleman to say "No" to the proposal that Clause 22 should stand part of the Bill, and that the clause he proposed to substitute for it should be brought up as a new clause at the end of the Bill.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I propose to vote against retaining this clause in the Bill, and when the remaining clauses have been disposed of I shall move the insertion of another of which I have given notice. I take this step with the full concurrence of the Commander-in-Chief. In the course of my communications with his Royal Highness, I have found that nothing could exceed the sincerity of the desire entertained by him to show every deference to the views which have been expressed by the House of Commons upon this subject, so far as such views are consistent with his paramount duty as the officer charged with maintaining discipline in the Queen's army. I was very sorry to hear from my hon. Friend (Mr. Darby Griffith) during the earlier part of this evening that I am open to the charge of having treated the decision of the House with disrespect. I hope that is not the general opinion of the House; for, in taking the course I have, nothing was further from my intention. The House had arrived, by a majority of 1, at the decision to abolish altogether the practice of flogging in the army in time of peace; and it became my duty upon a subsequent evening to state that upon so important a question the Government could not look upon a majority of 1 in a House of 215 Members as a final decision of the House of Commons upon this question. As it was therefore necessary to give the House an opportunity for re-considering the point, I thought the easiest and most courteous method of doing so would be to retain the clause in the Bill, and I gave the most public notice possible of my intention, in order that hon. Gentlemen might have an opportunity of again raising the question. But, although I have since stated that I intended to retain the clause in the same form as it is now before the House, I was not aware, and I believe few are, that the clause in the Bill differed from the Queen's regulations upon the subject. That I thought was a state of things hardly defensible, and resolving to abandon the clause, I considered how I could frame a clause which would at once satisfy the House and those officers who were charged with the discipline of the army and at the same time be consistent with the Queen's regulations. The desire to get rid of this punishment must exist with us all, for notwithstanding the majority in favour of abolishing the punishment was represented by a single vote and the decision a matter of chance, I could not help thinking as I listened to the debate which preceded the division that there existed a strong and conscientious opinion among a large number of hon. Gentlemen that the discipline of the army could be maintained without resorting to flogging. I have therefore resolved to propose the clause which I have placed upon the paper. It makes large concessions, and I trust the House will deliberately consider it. In the course of the debate I was much struck with the very generally expressed opinion that if flogging were abolished some other punishment must be instituted. I watched anxiously, but in vain, for the mention of some substitute. The only alternative I heard suggested, was that dismissal should be substituted for flogging. I speak before military men, who I confess are far better judges than I can be of such a matter; but I must express my belief that if you trust to dismissal from the army as a substitute for the punishment of flogging you will find it wholly inadequate, and at the same time you will incur the danger of men committing offences with a view to incur the punishment of dismissal. Under these circumstances, and after consultation with his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and other authorities in the army, and with their full concurrence, I have made two concessions which I hope the House will deem to be large concessions. I apprehend there will be no difference as to retaining the present law with respect to an army in the field in time of war. I therefore only propose changes with reference to punishment in the army in time of peace. The changes I propose are twofold. The first is that corporal punishment shall be limited to three offences of the gravest character—namely, mutiny, aggravated insubordination, and disgraceful conduct of an indecent kind. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) wishes to change the language I have used with regard to the offence of insubordination. I was assured that the word "aggravated" would lead to no difficulty, as they are technical terms and well understood in the army. But the words suggested by the hon. Member are more clear, and I have no objection to their being adopted. I propose that corporal punishment shall be limited to the three offences enumerated in the clause. There is another concession involved which I consider to be of a still larger character, and the House will see that it is a material change. It is that soldiers in the first class shall be exempted from corporal punishment altogether. I am quite aware that in making this proposal I am going further than many officers feel to be safe. They would retain the power of punishing even first-class soldiers for certain offences. My opinion is that, on the whole, it would be better to draw a broad line, and to enact that no man shall be subjected to corporal punishment until by his own misconduct he has degraded himself to the second class. At this time there are 170,448 soldiers of the first and 17,142 of the second class, so that 91 per cent of the whole army consists of men of the first class, who, under the proposed change, will be exempt from corporal punishment. The House will believe that in making these proposals we have endeavoured to show deference to its expressed opinion. The concessions cannot be regarded as otherwise than large in character; and I confess that, while giving credit for praiseworthy motives, I feel some little disappointment that they have not proved satisfactory to hon. Gentlemen opposite. In these few words I have explained to the House the changes I propose, and I shall have an opportunity of answering inquiries. Considering the immense importance of the discipline of the army, the great concession we now propose to make the decided opinion of many experienced officers that corporal punishment should be retained, and, I may add, the desire of many well-conducted soldiers that it should be retained, I hope a decided majority of the House will sanction the proposals I have now the honour to submit.

MR. OTWAY said, the question was strictly as to Clause 22; but the right hon. Gentleman had discussed the clause he proposed to substitute, and he therefore inferred that he might discuss not only the clause to be substituted, but his own Amendment to it. It was with considerable regret he felt compelled to press that Amendment, because he fully admitted that the right hon. Gentleman had in a fair spirit announced concessions by no means inconsiderable. He gratefully acknowledged the courtesy with which not only the right hon. Gentleman but all his Colleagues treated all those who differed from them. But to his mind this question went beyond considerations of courtesy. The clause as he proposed to amend it, by making it declare that no soldier should be subjected to corporal punishment, would initiate a policy capable of acting most beneficially on the British army. But, by the clause as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, an unnecessary and undeserved stigma would still be attached to the army. In the amended clause of the right hon. Gentleman there were matters which he did not think the Committee could possibly agree to. He had introduced an offence not previously named in the Mutiny Act, and he had most unnecessarily cast a reflection on the whole army by making an offence of an indecent character specifically a military offence. Another objection was that the smallest punishment a civilian convicted of such an offence could receive was fourteen years' penal servitude, and yet it was proposed to make an exception in favour of the soldier, who was to be punished by the infliction of fifty lashes. Having due regard to the honour of the military profession, the House could hardly pass the clause with these words in it. He had no objection to the proposal that every soldier of the first class should, for certain offences to be specified in the Articles of War, be degraded to the second class; but he thought the word "degraded" was not a good or happy expression. It was important that the offences should be specified; because the number of offences that were visited with corporal punishment had increased from three to seventeen since 1833. Then a question arose as to the process by which a soldier was to be "degraded?" Was it to be on the authority and by the power of the commanding officer, or was it to be by a military tribunal? The expression "an army in the field" was vague and uncertain, and not recognised by law. It might be a corn-field or a coal-field. As the preamble of the Bill spoke of "time of peace," the corresponding expression ought to be "time of war," or "active service." The use of the word "misbehaviour" seemed tautological when the offences were specified. He would now ask the Committee to consider his proposal. The right hon. Gentleman had made some remarks with reference to the small majority by which the Motion was carried the other evening; but he might remind the House that many of the most important measures ever passed in Parliament had been carried by a majority of 1, and it was a remarkable circumstance that the clause for flogging in the Mutiny Act was only carried by a majority of 2 in a House of 90 Members, in 1863 or 1864. The right hon. Gentleman ought not, therefore, to taunt hon. Members about the smallness of the majority the other night. He should ask the Committee to vote for the Amendment which he was about to propose, because they would be thereby supporting their own decision. He should propose to omit all the words after "flogging," and the clause would then be in exact accordance with the previous vote of the House. He did not see how any Member who had voted upon that occasion in favour of the Resolution could, without the greatest inconsistency, decline to support his Amendment. If the right hon. Gentleman would accept that Amendment, and would bring up a Resolution for the purpose of regulating the punishments to be awarded to soldiers when engaged in active operations, and while being conveyed on the sea in merchant vessels, he would meet with no unreasonable opposition on the part of Members of the House. He wished to say a few words on the subject of corporal punishment, though before doing so he wished to dismiss a question of a more personal character. He had noticed with some surprise, and with great regret, that on each occasion on which the subject of corporal punishment had been discussed the name of the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief had been most unduly and unnecessarily introduced. When he brought forward the question he had refrained from mentioning the name of the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, not only because he felt convinced that his Royal Highness would be as much disposed as any man in that House to abolish flogging if he thought the discipline of the army could be maintained without it, but also because he was of opinion that the introduction of the name of the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief into a discussion in that House on a question of military policy was a most injudicious and a most unfair proceeding. When the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State (Sir John Pakington), and the right hon. and gallant General the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), paraded the name of the Commander-in-Chief as being entirely opposed to the abolition of flogging, could it be for one moment supposed that would not have an effect upon officers commanding regiments, and those in active service? There was not one who looked for promotion or favour at the Horse Guards who would not be influenced by it. ["No, no!"] Well, if not, military men must be very different from what he believed them to be, if, when informed that the man who was at the head of their profession entertained most decided opinions on a subject, they immediately set themselves in opposition to those opinions. Their ideas of discipline would of itself lead them to give way, when informed that his Royal Highness was against this or that, and therefore the introduction of his name into a discussion of this kind was unfair to the officers of the army. The opinion of his Royal Highness might probably be made known to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War; but the right hon. Baronet should not come down and give the Committee that opinion to influence them in their decision on a question which they, as the representatives of the people, had a right to discuss on its merits, and on which they were not to be guided in their decision by the opinions entertained by Field-Marshal the Commander-in-Chief. More than that, great and important as was the position of the Commander-in-Chief, the only authority recognised in that House was the authority of the Secretary of State for War, who ought not to shelter himself behind the authority of the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief. Two arguments had been used, in reply to which he desired to say a few words. The right hon. and gallant General (General Peel) had complained the other day of his proposal to make a distinction between a time of peace and a time of war. The answer was, that throughout the whole of the Mutiny Bill, and at the commencement of the clause, that distinction was recognised. Then other hon. Gentlemen had objected that if imprisonment were substituted for corporal punishment extra duty would fall upon the good soldiers, in consequence of the misconduct of the bad. That objection, however, was wholly inconsistent with the argument that corporal punishment was of extremely rare occurrence. But there was an argument against the system beyond all this—one which went to the very root of the difficulty of recruiting our army. Recruiting would never be successful until the profession was raised instead of being degraded in the eyes of the people. Flogging had been abolished in every great army in Europe and America, and why should it be retained in our own? In the division list the other evening he was astonished to find among the minority the name of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole), who not long previously had entertained so high an opinion of the soldiers that he proposed to confer upon them the right of citizenship and a vote. In spite of this, however, the right hon. Gentleman was in favour of putting upon them a stigma which could not be inflicted upon any citizen. ["No!"] Well, it might be in the case of convicts, but he hoped no hon. Gentleman regarded soldiers as convicts. He implored the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) to re-consider even now his position in reference to this question. The right hon. Gentleman had considered it with an unprejudiced mind, and in a fair spirit; and if he carried out his own intentions, he believed he would abolish corporal punishment altogether. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would do so. It should be borne in mind that the question of flogging would not be finally settled, because the Mutiny Act was annually voted, and could not settle a question for ever, like the Reform Bill. This question could only be settled in one way. A new House of Commons was about to be called together, elected, he supposed, by household suffrage. Well, one of the very first acts of the new House of Commons would be to sweep away this corporal punishment, and he should like the present House to have the credit of doing that before they separated. Public opinion, the Press, and, as far as he knew, military authority, was in favour of the abolition of flogging. The hundreds of letters which he had received from every part of the country showed what interest the subject had excited, and all those letters urged him to persevere. He earnestly hoped that when the clause came under consideration the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment of which he had given notice.

COLONEL NORTH said, he was astonished at the remarks made concerning the introduction of the name of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief into the discussion of a question of this nature. It was of the very greatest importance that the opinion of the officer at the head of the army should be known upon such a matter. He was surprised at the opinion given the other night by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Captain Grosvenor), who, after citing his own corps—the First Life Guards—one of the best in the army, said—

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he rose to order. He wished to know whether the Committee were discussing Clause 22 with a view to negating it, or whether they were discussing the whole question of flogging in the army?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the question before the Committee was whether Clause 22 should stand part of the Bill. The Secretary for War (Sir John Pakington) had informed the Committee that it was his intention to say "No" to the Motion, in order that, at the end of the Bill, he might introduce a new clause on the subject of corporal punishment. Clause 22, however, raised the whole question of corporal punishment; and therefore he could not say that hon. Members were out of order in discussing that question, or in referring to what were the intentions of the Secretary for War with regard to the clause he proposed to substitute for the present clause. For the convenience of the Committee, however, he would suggest that Clause 22 should be negated without further discussion, and they could then proceed with the other clauses of the Bill. At the end of the Bill the Secretary for War would propose his new clause, and hon. Members would be able to move the Amendments of which they had given notice, and which were being discussed now, without the possibility of being brought to an issue.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he hoped that the suggestion of the Chairman would be adopted.

Clause 40.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he moved to omit that part of the clause which exempted a soldier from the duty of supporting any relation whom he would be compelled to support if he were not a soldier. The exemption operated mischievously, and put a stigma on soldiers which it was desirable to remove.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that while he appreciated the good feeling evinced by the hon. Baronet, he was bound to resist the proposed alteration.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had now to submit to the Committee the clause which he proposed as a substitute for Clause 22. He substituted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), by which the words "aggravated insubordination" were replaced by the words "insubordination accompanied by personal violence."

(No Soldier of the First Class to be Sentenced to Corporal Punishment).

"Every Soldier shall upon enlistment be placed in the First Class of the Army, and no Soldier in such class shall, in time of peace, be sentenced to the corporal punishment of flogging; every soldier in the First Class shall, for the commission of certain offences, to be specified from time to time in the Articles of War, be degraded to the Second Class of the Army, and every Soldier in the Second Class shall be liable to be sentenced by court martial to corporal punishment, not exceeding fifty lashes, for the following offences—namely, mutiny, insubordination accompanied by personal violence, or disgraceful conduct of an indecent kind; every soldier, when serving with a military force in the field or on board ship shall be liable to a like punishment by court martial for any of the offences before enumerated, or for desertion, drunkenness on duty or on the line of march, misbehaviour, or neglect of duty."

He had already explained his reasons for introducing the clause, and would not therefore again trouble the Committee.

New Clause, instead of Clause 22 (No Soldier of the First Class to be sentenced to corporal punishment,) — (Sir John Pakington,)—brought up, and read the first time.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to ask whether it was really intended that no soldier should be liable to corporal punishment as long as he was in the first class? There were many cases of the worst possible kind of insubordination that might be committed on a line of march, such as instigating a regiment to mutiny or knocking down a commanding officer. He wished to know whether a man who had been guilty of one of those offences was not to be made a signal example of merely because he occupied a place in the first class. He thought there must be some mistake in that.

MR. OSBORNE: Read the end of the clause.

COLONEL NORTH, in continuation, read the concluding portion of the clause, and observed that they ought to be told what was the meaning of the words "misbehaviour or neglect of duty" at the end of the clause. Every soldier knew what was meant by an army in the field; but he wished to know what was to be done in the case of such troops as those at present engaged against the Fenians in Canada or in Ireland; and whether one of those men, if he should have knocked down his commanding officer, was not to be liable to corporal punishment? His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster (Captain Grosvenor) had, on a former occasion, admitted that there were very grave cases of insubordination in the army; but he said that the remedy must be found in something else than the lash. He had been excessively sorry to hear his hon. Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) allude specially to one side of the House, for the question was one, not of party, but of what was best for the benefit of the country. It was said that in the matter of discipline we ought to follow the example of foreign countries. Well, on one occasion when he was at Paris he met a number of troops returning towards the city, which led him to ask whether there had been a review. "Oh, no," was the answer; "we have been to shoot one of our men." For what crime? "For knocking down a non-commissioned officer." Were we to relinquish the system of flogging in the British army and adopt the Continental—of shooting every man who knocked down a non-commissioned officer? Periods of punishment again were punishments not so much of the offender as of the other men who had to perform the extra duty. The example of the Prussian army had been cited; but of what materials was that army composed? Was it likely that in this country regulations would ever be adopted compelling every gentleman to serve whether he liked it or not. A system of voluntary service gave us, of course, very different materials; but it was gratifying to reflect that the non-commissioned officers who issued from the ranks were second to those of no other country for gallantry and conduct. He understood the Secretary of State for War to have said that out of 100 men there were ninety-one of the first class, and nine only of the second. Was it intended that those ninety-one men should, under no circumstances, be liable to corporal punishment?

MR. HEADLAM said, the first observation he had to make was that although the powers conferred by the Mutiny Act were very large with respect to corporal punishment, and the discretion very wide, yet, from his experience while holding the office of Judge Advocate General, he believed that those powers were practically exercised with very great discretion, and that the cases in which flogging was inflicted—assuming such a punishment to be right—were exactly those in which it ought to be administered. The fact was that the powers given by the Mutiny Act had been much limited by the regulations issued under the authority of the Crown, and also by the good sense and discretion of the commanding officers of the different regiments. Those regulations never had the force of law; and he was desirous of mentioning that, because it was asserted that there had been many instances in which men in the first class had been subjected to corporal punishment contrary to the regulations. It was true there had been a few cases of that kind. But they occurred very shortly after the reg-lations were issued, before they had become known, and the cases were very few in number. Wherever he had met with such cases he had of course commented upon them. For all practical purposes, those regulations were strictly enforced in the army. He had not himself officially had the means of ascertaining whether soldiers who were flogged afterwards behaved the better for it, or what was its effect upon the rest of their corps. But he had had the opportunity of conversing on the subject with military men of great experience, and he found them to be nearly unanimous in the opinion that corporal punishment, under some circumstances, was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of the discipline of the army. The cases for which it was inflicted were those in which it appeared, on the face of the transaction, that the men to whom it was administered had no habits of self-control, were exceedingly violent and insubordinate, and very difficult to deal with. Another class of cases in which it was administered was where soldiers had stolen from their own comrades. There was also a third category of such cases to which it was not necessary further to allude. Looking at the matter in the light of the human suffering involved, it was rather difficult to say whether corporal punishment, or sentences of imprisonment perhaps for long periods, and often including solitary confinement, were the worse; and he could not say that he was able to give the House a strong opinion on the subject. But there was this great objection to corporal punishment, that it went against the sensibilities and the tendencies of the public mind in this country. If it ceased to exist, the army might possibly become more popular, while a stronger sense of professional honour might be introduced into its lowest ranks. He had no doubt that it had considerable effect in deterring men from entering the army. There was hardly a village in England from which young men had not enlisted; but there were few village families that took pride in the fact that one of their members had enlisted for a common soldier. How far that feeling was produced by the flogging it was not for him to say. What he should have preferred on that matter was that his hon. Friend (Mr. Otway) should not have moved the actual omission of that clause, but that the Secretary of State for War (Sir John Pakington) should have come down and stated, on the part of the authorities of the army, that they recognised fully the feeling of the House on that subject; and that, though they did not think it would be prudent altogether to give up the power of flogging, it was their intention to exercise it only in cases of extreme urgency. The proposed new clause was very vague and uncertain. It spoke of offences "to be specified from time to time in the Articles of War." This was not clear. It ought to be made as clear as noon-day, so that every recruit might easily know, without being obliged to consult any other document, what circumstances would bring him within the limits of that particular punishment. The clause, in its present form, proposed to retain corporal punishment for mutiny and aggravated insubordination attended with personal violence, but to abolish it in all other cases. Assuming it to be true that it was still necessary to retain it with the view of suddenly putting down a mutiny, then the punishment should be equally applicable to all engaged in the mutiny. He could not, however, understand on what principle it was that nine-tenths of the army—for that was the proportion, according to the right hon. Gentleman, in the first-class—might commit acts of mutiny, and yet that it should not be deemed necessary to flog them while flogging was maintained to be indispensable under similar circumstances in the case of the remaining one-tenth. If it was not necessary to flog any of the larger class it would appear not to be necessary to flog at all. He also found some difficulty in understanding the last part of the clause, in which it was set forth that—

"Every soldier, when serving with a military force in the field or on board ship, shall be liable to a like punishment by court martial for any of the offences before enumerated."

Did the words "every soldier," he should like to know, mean every soldier in the first and second class? [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: Yes, in time of war.] But the words "on board ship" had no immediate connection with a time of war, so that every soldier in the first and second classes in time of peace on board ship would "be liable to a like punishment;" and how that proposal was to be reconciled with the first part of the clause, in which it was laid down that no soldier in the first class should in time of peace be sentenced to be flogged, he was at a loss to understand. The clause, in fact, was not sufficiently distinct or precise; yet if ever there was a matter in which the language should be free from ambiguity, it was this. If corporal punishment were to be tolerated in any case, he would prefer to see substituted for the proposed clause one in which it was shortly and clearly laid down that in time of peace corporal punishment should not be inflicted except for the offences of mutiny and aggravated insubordination, accompanied by violence, without any reference to classification. A general power should also be given extending the punishment to other offences in time of war.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he believed that both sides of the House agreed in the opinion that the punishment of flogging was almost as degrading to the men who witnessed as to those who suffered it, and that its effect on the men who were flogged was anything but salutary. There could be no doubt that it ought to be abolished; and if it were retained, it was only because the service was not at that premium at which it ought to be. The commanding officers ought to be empowered to say that the man who committed a crime for which he deserved to be flogged should be discharged, and that discharge ought to be regarded as a disgrace to him. He thought the concession which had been offered by the Secretary for War (Sir John Pakington) was one which ought to be accepted, and he would suggest the withdrawal of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway).

MR. HORSMAN: My right hon. Friend the Secretary for War began his speech by vindicating himself from the charge which he imagined—I think erroneously—was made against him of having treated the House with disrespect in not giving effect to the Resolution at which it arrived a few nights ago. All the circumstances of the case being taken into consideration—that the majority was a very narrow one in a small House, that the division came somewhat suddenly upon him, and that the change proposed was one to which he could not well assent without taking counsel with the military authorities—he was, in my opinion, perfectly justified in not acting on the Resolution without giving us, as he did very fairly, an opportunity of re-considering the matter. I, at the same time, must say that when it is taken into account that this is a question on which, as he must know, public opinion is growing very strong—if it be not altogether ripe—he would, in my humble judgment, have acted more judiciously, especially as he told us he has been in communication with the military authorities on the subject, if he had informed the House that he foresaw he could not long resist the tide of opinion which was rising against the infliction of corporal punishment. There can be no doubt that out of doors, at all events, corporal punishment in the army is looked upon as a punishment at once brutal and degrading. It might be tolerated in the days when the army was recruited from the dregs of the population; but it is not in harmony with our times, and does not accord with the spirit of the age. Though to-night the clause which my right hon. Friend proposes may be agreed to, yet he must remember that this Mutiny Bill will be, as the hon. Member for Chatham told him, an annual topic of discussion, and this question will be made the subject of annual debate. The probability, therefore, is that no Government will be able to maintain corporal punishment beyond another year. I would throw out for the consideration of my right hon. Friend whether it is well, by the retention of this punishment, to bring odium and unpopularity on the military authorities without any corresponding advantage? Public opinion, as I said, is opposed to the infliction of this punishment, and no opinion, I venture to contend, unless it be that of the military authorities, is in its favour. In speaking of the opinion of military men, I would not be misunderstood. No men are, I believe, more generous or humane as regards their fellow-creatures generally, while the soldiers under their command are to them objects of peculiar care and solicitude. They know their good qualities, they are proud of their loyalty, and they would do as much as any other class of men to raise their character. When, therefore, I speak of them as being in favour of corporal punishment, I am simply making a remark which applies to men of any profession, who, when any change affecting their profession is proposed, are liable to look on the proposal with a narrow vision, to prefer the familiar to the unknown, experience to experiment, and to regard any alteration as tending to unsettlement and uncertainty. I think we ought not to have had the name of the Commander-in-Chief so prominently brought forward in this discussion. The Duke of Cambridge is very popular, and deservedly so, both with the army and in this House; because we know that, while devoted to his profession, he is, more than any other man who has filled that important office, disposed to feel that the army ought to be popular as well as efficient, and to give his best attention to any suggestions that may be made for the welfare of the soldier. But I certainly think that if this Motion is to be resisted, if any unpopularity and odium are to be faced—as must be the case if this question has to be discussed from year to year—the Government ought to take it upon themselves. I should be very sorry, therefore, if we should again have a letter brought down, written by the Commander-in-Chief, and read with an effect which I do not believe my right hon. Friend intended to produce, for he indicated his personal feeling against corporal punishment, but stated that in the face of that letter he could not consent to the Motion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I have no recollection of having given any opinion beyond saying that I should be pleased if the punishment could safely be abolished.

MR. HORSMAN: The right hon. Gentleman certainly indicated the opinion which he held; for no one could have heard his speech without perceiving that his feeling was strongly against corporal punishment, though he said that after receiving that letter he could not consent to the Motion. I feel sure that the impression which was produced by the reading of that letter was unintentional on his part; for if an unpopular system is to be kept up, it is hardly fair or judicious to put the Commander-in-Chief in the front, and make him bear the brunt of that unpopularity. The objection to the proposal of my hon. Friend (Mr. Otway) is based partly on argument and partly on apology. The argument, if it can be so called, is that the discipline of the army must be kept up. We all admit that; but the question is, whether or not this is a mode of punishment which tends more than any other to keep up that discipline. My right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) said just now that he listened attentively to the debate the other night, and did not hear any substitute suggested for this punishment. He himself, however, gave an answer to that remark; because he said he intended to abolish it, except in 9 per cent of the whole army. He cannot intend that the remaining 91 per cent—the men in the first class—shall go unpunished. He must, therefore, have decided what the substitute is to be, and what punishment they are to undergo for the same offences for which the other 9 per cent are to be flogged. Why not, then, apply that substitute to the latter also? The argument that corporal punishment is essential to the maintenance of discipline we meet by facts. A very strong fact has been already referred to—namely, that in some of the Household regiments corporal punishment is not inflicted, and yet those regiments are as well disciplined as any in the service. I have been reminded, too, of another force which is not, indeed, part of the army, but is a military force in its character and organization—the Constabulary of Ireland. They are a well disciplined force, 12,000 strong, but there is no flogging; and if its introduction were attempted, the force would fall to pieces. It is said, however, in reply to the inquiry, why discipline cannot be kept up without it as well with the 9 per cent as with the 91—that those 9 per cent consist of an entirely different class of men; that they are the scamps and reprobates of the army, and that no other punishment would have any effect upon them. I will deal with that presently. The late Judge Advocate (Mr. Headlam) said he would retain flogging for violence, aggravated insubordination, and some other offences. But he did not tell us why it was specially applicable to those cases, or would be more effective in them. As for the amended clause, I do not see any practical difference between it and the original clause. Either corporal punishment is proper and effective, or it is not. If it is, you ought to continue it for all offences under the old Mutiny Act. If it is not, you ought to abolish it entirely. By discontinuing it for one class of offences and retaining it for another, you either do too much or too little, and you thus give up your own case. For what purpose is it to be retained for this 9 per cent? Is it that you wish to reform them, or that you wish to deter them? Two Returns have been presented to the House, one giving the cases in which corporal punishment was inflicted from 1862 to 1865, and the other stating the subsequent conduct of the men who were flogged. This very valuable information, what does it show? Did any good result from the flogging? In almost every case a man who is once flogged becomes a confirmed reprobate, the first punishment being soon followed by another. I have taken the trouble to analyze a single page of the Return, in order to show what the effect of the punishment is. The first case is that of a soldier who was brought before a court martial on the 2nd of December, 1862, for disgraceful conduct and for making away with necessities. He was sentenced to fifty lashes, six months' hard labour, and stoppage of pay, the whole being carried out. On the 11th of June, 1863, as soon as the six months had expired, he was again tried and again sentenced to fifty lashes, six months' hard labour, and stoppage, the whole being carried out, with the exception of seventy-six days' hard labour. The week in which that sentence expired he was a third time sentenced to the like punishment, in that instance, however, the flogging being remitted. A fourth time he was tried, and condemned to six months' hard labour and stoppage; and on the 22nd of October, 1865, he was again sentenced to fifty lashes and 252 days' hard labour, with stoppage, the whole of which was carried out. So that this man in less than three years comes before five courts martial, is four times sentenced to be flogged, and actually undergoing it thrice, and is condemned to 982 days' hard labour, of which 766 are carried out, he being the whole time under stoppage. [An hon. MEMBER: What were his offences?] The first was disgraceful conduct and making away with necessaries; the second, absence and making away with necessaries; the third, making away with necessaries; the fourth, absence and making away with necessaries; and the fifth, absence and insubordination. The hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) told us the other night that there was a difficulty in substituting another punishment, because while a man was undergoing it some of his comrades would have to perform his duty; but here is a man who for three years had not done a week's duty, being the whole time under punishment. Surely, as the hon. Member for Fifeshire (Sir Robert Anstruther) has suggested, it would have been a great benefit to the service had this confirmed reprobate been turned out at once. The second case is that of a man who, in less than three years, was five times before a court martial, and was sentenced to flogging and 462 days' hard labour, as well as to 1,312 days' stoppage of 1d. a day. In another case, a man was seven times before a court martial, and sentenced to four floggings. The floggings were inflicted three times, and he received 150 lashes. He was also sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour, and to stoppages of 1d., his imprisonment lasting altogether 1,008 days. Another man was before six courts martial, was flogged three times, had 999 days' hard labour, was subjected to stoppages of 1d. for 2,688 days in all. These cases are all in one single page of the Return, and I put it to the House whether, in every one of these cases, it would not have been a saving to the public if the men had been dismissed from the service. They were continually in prison, and the country derived no good from their services. I heard my hon. and gallant Friend say that, if you do away with corporal punishment, you must give facilities for discriminating between the good and the bad men. Well, who objects to the authorities being furnished with any facilities that may be necessary? Gentlemen on this side of the House will feel it their duty to assist in getting rid of the men who disgrace the army. They are the men whom it is painful for the good soldier to associate with, who demoralize the new recruit, and keep better men out of the army. You have a positive difficulty in getting recruits, and the reason is because you retain these bad men, who are small in number, but who lower the standard of the army. If you dismiss them, you will get good men in their place. The fact is that the real mode of raising the discipline of the army is by raising its character, and thereby attracting men to the service who will take a pride in their profession; but nobody ever heard of the pride of a flogged soldier. It has been said that it is necessary for the preservation of discipline that the system of flogging should be upheld; and the Secretary for War says that it is only a very small number who get the punishment. Then it would appear that for an infinitesimal amount of benefit this scandal and reproach to the whole service is maintained. The Judge Advocate rather disputes the assertion that this mode of punishment is not in keeping with the spirit of the times. He points to our recent legislation, and says that we have passed an Act for flogging juvenile delinquents and garrotters. Yes, but the English soldier is neither a juvenile delinquent nor garrotter. The case of juvenile delinquents comes home to the experience of all of us. We have all been juvenile delinquents; but then there is a great difference between boys and men. In the case of a boy flogging is only a local application; but in the case of the soldier, flogging is followed by feelings of wounded pride and degradation ten times more painful than the physical operation. We are asked whether we would do away with the punishment altogether.

We admit that in time of war, on board ship, on the line of march, and in campaign, you must adopt it, because there is no other mode of punishment available; but we declare that it is the worst of all punishments. This is no longer a question of argument, but it is one of those questions which will be decided by public opinion. When public opinion bears strongly against any practice, a change of system is but a question of time; and in this case I predict that it will be a question of short time. The change would be accepted thankfully if it were at once adopted; but, if it be long postponed, a time will come when the Government will acquire odium and unpopularity, and will be compelled to do by the force of public opinion that which they might now do gracefully and easily. I therefore call on them to give this matter their most serious consideration, so that when they come to discuss this subject next year they may be in a position to do that which will gain both popularity and efficiency to the army and satisfaction to the country.

MAJOR JERVIS said, that some years ago, when this subject was brought forward by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White), he (Major Jervis) had stated that flogging had to be retained because the House of Commons would not vote the necessary money for weeding the army of bad characters. What was the state of the case at the present moment, it not being a question of facing an enemy, but the country being at peace? He had asked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War whether it was proposed to give the military authorities more power to get rid of felons and men who had been guilty of disgraceful conduct? The reply was, that it was not intended to give the military authorities any more power than they possessed at present. It was quite true that the Articles of War stated that no man should be dismissed the service except by sentence of a court martial or by the order of the Commander-in-Chief. But, in point of fact, though the Commander-in-Chief had the control of the discipline and of the promotion of the army, he had nothing to do with the financial affairs of the army, as the War Office took good care, for the sake of the saving, that men should not be dismissed. They looked to the cost. That was really the essence of the whole question. They would have to pay a man to supply the place of the discharged one. According to the Estimates they would be called upon to pay £18,000 this year for the maintenance of the law by court martial; but in truth that was but a small portion of the real expense, for the pay of the men in prison went towards this vote, and the real cost was £90,000 per annum. Now, what would be the cost of discharging a few bad characters compared with this enormous expense? According to the last Report there were between 5,000 and 6,000 soldiers in military prisons; of these, 5,000 were returned as of good, 600 of indifferent, and 600 of bad character. So that it was for the sake of these 600 bad men that the objectionable clause would be introduced. The right hon. Gentleman the Judge Advocate had defended the clause on the ground that we flogged our garotters, our juvenile offenders, and those who fired at the Queen. Well, but these were not the sort of men that we wanted in the army. The sooner they were got rid of the better. The right hon. Gentleman said, also, that unless flogging were maintained the non-commissioned officers would not be safe. A friend of his, since that statement was made, had asked every non-commissioned officer in his battalion whether they thought flogging necessary to maintain their authority, and every one of them replied that they would be sorry to maintain it at that price. The case brought forward by the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) of the man of disgraceful character in one of the regiments of the Guards, one of the greatest blackguards on the face of the earth, whom every effort had been made without success to get discharged, had struck consternation everywhere. It was incredible that the character of the army should be sacrificed in this manner for the sake of the three guineas that had to be given as bounty to recruits. The British soldier had a right to demand that his comrades should be men whom he was not ashamed of, not men fit only for the hulks. He should not object to preserving the power of inflicting corporal punishment in the case of troops on board ship, as some commanding officers seemed to think it necessary, though he had had some experience of men in that position, and he had never seen it had recourse to. Then it was argued that the other punishments now employed in the army were not sufficiently stringent to render it safe to do away with flogging. But in the last Report of the Inspector General of Military Prisons for 1864, a hope was expressed by Colonel Henderson that the increased stringency which it was proposed to introduce into our military prisons would render confinement in them a sufficient punishment for all offences committed by soldiers whom it was in any way desirable to retain in the service; and that all who, by the heinousness of their offences, had incurred the penalty of penal servitude, might never again be considered eligible to enter the service. All he asked was that the commanding officer should have the power, with the consent of the Commander-in-Chief, of discharging men of disgraceful character from the service; and he was confident that a few thousand pounds would cover all the expense. Men were not likely to commit disgraceful offences in order to get discharged. He would even have no objection to continuing the punishment of flogging in certain cases, on condition that dismissal from the service followed it. Under the present system, when they had caught a blackguard they did their best to keep him; or they were so stingy that they would not get rid of him. What did it cost them? He believed it was the most expensive policy that could be followed. Men of this character were all their time either in prison or in hospital. If they went on foreign service they died like rotten potatoes, and other men had to be sent in their place. Commanding officers, inspectors of prisons, medical officers, all agreed in saying that you could never get a day's work out of such men, of whom there were between 1,000 and 2,000 in civil prisons, besides those in military prisons, who ought never to have been admitted into the army at all. For these reasons, he should feel compelled to vote against the clause as it at present stood; but he thought it might be altered to embody the views he had expressed.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he wished to say a few words on the present occasion, some remarks he made the other evening having been referred to by his right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) and his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Harwich (Major Jervis.) His right hon. Friend was mistaken in supposing that he had referred to the Act for punishing juvenile offenders. His argument was that just as they had revived the punishment of corporal punishments in the case of firing at Her Majesty and in the case of garroters, so in the British army, as in society at large, there was a number of persons of desperate character and unbridled passions for whom this punishment was necessary. It was asked by his hon. and gallant Friend, "Why not give power to commanding officers to discharge these men?" But already courts martial had the power of discharge; the Commander-in-Chief had the same power; the commanders of the forces in Ireland and in the colonies had the same power. But in addition to the great expenses occasioned by discharges well known to military men, and the difficulty of obtaining recruits, what would happen? The arguments now used against flogging would, on the score of humanity, be used against branding; and if those discharged were not marked "B. C.," they would re-enlist, get fresh bounty, and would never be got rid of. His right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) had raised two objections to the clause—the first in point of substance, the second in a matter of form. In point of substance, he said, if the power were preserved it should be preserved for all classes. But the object of the clause was to give the good recruit, whom he hoped to attract to the service, that absolute immunity under all circumstances to which Lord Herbert pledged Parliament six years ago. Under no circumstances could the recruit entering the army, or so long as he continued in the first class, be sentenced to this degrading punishment. There were not only two classes of soldiers, but two classes of offenders; and it was only when offenders came under the second class that they were liable to be degraded. The objection to the wording of the clause, founded on the apparent inconsistency between the beginning and the end of it, would be obviated by the insertion of the words—

"Providing that no soldier in such class shall in time of peace be liable to corporal punishment, unless he is serving with a military force in the field or on board ship."

These words would, he thought, meet the verbal objection that had been taken to the clause.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The arguments against and in favour of this punishment have been so fully stated on both sides that it was not my intention to offer any observations on the present occasion. But it seems to me the Committee is placed in rather a difficult position by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. It is difficult to collect exactly what is the intention of the Government with reference to the various Amendments to be moved to the proposal of the Government. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) stated with great clearness the objections felt to the form in which the clause is put; and I do not quite understand whether the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mowbray) intends at any future stage to alter the clause so as to remove those objections. I must say it appears to me that to maintain that all soldiers shall be divided into two classes, and that under no circumstances shall this punishment be inflicted on those in the first class, is calculated to take away almost all utility in the punishment. If the Government assent to the proposal—leaving out the third offence, as probably they may—it will not be possible to punish by flogging during peace except for mutiny and aggravated insubordination—and only one-tenth part of the army even in those cases. If that be all that is intended, I really think it is scarcely worth while to retain the clause at all. But, although I feel this objection to the clause brought forward by the Government, if a division be taken on the second reading of it I must go out in favour of the clause. I am unwilling at present to abolish by law the punishment of flogging, which I think is almost the only punishment that can be inflicted in time of war, and which I also think is an appropriate one, and ought to be inflicted in cases of mutiny and aggravated insubordination. I think that this clause is faulty; but it may be improved after being read a second time. Under these circumstances, if the matter is brought to a division, I shall vote for the second reading.

GENERAL PEEL: I expressed my own opinion the other evening as strongly as possible upon the advisability of retaining the power of flogging in the army; and therefore I should not have risen upon the present occasion had it not been for the observations of the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway), repeated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman), as to dragging into the discussion the name of the Commander-in-Chief. If there be any impropriety in the manner in which the Commander-in-Chief's letter has been laid before the House I am responsible for it; because no sooner did the hon. Member for Chatham give notice of his intention to make a Motion upon this subject, than I, as the then Secretary of State for War, wrote an official letter to the Commander-in-Chief, who, as such, is responsible to the Secretary of State for War for the discipline of the army, requesting him to inform me whether, in his opinion, it was possible to do away with the system of flogging in the army without interfering with its discipline. I confess I should have been most happy had the reply of the Commander-in-Chief been such as would have enabled me to have informed the House that he thought that the punishment of flogging could be done away with without interfering with the due discipline of the army. The letter which has been laid before the House is an official letter written by the Commander-in-Chief to the Secretary of State for War on the subject of the discipline of the army, and I should like to know what more proper evidence on the subject could be adduced. But in addition to this evidence, there was the opinion of the Adjutant General, who said he could not hold himself responsible to the Commander-in-Chief for the discipline of the army were this punishment abolished. In certain cases, even in time of peace, such as when troops are on board transports, or when they are in the field, as they have been in Canada, I am informed that it is almost absolutely necessary to retain this system of punishment. I agree, however, with the view taken by the late Judge Advocate General (Mr. Headlam), that if the punishment of flogging is to be retained in cases of mutiny and of gross insubordination, the punishment should be inflicted upon offenders without distinction of class. If a man is a mutineer, or is guilty of gross insubordination, he should be flogged, whether he be in the first or the second class.

MR. HORSMAN: I rise for the purpose of explaining that, while I expressed myself as being of opinion that it was very unfortunate that the name of the Commander-in-Chief had been introduced into this discussion, I did not make use of the word "indecent," nor of any word to the same effect. I thought that the Government ought to have acted on their own responsibility.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I wish to say a few words in reply to the observations made by hon. Members in the course of this discussion. With reference to what has been said as to the division of the army into two classes, I have made no change whatever in that respect. The only change I have made is that, whereas at present the men in the first class are exempt from being flogged except for mutinous conduct, I have proposed that men in the first class should be exempted from corporal punishment altogether. It is for the House to say whether they approve this change, or whether they desire that this system of punishment shall be retained for mutineers, whether in the first or second class. I have also proposed that even in the second class corporal punishment shall be limited to the three offences named. The hon. Member for Chatham appears to think that I have impugned the character of the army by naming the third of these offences as deserving of flogging. But the Articles of War have for years directed that corporal punishment shall be inflicted for offences of this description. It has been suggested that we should make dismissal from the army a substitute for the punishment of flogging. But it has been found to be necessary by one of the Articles of War to specify the punishment that shall be inflicted upon men who shall intentionally maim and injure themselves—to the extent sometimes of injuring their eyesight, in order to get turned out of the army. Under these circumstances, when I find that men will wilfully injure themselves in order to get turned out of the army, I think we must hesitate before we adopt dismissal from the service as a substitute for flogging. With regard to objections that have been taken to the wording of the clause, it has been drawn up by the legal adviser to the War Office, and I see no reason to alter it, with the exception of that part which refers to men “on board a ship,” which should read “on board a ship not in commission.” When men are shut up on board a transport it is impossible to subject them to the ordinary punishments that can be administered on land. [An hon. MEMBER: Is this to apply in time of peace?] Certainly. I think that I have made a very large concession by this clause. Should the House feel that the concession to the first class is too large, they have it in their power to determine how far the punishment shall be retained as regards this class. I confess I would rather keep the clause as it now stands, than introduce any alteration in it. I am in favour of exempting the best men in the army from corporal punishment altogether, and of limiting that punishment to those who by their misconduct have reduced themselves to the second class.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I intend to vote for the second reading of the clause; but I do not wish it to be understood that by so doing I pledge myself to the clause as it stands. I hope the right hon. Baronet will fully understand that I only assent to the clause being read a second time in the hope that it will be improved before it is finally laid before us.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the said Clause be now read a second time.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 225; Noes 131: Majority 94.

MR. OTWAY said, that as this question had been fully discussed, he did not think it desirable to trouble the Committee with further observations. All he asked the House to do was to affirm their Resolution; and he proposed to modify the clause, so that it should read—

“Every soldier shall on enlisting be in the first class, and no soldier shall in time of peace be sentenced to the corporal punishment of flogging.”

He asked the Committee to remember the words of one of the greatest statesmen the country had ever produced—Lord William Bentinck—who, when he abolished flogging, conjured the officers of the army to relieve themselves as he had done of an unworthy prejudice. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment he had proposed, to restrict the punishment of flogging to the time of war—not to inflict it in time of peace.

Amendment proposed, in line 2, to leave out after the words “soldier” until the word “shall” in the same line; and after “flogging,” in line 3, to leave out the remainder of the clause.—(Mr. Otway.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that if flogging were to be restricted to the two offences, as he thought it ought to be, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) whether it was necessary to keep up this classification? If flogging were necessary at all as a punishment for mutiny and insubordination, accompanied with personal violence, it was equally applicable to any soldier, independent of classification. He therefore proposed to omit the first words of the clause, “Every soldier shall, upon enlistment, be placed in the first class of the army;” and he should also propose to omit the third offence as one for which flogging should be inflicted.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had already explained that in the proposal respecting classification he merely adhered to the existing practice. For seven years the army had been divided into these two classes, and the Committee ought hardly to do away with this broad distinction between the well and the ill-conducted men without notice. Still, the argument used by the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) was a very strong one, and he should not be prepared to join issue with him.

COLONEL PERCY HERBERT said, there appeared to be some misapprehension as to the practice existing in the Prussian army. An officer who had written to him on this subject, said—

"I have by me Witzleben's book on the organization of the Prussian army, edition of 1864, by which it appears that the Articles of War then in force treated flogging as one of the minor punishments, to which any soldier of the second class was liable without trial. The colonel of a regiment could summarily award thirty strokes of the cane, or forty if the offender was undergoing punishment of hard labour, or was in a so-called punishment section. Any subordinate officer, if on detached command, could award fifteen."

This statement of the law was confirmed by an officer who was present with one of the Prussian corps during the late campaign.

MR. LOCKE said, the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) was really a retrograde movement, which would do away entirely with the concession made by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) that under no circumstances should any soldier in the first class be flogged.

MR. HEADLAM said, that according to the Queen's Regulations every soldier was liable to flogging for mutiny. That was the existing state of the law, and soldiers were only divided into classes with respect to crimes concerning which it was proposed to take away the punishment of flogging altogether.

MR. OTWAY said, he must congratulate the Government upon their "whip," and would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing on his Amendment. The result was that no concession had practically been made. Next year, if he were in the House, he would again bring the subject forward on the bringing in of the Mutiny Bill, and he was convinced that the days of flogging in the army were numbered.

MR. KER said, he was either unfit to understand the course the proceedings had taken, or they were of a very unusual nature. He hoped that somebody would explain what had taken place.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the offences for which degradation was to be inflicted and the authority by whom it was to be done were not specified. He wanted to know was it to be done by the mere will of the commanding officer, or was the degradation to take place only after conviction by a court martial? He wished for some explanation of the views of the Government.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, his proposal undoubtedly was to retain the division into classes, and to exempt the first class. But after the discussion which had taken place, he believed it to be the opinion of the great majority on both sides that it would not be prudent to part with this punishment for cases of mutiny and gross insubordination even in the first class.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, they had got into such confusion that the best plan was to report Progress, and he would move that the Chairman be ordered to do so.

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to know how the clause really stood.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he would move, in the third line, after the words "first class," to omit the word "shall" in order to insert the word "may," his object being that the degradation should not be made imperative.

MR. OTWAY moved to report Progress.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that in the present state of the matter there would be considerable difficulty in bringing this question to a conclusion. The clause ought to be most seriously considered, and as there was no chance of doing that now, he thought the best course would be to agree to the Motion that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Lord Naas.)

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD NAAS moved the second reading of this Bill. He said, that its objects were to correct certain defects in the Act by which bridges in Ireland were now erected and managed. Powers were given by this Bill for the purchase of private rights, tolls, ferries, and the like. The time, too, for the repayment of money was extended, and among other powers the grand juries were authorized to apportion the cost of the bridges according to the benefits conferred upon the respective districts. A power of appeal was given, and a clause was inserted by which it was provided that certain proceedings already taken by the grand juries of Wexford and Kilkenny, in reference to the New Ross Bridge, should remain as substantial proceedings taken under the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Naas.)

MR. SYNAN said, he thought some of the provisions of the Bill equitable enough; but he objected to the property being vested in the Commissioners of Works instead of in the grand juries, by whom the expenses would be defrayed.

MR. LAWSON said, he thought that the House had not received a satisfactory explanation of the Bill, which, involving, as it did, large taxing powers and powers for the compulsory purchase of private property, was one of great importance.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS said, he hoped that the second reading of what was a most important Bill would not be opposed.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to inquire whether the Secretary to the Treasury had seen the Bill, and whether he knew that it affected his Department? He protested against the Treasury being made any further responsible for carrying out local works in Ireland, which should be done by the local authorities.

MR. HUNT said, he was not aware that any clause in the Bill affected the Treasury.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that after the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury, the debate ought to be adjourned. The Bill had only been delivered that morning, and hon. Members had not had time to consider it. He moved that the debate be adjourned.

COLONEL TOTTENHAM said, he must oppose the Motion. The Bill was one of great emergency, and if there was any objection to its details they could be considered in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

LORD NAAS said, he hoped the House would give the Bill a second reading. He would promise ample opportunity to hon. Members for making Amendments upon a future stage of the Bill. With regard to what had been said with respect to the Treasury, the Bill threw no further liability on the Treasury beyond what was imposed by the 3 & 4 Will. IV.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

RELIGIOUS, &c., BUILDINGS (SITES) BILL.
(Mr. Hadfield, Mr. Basley, Mr. Akroyd, Mr. Leeman.)

[BILL 64.] CONSIDERED AS AMENDED.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the operation of this Bill would be to exempt all property held by charitable or religious societies from the operation of the Law of Mortmain. But no property was exempt unless duly enrolled, and this Bill exempted such property from the necessity of being enrolled, the object of enrolment being that it should be known by whom the property was held in Mortmain.

An hon. MEMBER said, he wished to ask, if the hon. Member was in order in discussing the Bill at that stage?

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was not strictly in order in doing so.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

THAMES EMBANKMENT (SHEILDS' PETITION).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. LOWE moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the allegations of the petition of Francis Webb Sheilde, C.E., presented on the 8th instant. He said, that the case he had to call attention to, in the absence of any answer to the allegations made, appeared to be one of considerable hardship. In 1861 a Royal Commission was appointed to investigate the propriety of the embankment of the Thames between the Westminster and the Blackfriars' bridges; and that Commission issued this advertisement—

"Thames Embankment Commission, 2, Victoria Street, S.W., the 6th of March, 1861.—Parties desirous of submitting plans for embanking the River Thames within the metropolis, which will provide with the greatest efficiency and economy for the relief of the most crowded streets, tend to the improvement of the navigation, and afford an opportunity of making the low level sewer without disturbing Fleet Street and the Strand, are requested to forward them without delay.—By order, HENRY KINGSFOTE Secretary."

That seemed to him to be a plain invitation to engineers to send in plans, and it certainly implied that the person who in the best manner satisfied the wishes of the Commissioners would receive some sort of reward or remuneration for his services. That this was the construction put upon the advertisement might be gathered from the fact that fifty-nine persons sent in plans, and among them some of the most distinguished members of the profession of engineers, who certainly would not have given their valuable time if they had not been perfectly assured that, in case their plans met with approval, they would receive some compensation. Among the competitors were Messrs. Bidder, President of the Institution of Civil Engineers, Harrison, G. R. Stephenson, J. Fowler, Fulton, Hemans, Bazalgette, Page, Rendel, Captain Moorsom, Sheilds, and forty-eight others. The Commissioners received the plans of the competitors, and, after a good deal of consideration, they reported that—

“The main features of the majority of the plans are an embanked roadway on the north side of the river, and the formation of docks with the view to retain all the existing wharves; in others, railways in addition to the roadway and docks have been proposed; while in a few a solid embankment and roadway without either docks or railways have been suggested. Among these latter is a plan submitted by Mr. Sheilds, some of whose suggestions appear to us to afford, in a greater degree than in any of the other designs, the basis upon which an efficient and economical scheme may be founded. We desire, however, to express our high appreciation of the great engineering skill and ability that have been displayed in many of those designs which contemplated the construction of docks and railways.”

Upon that the scheme was handed over to the Metropolitan Board of Works, who employed their own engineer, Mr. Bazalgette, to carry the design out. Mr. Sheilds applied both to the right hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper) and the Metropolitan Board of Works for employment as engineer, having been the person whose plans had been adopted by the Commission. He received civil answers stating that they could do nothing for him. He stated, in his petition, that he was put to considerable expense and trouble in preparing plans for which he had received no remuneration whatever. That a gentleman should have succeeded as Mr. Sheilds did in a competition with fifty-nine of the most eminent engineers in England, and should have received no compensation whatever, appeared to indicate a state of things most undesirable to the public interests. If gentlemen were to be called upon to give valuable time and services, and to make plans for works for the public advantage, and were to receive no compensation, the necessary result would be that in future men of the first talent would decline to compete, and the public must be content with second-rate or third-rate plans. Mr. Sheilds went on to state that he could prove that a very great public saving had been effected by the adoption of his plans. In 1862 a Committee of the House sat on the subject of the Thames Embankment, and it summoned several of these Commissioners. Mr. Cubitt, late Lord Mayor, and a Member of that House, said—

“After we had been for a considerable time studying the matter, and examining plans, and hearing evidence, we came to the conclusion that none of those elaborate designs would do. We made up our minds that what was wanted would be a simple roadway; that we should best comply with what we had to do by a simple compliance with the terms of our instructions, and one of the Commissioners said, ‘There is a plan which is very nearly what you are talking about.’ Mr. Sheild’s plan was then brought out again, and we felt that that did nearly meet what we thought we required.”

Captain Burstall, R.N., a member of the Royal Commission, said that they had between fifty and sixty plans, that they were passed carefully under review, and—

“They came to a conclusion that a plan after a certain form was best suited for the purpose, and the plan that most agreed with their views was a plan drawn by Mr. Sheilds. The general features of the scheme were such as met with the general approval of the Commissioners. It was with reference to his scheme—a solid embankment, the general line which it took, and the mode in which he communicated with the embankment and the main thoroughfares.”

Mr. J. R. M'Clean, a member of the Commission, said that the Commissioners in their Report alluded to the plan of Mr. Sheilds as having had more points of which they approved than any of the others. Mr. H. A. Hunt, a well-known land agent, and member of the Commission, said that Mr. Sheilds made a plan which was very much like what the Commissioners wanted, and that they improved upon it. Mr. Sheilds added in his petition that if he had supposed that he would neither have been employed to carry out his design, nor receive any remuneration for it if successful, he would not have competed. He (Mr. Lowe) did not ask the House to pronounce an opinion on the petition of Mr. Sheilds; but let it send this matter to a Select Committee for inquiry. There were many points for inquiry—whether the plan of Mr. Sheilds was approved as the best, whether it had effected a saving to the public, and whether he had reasonable grounds for supposing that he would be remunerated for it. If these things were so, let the Committee make whatever recommendation it might think proper. Mr. Sheilds could have no claim against the Metropolitan Board of Works. It was not the Board but the Royal Commissioners that issued the advertisement. If Mr. Sheilds were to receive any compensation it must come from the Government, which appointed the Commission. He thought he had made out a prima facie case to justify him in moving for a Committee.

MR. LANYON seconded the Motion. He said that the case was important on public as well as on individual grounds. He trusted, therefore, the Government would assent to the Motion.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he did not doubt that Mr. Sheilds was an able engineer, and that the plans he submitted to the Royal Commission met with deserved approval. There was a wide difference, however, between the case referred to by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) and an invitation by the Government asking architects or engineers to engage in a public competition. Whenever the Government invited architects or engineers to compete they did so under stringent conditions. If the competition were unlimited, as in the case of the Foreign Office, two or three large premiums were awarded. If limited, as in the case of the National Gallery and the New Law Courts, every architect who was invited to compete took a certain sum, and the plans sent in became the property of the Government. But in the advertisement read by the right hon. Gentleman no mention whatever was made respecting any employment, remuneration, or engagement. The Royal Commissioners simply invited the public to send in any idea or scheme they pleased, and there the matter ended. Not a word was said about employment, premium, or remuneration. In answer to the advertisement, fifty or sixty gentlemen sent in their ideas, which were taken into consideration by the Royal Commissioners, who expressed a favourable opinion respecting the main portion of the scheme proposed by Mr. Sheilds. He did not understand that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper), on the part of the Government, employed Mr. Sheilds to prepare any of the designs submitted to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and if Mr. Sheilds had no claim upon that Board for compensation he did not see what claim he could have upon anybody else. The Government, it was obvious, never intended to offer premiums, or they would have expressed such intention in the advertisement issued by the Royal Commissioners. Mr. Sheilds competed on the same terms as the other fifty or sixty gentlemen. If a case like the present were set up as a precedent the door would be opened to considerable inroads on the public purse. He hoped, therefore, that under the circumstances the House would not assent to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. BRADY said, the Royal Commission examined all the plans, and recommended Mr. Sheilds' as the best. One of the competitors of Mr. Sheilds, however, was Mr. Bazalgette, the architect or engineer employed by the Metropolitan Board of Works. The noble Lord (Lord John Manners) had said that Mr. Sheilds was not called upon to give any drawings or plans after the Royal Commission had sat. There was no necessity for any such course, as he had placed his drawings before the Royal Commission, and they were also placed before the Metropolitan Board of Works. It was very hard that Mr. Sheilds should be deprived of the result of his labours, and that Mr. Bazalgette, the paid engineer of the Board of Works, should be enabled to take advantage of them, as he had also taken the credit. The plan adopted, with very slight alterations, was the plan laid down by Mr. Sheilds. That gentleman, he believed, had a claim against the nation, and certainly against the ratepayers of London, as the expense of carrying out his plan was to be defrayed out of the coal dues. He thought it would be most unjust and unfair if there should be no inquiry into the case.

MR. HUNT said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had conclusively proved that the House ought not to assent to the Motion. The hon. Gentleman said these plans had been made use of by the Metropolitan Board of Works. There was an old maxim—

"Cujus est commodum sentire debet et onus."

If that were the case, Mr. Sheilds ought to apply to the ratepayers of the metropolis, or their representatives, and this was not a case for Government compensation.

MR. POLLARD - URQUHART said, that if no inquiry was made into the matter a gross piece of injustice would be done.

Mr. COWPER said, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) had altogether failed in making out a case on behalf of Mr. Sheilda for a grant of public money. Mr. Sheilda had no ground whatever for expecting any remuneration even if his plan had been adopted. In fact, however, it was not adopted, although the Commissioners said it might form the basis of a plan which could be carried out. In the advertisement none of those matters were mentioned which were invariably inserted when a public competition was intended. If the Commission had adopted Mr. Sheilda's plan, no doubt he would have had an equitable claim for employment or remuneration; but, according to the terms of his own petition, the Commission did not adopt his plan.

Mr. O'BEIRNE said, that if the inquiry was refused and the treatment received by Mr. Sheilda was sanctioned by the House, the confidence of professional men in advertisements issued from public departments would be entirely shaken. The plan actually carried into effect was identical with that sent in by Mr. Sheilda, with only two inconsiderable alterations.

Mr. AYRTON said, he wished to ask whether the House were prepared to vote any payment which the Select Committee might recommend. On the ground of trouble the other forty-nine professional gentlemen had an equal claim with Mr. Sheilda.

Mr. LOWE said, he had heard with shame pleas and quibbles put forward on behalf of this great and wealthy country which those who had employed them would not make use of in their private transactions. If the advertisement did not bear the construction put on it what did it mean? When gentlemen were asked to send in their plans without delay what did that mean? Did it mean, according to his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cowper), that they were to send in their plans, that their plans were to be investigated and their ideas stolen, and then that they themselves were to be sent away without getting anything. Did they mean to say that this was what was meant, because the contrary was not stated in so many words in the published advertisement? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) had admitted that Mr. Sheilda had an equitable claim, and that, had the selection of an engineer rested with him, he would have chosen that gentleman. And why had he been unable to do so? Because after that equitable claim had arisen the Government, by an Act of Parliament, transferred the management of the Embankment to the Metropolitan Board of Works. That Act, however, did not release the Government from their obligation towards Mr. Sheilda. If they were bound originally they were so now. Much as he wished to succeed in his Motion, he thought it of far more consequence that the House should signify its reprobation of the miserable plea which had been put forward to oust Mr. Sheilda's claim. There might, indeed, be conclusive reasons against the claim; but he contended that, strengthened by the admissions of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper), he had made out a prima facie case for inquiry. If the House refused it, it would be doing what no honest man would think of doing, and what would degrade the Government before the country.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the Petition of Francis Webb Sheilda, C.E. [presented 8th March], relative to the Thames Embankment, be referred to a Select Committee to inquire into the allegations thereof, and to report their opinion to the House."—(Mr. Lowe.)

The House divided:—Ayes 29; Noes 49: Majority 20.

House adjourned at half after
One o'clock.

MILITIA.—ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Return of all Regiments of Militia in the United Kingdom; showing the Number of Companies in each Regiment, the Establishment Number of Privates in each Company, the Number of Privates present with the Regiment at the last training in the Year 1866, the Number enlisted between the 1st Day of April 1865 and the 1st Day of April 1866, and the Sums paid in each Regiment for such Enlistments.

The noble Marquess, who addressed the House at some length, but whose remarks were inaudible, was understood to refer to the diminution of the numbers of the militia, to suggest that measures should be taken for raising the force to its full numbers.
